Is it the point that you would like to have the vote on the President's budget delayed; is it that he has not had enough time to work to get votes?

Mr. LOTT. I would like for us to have a congressional budget process that could include, as it has in the past, a vote on the President's budget request, but at the same time allow for a vote on the Democrat alternative; perhaps the Republican substitute.

Make in order some amendments to all of the above because the situations have changed with regard to economic assumptions, or what assumptions are we talking about?

I think that the process that is being used here today undermines what we need to be trying to do. I think it makes it difficult in the future for us in the House to work in a biapartisan way and I remind the lady in the House that last year I worked with the chairman of the Budget Committee in a bipartisan way that my friends on the other side of the aisle did not like, but we are willing to do it to make the process work.

When we start off by throwing things at each other through this process, I just do not think it is positive.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. My frustration is that I understand the Budget Committee did have hearings on the President's budget. My understanding was the President asked to have his budget brought up and was afraid it would not. I think if you have some assumptions in the President's budget you do not like or something, we should know about that.

Mr. LOTT. The Budget Committee never gave us an opportunity in the Budget Committee to offer amendments, to change economic assumptions, to go through the normal process.

We had some road shows that went around the country that we were not even given an opportunity to participate in, and you say that is adequate hearings?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. My understanding was that was never asked for.

Mr. LOTT. Let me wrap up my remarks if I could.

I would like to urge my colleagues to vote down the previous question. If we defeat the previous question, we will offer a rule that makes in order a substitute by the Democrats. A Democrat proposal.

Now, you might say, "We are not exactly ready." If we defeat the previous question and pass a rule that makes in order your substitute, we do not have to bring it up right today. We could bring it up when you get ready; hopefully maybe next week, in a bipartisan effort to show that we are serious about this.

We want to give you an opportunity to offer your Democratic alternative.

Let me emphasize to you now if you vote for the previous question you are saying that you do not want an opportunity to offer a Democratic alternative. You need to understand that. That is what they are saying. If they vote for the previous question, they want it just like it is, which means they do not even want a chance to offer the Democratic alternative.

So we are going to urge our colleagues, all of you, to vote no on the previous question. Let us make in order a rule that would give us an opportunity to have the normal process. Let us see what you have got to offer. Put your cards on the table.

And also, heaven forbid, if we do not defeat the previous question, we should defeat this rule, save ourselves 4 hours of wasted time today. Let the committee meet this afternoon and do their job.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Louisiana. Mr. [HUCKABY].

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I am amazed that my friend, my colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi, considers this time a waste of time as such. Certainly the President's budget is meant to be a blueprint for the future of this country. If it cannot be that, it should be at least a basic framework from which we can start.

Unfortunately, this document, I do not think, is either one. I think it is entirely proper that this House vote today and dispose of this document and get it off the board, so to speak, so that then we can go with the process and when we return, we can get out a meaningful budget.

The gentleman from Mississippi did not speak in one sentence about any content of the President's budget, and we probably will not hear any debate today, because it misses the mark so far and the fact that it increases defense spending 8 percent, while at the same time it is decimating such programs as agriculture and education.

Certainly this is not the framework to begin with. I would urge my colleagues, let us pass this rule and then defeat the proposed budget before us this afternoon.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

What we have happening here today is just a political travesty. The people on the majority side of the aisle understand that it is a political travesty. They understand that the only reason why this is happening is that they hope that perhaps they will get to make some political points and that they will get a couple of political things in; and yet they have the guts, they have the guts to continue to talk about bipartisanship.

In today's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the chairman of the Budget Committee has a remark in there that says: "It is my intention that together in a bipartisan manner we will be able to present to the House for consideration a budget which fulfills our obligation in meeting the needs of America."

Now, we have real bipartisanship out here today. Every Member of the minority party, everyone of them, regards this whole process as a political charade, as a total travesty. Every Member of the minority party regards it as such, and yet you bring it out.

Now, there is true bipartisanship. That is real bipartisanship, my friends. We really are setting off the budget process in a very bipartisan fashion. We really want bipartisanship in developing a budget when we start this.

We bring it up under a closed rule, told that we do not need any amendments, no amendments are necessary, that we ought not give the minority any chance to offer amendments.

That is not the process we ought to have. That is true bipartisanship.

Boy, oh boy, take your 2-to-1 majority in the Rules Committee and shove it down our throats, that is real bipartisanship. We have got real bipartisanship on the budget process out here.

Do not allow any update of the figures. Despite the fact that the chairman of the committee himself has stated that the figures in the budget are wrong, do not allow any update of the figures to make this budget process real, even with regard to the President's figures.

Now, there is true bipartisanship. We have got real bipartisanship out here on the floor today.

The majority party really wants a bipartisanship effort. That is the reason why they are doing this.

Yes, sir; boy, we have got bipartisanship. We have real bipartisanship out here.

Bipartisanship on the budget, what a bunch of crap.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I normally would not comment on the language used by another Member, but I would urge Members on the other side to observe the rules of the House.

Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HEFNER].

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. HEFNER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, is there any language that has been used on the floor that was in violation of the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not required to rule on that at this point.

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there has been any language used that has not been used that you could classify being used in special orders and 1-minute speeches for the past few days. I think it all fits into this scenario.

I would like to talk just a bit about politics. We have had—I have been on the Budget Committee now this is my sixth budget from the administration. Let us face it. They have all been political budgets.

This is something that has to take place simply from our point of view. It is politics. Let us make no mistake about it, but all these have been political budgets. They have been disallowed in the Budget Committee. They have been disallowed in the other body, and yet when you go out and you talk about policy and what you are doing from the administration, you get the same rhetoric for the last 5 years. "Had you adopted my budget, we wouldn't have these problems. We wouldn't have had any of the problems that exist in the free world today if we had adopted these budgets in the past 5 years."

So I think it is only fitting that we come before this greatest deliberative body and the great debators who understand the use of the King's English and talk about it in terms of guts and crap, because that it what we are talking about when we consider this budget is an awful lot of crap in this budget; so let us separate the wheat from the crap, as it were, and talk about what it does.

How much does it cut vocational training? Are you in favor of doing what the President wants to do in vocational training? If you are, let us say so.

If you want to cut the feeding programs for children, let us say so.

If you want to cut out the extension agents 57 percent that served this country since 1914, let us say so.

Let us come down, let us establish where we are. If you are talking about political courage, if you want to increase the defense budget by 8 percent and if you want to talk about assumptions, let us look at assumptions.

The President's own budget was off $15 billion just in the defense category alone.

You are going to get a chance to vote on your budget. You are going to get a chance to vote on our budget that is going to be used in the same assumptions that our friends in the other body have already put together.

You have never had a time in the last 5 years that you haven't had a chance to offer a budget.

You talk about a constitutional amendment to balance the budget. There is absolutely nothing to prohibit you on this side of the aisle from bringing to this House a budget that is in balance, not in 1991, but you can offer within the next 4 weeks, you can come to this House and offer a budget that is in balance in 1987.

Let us get away from the wheat and the crap and get on with the business.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER].

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I am at a loss to understand why we are going through this process this afternoon. This Member from California has been an active participant in the budget process at least over the last 3 years. I have been one of those who has been urging the House to adopt a budget which 3 years ago we could claim would be balanced. Since the advent of the triple digit, that is $200 billion deficit era, none of us have been able to stand in the well and say with a straight face that the budget we are advocating would give us a balance in that particular year; but I am one of those in this Chamber this year who would like to offer a budget, but will be precluded from doing so under this rule because it is not in order, which would let us do the following: Comply with Gramm-Rudman, not cut any social program, permit all COLA's to rise consistent with the CPI, permit the President's requested increase in defense after inflation at 3 percent and not raise taxes.

But how do we do that? We do that by correcting what is fundamentally wrong with the budget process in the whole government itself; namely, monetary instability.

High interest rates that every person in America must pay, including the U.S. Government, are essentially caused because of monetary instability. The U.S. Government today has to spend an interest rate of about 10 percent on the average to service its national debt. Up until 1971 the U.S. Government could sell its debt at 3 percent. If you drive 7 points off the annual debt service expense, you are reducing the annual interest cost in maintaining the national debt by in excess of $150 billion a year. That is the alternative that I would like to present to the House.

It involves the sale of bonds backed by gold. These bonds could be sold at an interest rate of 2¼ percent. It is the means whereby we dig ourselves out of this hole that we have dug for ourselves. We delude ourselves if we think we are going to be able to get out of this fiscal problem just by concentrating on reducing spending that does not exclude interest. It is not possible. We cannot raise taxes enough to balance the budget. We collectively do not have the intestinal fortitude to cut spending to balance the budget unless, as I say, we concentrate our attention on the interest cost of maintaining the national debt.

This rule, unfortunately, precludes this Member or any Member from offering this kind of a budget alternative. Therefore, I am going to be in opposition to this rule.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK].

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I think some of us need a little more time to digest the notion that 2¼-percent bonds are going to solve the deficit problem, so maybe it is just as well that we have to wait here.

I want to talk about what seems to me to be the implicit premise of the remarks of people on the other side. We are being denounced for being political; rather a bizarre thing to accuse 435 elected officials of being, but the premise of the denunciation for being political, let us be very clear, is this. They say we are trying to make political points. We are trying to embarrass people on the other side. How? By asking them to vote on the President's budget.

The premise of this is that it is an unpopular budget. You do not make political points by asking people to cast a vote which they find easy; so it is very clear that our friends on the other side are conceding that the President's budget is a difficult one to defend, because we are being accused of a lack of bipartisanship. Members are entitled to say what they want, but I have to say to my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER], to many of us he is about as credible an advocate of bipartisanship as Ferdinand Marcos is of elected reform. He has many talents, but an advocacy of bipartisanship has not heretofore been one of them told to us.

But the premise again is that this is a lousy budget, because we could not make political points by asking you to vote on a good budget.

It is also noticeable that no one on the other side wants to say a good word about the President's budget. You want to denounce us for bringing it up. You want to talk about 2¼-percent bonds to reduce the deficit.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK. I yield to the gentleman. Maybe the bonds will drop to a point and three-quarters.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, some of us continually in life try to push a string. The gentelman knows as well as I do, Presidents propose and Congress disposes. Presidents do not set the level of spending for this Nation. We do, and the gentleman is asking us to vote for a budget process whereby we have not had an opportunity of having some input in what we think the level of spending should be. Is that not reasonable?

Mr. FRANK. No, it is not, and I will tell the gentleman why.

The President has proposed and we propose to dispose. The gentleman says we are supposed to vote. That is what we want to do.

Now, I think this is a budget which is eminently disposable myself. I suspect Members on the other side do, because if this were such a great budget, you could not wait to vote for it. The gentleman is distraught.

They are telling us it is a dirty trick to make you vote on Ronald Reagan's budget. Did someone sneak into the White House under cover of darkness and foist on this poor President a budget over which he had no control? It is his document of which he is proud.

And remember, too, the analogy between State budgets and this budget is inapposite, because State budgets are detailed and specific. This is a very general one. This is drawn in broad categories. It leaves the legislative function before us.

We all know that passing a budget does not bind this House into specifics. What we have here is a budget which is indefensible.

The majority party has said, let us have a vote on it and let us see how many people want to defend it. So far the count is none.

We are being attacked for asking people to vote on it and I do not think we are going to hear much about the merits of the budget. The gentleman from Mississippi said that it has wrong assumptions. Well, let us hear what the assumptions ought to be.

I do not understand why it is not appropriate procedure for us to vote on the President's budget first, dispose of it. If people do not like it, we will then go on to other budgets.

The gentleman from California thinks 2¾-percent bonds will solve our problem. Some of us will express our opinions on that later.

But the fundamental point remains. The premise of what we are being told on the other side is that the President's budget is unpopular and they do not want to have to vote on it.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire as to how much time has been used on both sides?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] has 7 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. FROST] has 16 minutes remaining.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I think in the interest of a balance of time, perhaps the gentleman would prefer to consume some more of his time.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Mississippi how many additional speakers he anticipates having?

Mr. LOTT. Perhaps one. I understand the gentleman has two. I think the normal procedure would be for the gentleman to yield to one, and I would yield to one, and then the gentleman would be entitled to the wrapup speaker. I would rather not get a double whammy there at the end without being able to balance it out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. FROST] has the right to conclude the debate.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT].

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat amused at all of the rhetorical argument here today about parliamentary procedure. We have heard such words as "charade" and "travesty" and other words that I shall not repeat, used to describe what is happening here today.

I have not heard any comment about the merits of the President's budget on the side of those who do not want to vote on it and obviously do not want to discuss it. That is a curiosity, really, is it not?

There is a disposition not to discuss and not to vote upon the budget submitted to us by the President of the United States. The President has personally and publicly asked that we give consideration to his budget request. He has asked that the Congress vote on it.

In all of the major media markets throughout the country, high-priced, slick television commercials have been bombarding the public eardrums asking that people write to the Congress and demand a vote on the President's budget. "Support the President's budget," say the ads.

Do you not think, then, that this is what we ought to do, give him a vote and see how much support he really has?

People have said, "Well, we need to have some alternatives." There will be ample opportunity for alternatives. When the Committee on the Budget reports the budget from the committee, opportunity will be granted, as always it is, for alternatives of a variety of types from a variety of sources. So members of the minority will have a chance to offer their alternatives. Members of the majority party also will have a chance to offer alternatives. Surely nobody seriously apprehends otherwise.

The question today is not that. The question is very simple. The question is: Do you approve of the President's budget? Do you want it? Are you for it or against it? Does it represent the set of priorities that you support? Does it represent in your mind what this Nation ought to be doing?

For example, do you believe that in time, with this stringent budget situation when we are ending a year in September with something like $220 billion in deficit, that we need to add $34 billion more next year for military spending, an increase of 12 percent over the current fiscal year, or 8 percent after accounting for expected inflation, and at the very same time to do away with, utterly to eliminate in totality, the new GI bill for veterans, and while doing that to reduce the availability of Veterans' Administration hospital services and care for some 58,000 American veterans? Is that our idea of a good priority? For my money it is not, but if it is for you, then vote for the President's budget if that is what you think is right.

Do you believe that we ought to be putting money into the development of a hypersonic airplane in which those who can afford to do so may orbit over to Tokyo for lunch in 2 hours, but at the very same time to eliminate in totality the Amtrak funds and to cut by 66 percent public transportation funds so that ordinary men and women may not have any way to get to work? If that represents your idea of the right set of priorities for America, then perhaps you want to vote for the President's budget.

If you believe in eliminating college loans for at least 250,000 American students, making it impossible for them to get a college education, then maybe you want to vote for the President's budget. Personally, I disagree with that. I think this is a time when we desperately need quality education and educational opportunity to be expanded, not contracted, for America's youth.

If you believe that we ought to eliminate all new low-income housing and take housing and homes out of the reach of modest-income people, then maybe you want to vote for the President's budget. But if you do, you must understand that is what you are voting for, and that is why we have brought the bill today.

We want to let Members of the House have an opportunity to say whether or not they believe in doing away with the WIN, the Work Incentive Program which the President has verbally endorsed but now wants to eliminate, and thus make it impossible for many jobless Americans to get assistance in finding jobs or job training.

If you want to eliminate school lunches for 5 million to 8 million American children, at least 2 million of whom are very poor and would have no other opportunity for a hot lunch, then maybe you want to vote for the President's budget. But let us make it clear, that is what you are voting for if and when you do.

So let us vote for this rule and give an opportunity for discussion in order that we may examine these priorities and make our judgments on them.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, before I yield to the gentlewoman from Illinois; I would like to yield myself such time as I may consume just momentarily.

Mr. Speaker, in the vein of the gentleman's comments, and I must say he really made some strong arguments in behalf of the President's budget there in his comments. If he is interested in some savings, I understand the other body has reached some agreement with regard to reconciliation, that we can make some savings in the Federal deficit, and I assume or would hope that the gentleman would be willing to join us later on today in bringing up that reconciliation package. Last week, he made a very beautiful speech in support of the effort to pass reconciliation and save that money. So we are going to have an opportunity this afternoon to do that.

Will the gentleman join us in that effort?

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. Of course, I would want to see what the Senate has done to our reconciliation bill and what changes, if any, it has made in the formula that it earlier approved and voted for last December. But we have cranked into our considerations in trying to put together a budget in the committee the assumption that that reconciliation bill be passed, and by all means we want it included.

Mr. LOTT. We are certainly looking forward to working with the gentleman in doing that this very afternoon, because there are not only savings in it, but more savings are in it now than what we had in it last week.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN].

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, it is ridiculous to bring up only the President's budget for a vote on the floor of the House. This charade is being staged by the majority to cover up their own lack of progress.

The Committee on the Budget in the other body continues to work on a bipartisan budget and they, in fact, meet right now. As House Republicans, we have studied the budget and we have agonized over the hard choices that first the President has made and now we must make.

We have also asked the Democrats repeatedly to sit down with us to work on the House budget, but the Democrats are stuck. They have been meeting for weeks and have not been able to come up with a budget that all their factions can agree on.

Democrats have found it hard to get a budget that conservatives can support while their liberals can still stay on board. So have we. It is not easy to write a budget with a deficit of only $144 billion. And look at how we talk around here—only $144 billion.

To cover up this stalemate, the leadership on the other side has decided to put the President's budget on the stump and we are to vote. That is fine. We will vote.

We will say some good about the President's budget and we will say where we differ because unlike you, we have always determined on our side of the aisle that we want to make changes, that we do not accept in toto what comes from an administration, that we are not mere robots, but independent individuals constrained only by the Constitution in our efforts to come up with our own budget, and we are ready. We do not believe that the debate of House Concurrent Resolution 296 is either serious or credible, and that is obvious.

The only Budget Committee activity that has occurred so far this year has been a series of field hearings to criticize the President's budget; then a week of hearings in DC, to hear the administration witnesses, a rather normal part of the process. But the committee has not scheduled a meeting to consider the President's budget nor to examine any possibility for amending it in any constructive way.

The Budget Committee has not scheduled any meetings, we have not scheduled a markup. There have not even yet occurred the group discussions so necessary to final solution.

In short, the Budget Committee thus far has taken no actions that would lead to a congressional budget resolution.

So perhaps indeed they do want to do one totally on their own and without Republican help. Perhaps there is a Democratic budget floating around somewhere and that the majority leadership has a budget strategy.

I am told that the answer is yes and I have a copy today of what the majority has come up with so far for the Democratic majority's budget resolution, and I bring it to you, House concurrent resolution nothing. Notice its sublety. Notice the difficult choices that the Democrats have made.

This budget is useless because together we must work to come up with one and not waste the time we are here this afternoon.

Could I at least ask that we do not spend 4 hours in President-bashing, that actually some of our Members on both sides might have preferred a shorter rule. Indeed, on our side, we recommended such a rule that would have a more limited amount of time. But I suppose that the partisan excesses that we are indulging in are necessary, and I can only hope that they do not spoil the chances for that fine art of political compromise.

I will still hold out the hope that the Democrats will be willing at some point in the future to begin working with Republicans on a congressional budget resolution. The chances for such a House summit on the budget or even normal budget negotiations must begin and should begin this afternoon, not later.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. FROST] has 11 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] has 2 minutes remaining.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to again urge my colleagues to vote "no" on the previous question.

I yield that balance of our time, 2 minutes, to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL].

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, this has been a day of great amusement for all of us. The same fun-loving folks who have loused up the budget since 1975 have brought us something else that we can find fun and merriment over today.

This is the crowd whose budgets have understated the deficits for 12 straight years, who have given us $200 billion deficits for the last 5 or 6 years, and they are now carrying out their obligations to bring the President's budget before us. My understanding of the congressional obligation may be a little old-fashioned, but I thought we were supposed to bring out our budget. It is probably a silly notion I had that nobody should take very seriously.

But here is a Budget Committee that does not have a budget of its own, which has not met for several weeks at all, which has never met for a markup on the budget. It is a Budget Committee that has not adopted the CBO assumption. It has not even said what it is going to use for a baseline.

But the chairman of that committee, which does not meet, we are told, although we are told the Democrats meet sometimes together, is coming before us and saying we should now vote on the President's budget. That is fine with us. We will vote on anything the gentleman would like to vote on.

We do think, however, in the serious nature of the deficit crisis we are in that the committee owes us a budget. I have already introduced a budget. I do not think the House will ever get a chance to vote on that, but the committe is bringing us a budget which it really should not do under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings restrictions, because it does not fit the CBO characteristics for a budget that this House can pass.

Now as long as that is the case, we on this side have the right to say where is the Democrat budget? What is the House Budget Committee doing? Why are we not given the real budget? Why are we given the fun and the games and the amusement, the Barnum & Bailey show, the carnival? One of our Members called it a charade. I guess you can call it whatever you want, but we know it is not leading us to a budget.

We want the Democrat budget so that we can work on it. I do not care how many times we vote on budgets, I will be delighted to do it. But the most fun is going to be voting on the Budget Committee's budget, because I know very well what my vote will be on that one.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY], chairman of the Budget Committee.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the rule allowing for consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 296, the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1987.

This budget reflects the budget for the U.S. Government for fiscal year 1987 as submitted by the President on February 5, 1986. Of course, as anyone who knows the legislative process understands, if it is adopted then the wording on the bill is absolutely correct, it then becomes the congressional budget.

It is my feeling that Members of the House should be given the opportunity to express their opinions of support or opposition toward the President's budget. At the same time, I think it is important to provide the President the opportunity to have his budget considered as it was introduced.

Last week the Senate Budget Committee considered the President's budget and voted against its adoption. In considering the President's budget, the Senate Budget Committee was able to gain some idea of the level of support for that plan and use that experience in setting out to formulate an alternative. Then after the vote, they started to work on an alternative and they are still working. They did not have an alternative when they voted on the President's budget. They voted and they are now working, and I propose the same thing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would ask that Members not refer to any specific vote in the other body.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. The other body has acted and, therefore, I am proposing that we follow the practice of the other body, which is that we will have an opportunity to act on the President's budget, and then we will proceed to develop an alternative if the President's budget is defeated.

I find it interesting that all of my colleagues from the other side are assuming the President's budget is going to be defeated. I do not know that. Today we will find out. If it is defeated, then we will need an alternative and we are prepared to work on one.

Let me just simply say to my colleagues from the other side, the Budget Committee has been meeting. We have had not only field hearings, but as those of you in America have observed on television, we have had the Cabinet members come before us. We have had weeks upon weeks of hearings. I suppose the reason why my colleagues have forgotten is because many of them did not attend either the field hearings or the hearings here in the Capitol. You remember, they were boycotting the hearings and now they say we will not talk or work with them.

Be that as it may, we are prepared, should this body defeat the President's budget, to move forward, to develop an alternative. I have already asked the ranking member of the committee if she would meet with me at the beginning of next week to outline a bipartisan consensus. We think this is a correct procedure. The President has asked for an opportunity for Congress to consider his budget and we are providing that opportunity for a vote on his proposal.

Each Member, whether they think it is a rotten egg or whether they think it is Ringling Brothers and Barnum & Bailey, or whether they think it is not serious, or whether they think it is the right way to go, will have an opportunity to vote. That is exactly what Members are sent here to do. We are asked to show the American public where we stand on issues, and there is no issue more important than the budget of this great Nation.

We have an opportunity today, Mr. Speaker and colleagues, to show the American people where we stand. Do we support the President's budget or do we not? If we do not, then this Chair, and I hope my colleagues on the other side, are prepared to move to develop an alternative.

We do not need an alternative if the President's budget should pass. I would urge all of us to vote for this rule.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 243, nays 171, not voting 20, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Chappell for, with Mr. Taylor against.

Mr. Huckaby for, with Mr. Rudd against.

Mrs. Collins for, with Mr. Campbell against.

So the resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on House Concurrent Resolution 296 be limited to 3 hours, and that the time be equally divided between the chairman of the Committee on the Budget and the acting ranking minority member.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I will not object—the gentlewoman from Illinois, the acting ranking minority member of the Committee on the Budget, is requesting that we limit debate to 3 hours instead of 4 hours; is that correct?

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. If the gentleman will yield, that is correct.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. And the time will be equally divided?

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. If the gentleman will yield, that is also correct.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 397 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the concurrent resolution, House Concurrent Resolution 296.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a point of order against consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 296.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order, please.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, this resolution proposes a congressional budget for the U.S. Government for fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989. It fails to comply with section 306 of the Congressional Budget Act.

Section 306 of the Congressional Budget Act is very clear. It says:

No bill or resolution, and no amendment to any bill or resolution, dealing with any matter which is within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Budget or either House shall be considered in that House unless it is a bill or resolution which has been reported by the Committee on the Budget of that House (or from the consideration of which such committee has been discharged) or unless it is an amendment to such a bill or resolution.

Now, Mr. Speaker, section 308 was reaffirmed last year in the debt limit bill, the balanced budget, and Emergency Deficit Control Act. It is on our books as Public Law 99-177.

House Concurrent Resolution 296 clearly is legislation dealing with the congressional budget that must be handled by the Budget Committee. Since the committee has neither reported or been discharged from consideration of the resolution, bringing the resolution to the floor violates section 306.

The rule reported by the Rules Committee makes in order the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 296, but it does not waive any point of order against the resolution for failing to comply with section 306.

Now, Mr. Speaker, some might argue that by adoption of the rule we have somehow waived section 306.

Let me refer this body and the Chair to the resolution itself and the rule that we just passed. It is very clear that there is no waiver within that resolution to section 306 of the Budget Act.

To hold contrary, to hold somehow that this rule does something that it does not say, is a clear violation of the rules of this House, and I would ask that my point of order be upheld.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KILDEE). Does any other Member wish to speak on the point of order? If not, the Chair will rule.

The Chair, first of all, will reread for the House section 306. The section reads:

"SEC. 306. No bill or resolution, and no amendment to any bill or resolution, dealing with any matter which is within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Budget of either House shall be considered in that House unless it is a bill or resolution which has been reported by the Committee on the Budget of that House (or from the consideration of which such committee has been discharged) or unless it is an amendment to such a bill or resolution.

The rule just adopted does discharge the Committee on the Budget. It has that inevitable effect under the precedents. The rule needs no waiver of section 306 because this procedure is in compliance with section 306 and within the authority of the Committee on Rules.

The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whose House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 296) setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989, with Mr. NATCHER in the Chair.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the concurrent resolution is dispensed with.

Pursuant to the order of the House of today, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] will be recognized for 1½ hours, and the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN] will be recognized for 1½ hours.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BIAGGI was allowed to speak out of order.)

MEMBERS INVITED TO COSPONSOR BILL DESIGNATING JOSEPH P. ADDABBO FEDERAL BUILDING IN JAMAICA, QUEENS

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, I plan to introduce a bill which would designate the Federal building located in Jamaica, Queens, as the Joseph P. Addabbo Federal Building. We all know that Mr. ADDABBO is grievously ill. I would like to do this while he is still alive. All of those who desire to cosponsor the bill, please let my office know.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, this afternoon we will debate and vote on the President's budget for fiscal year 1987. This is an important debate and an important vote. Today we will help to set the course our Government and our country will take over the coming year.

The President is this country's Chief Executive Officer and, by law is required to submit a budget each year for the U.S. Government. Some Members of the House have made statements to the effect that bringing the President's budget to the floor of the House is meant to embarrass the President. I strongly disagree. The President deserves to have his budget debated and acted on by the Congress. Equally important, the American people deserve to know where their elected Representatives stand on the President's budget and priorities. The President has urged the Congress to approve his budget. How do we embarrass the President by giving him his day in court?

I have said this debate is important, and I truly believe that it is. The President's budget is more than just columns of numbers. The President's budget is the President's blueprint for our Nation. In examining this plan, we are representing 241 million people who cannot be present for this debate.

We should remember that we are here to debate priorities, not personalities. The President is a very personable person, but we are here to debate not his character but his policies. We are much like the loan officer in the bank considering a business loan application. The bank does not give the loan because the businessman is charming and has a good sense of humor; the banker gives the loan because the businessman's ideas are sound. Substance is more important than appearance here.

Let us today debate the substance of the President's budget. Are we to follow the President along the fiscal path he has suggested? Speaking as one Representative, I cannot.

The President is asking us to continue to provide major increases for the Pentagon after Congress has already provided over $1.2 trillion over the past 5 years. Over the next 6 years, the President has requested $2.1 trillion. Given the deficits that we face, I do not think the country can afford that level of spending, particularly when we are not convinced that the money that has already been spent has been spent wisely. The American people should not be asked to provide vast new amounts to the Pentagon until they are convinced the money is being spent wisely and prudently.

While defense spending continues to be full-speed ahead, with an increase of $34 billion requested for next year, vital domestic programs of our Government receive little or no attention. I think this policy is shortsighted. We cannot ignore the needs of our young if we are going to be strong in the years ahead. We have become a great nation because we have been blessed with abundant resources and industrious people. We will not remain a great nation if we squander our resources and ignore our people.

I think the President's budget is out of balance, and I will not vote for it. My impression is that the majority of Americans, if they could be here today, would not vote for it.

I think they agree with the President that our deficits must be reduced. And so does this Member of Congress. However, we are debating the choices that we make in reducing those deficits.

The process, however, will not end today. We have to have a budget. If the President's budget is not approved today, it will be up to the Congress to construct a budget that does have the support of the majority of the people. I am here to say this will be done. But I would hope that the President would work with the Congress to construct a workable budget that can be approved and not simply walk away from the process. In fact, should this budget be defeated, I hope that the President will convene a bipartisan group of both Houses of Congress to look at a way that we can address collectively this issue of deficit reduction with equity and compassion. These enormous deficits must be reduced in a way which protects our national interests but yet continues vital programs for our people. Congress cannot do the job alone.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], the Republican leader.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, may I thank the gentlewoman for yielding this early in the debate to her fellow compatriot from her home State.

Mr. Chairman, may I simply say that I am going to be very brief, because I consider all these shenanigans this afternoon to be a waste of time.

What electricity really fills the air? Where is the excitement, the apprehension? Are they all awaiting how the vote is going to turn out on this thing, hanging on the ends of their chairs? We are talking up the President's budget today, folks, is this a day of excitement?

What a charade, what a sham.

I have been around here for 30 years now. I have never seen a President present a budget to the Congress that was not altered in some degree or fashion, no matter who he was, and when we got around to this whole business of changing things was after 1974 because of what some Members of the Congress felt was an undue stretch of power by the Executive in the impounding of funds and the thought that "Oh, we are spending so much, let's get Government spending under control, let's get the Congress in the act with a Budget Control Act."

If you look at those figures ever since we enacted that Budget Control Act, and what has happened to deficits is that they have grown and grown and grown. You have got to come, eventually, to the conclusion that the whole system has fallen apart and it has not helped one doggone bit at all.

Let us face up it, my friends. Why is the budget presented to us by the President rather unrealistic? I will tell you why. It is because we here in the Congress forced some very tight restrictions on the executive branch in presenting their budget in the first place.

A majority of the House, a majority of the Senate passed this thing called Gramm-Rudman, and it has an orderly process to get us to balance out there, hopefully, in the year 1991. By so doing, we have got to come up, within that framework, or having a deficit no larger than $144 billion.

If we are up in that $200 billion range, I cannot recall in all the time I have been around here that we have ever come from that kind of figure down to 144 within 1 year without at least causing some little wrinkle of pain and concern that this or that program has got to be cut or diminished or reduced. How do you do it? How do you get there if you do not do that?

Oh, the condemnations out there can flow from every quarter in this House, on both sides of the aisle. But you cannot lay it all on the President down there because he complied with what the Congress said he had to do in presenting his budget.

We are all at fault. I have to commend the gentlewoman from Illinois in her short dissertation on the rule, holding up a concurrent resolution signifying the lack of a budget from the majority. Nothing is so true. We on the Republican side here have been working on a budget. We are 71 votes behind, but we have been working daily, commiserating with our colleagues; this group, that group; what causes pain; what can we cut; what can be do to fashion something that will eventually fly.

I do not know what is going on over here on the Democratic majority side. My dear friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, a knowledged man of the cloth; I am reminded of biblical scripture: "Come let us reason together." Instead of going through this charade, I would suggest that maybe it is high time, with only a few weeks left now before we are supposed to produce something, that we get down to the real nitty-gritty business of picking and choosing and doing what is right.

This is all a farce today; it is a sham. I do not think there will be a nickel's worth of press play given to this coverage this afternoon, and that is about the way it should be.

Frankly, to underscore that point, I would suggest to my folks on this side, when that vote comes up, that you do not want to be against the President's budget in toto; of course not. You do not want to be altogether for it because you have got some reasons for making some adjustment.

Personally, I am voting "present." I am urging the Members on our side of the aisle: You all vote "present" too, and I think there are a good many of my friends on the Democratic side who might feel the very same way.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OBEY], the distinguished chairman of the Joint Economic Committee.

Mr. OBEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, we just heard a very interesting rewrite of history by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, the minority leader.

He told us two things: He told us, "Gee whiz, boys and girls, do not blame the President for Gramm-Rudman; do not blame him for that budget, because, after all, we made him do it."

I remember the President making it crystal clear just 90 days ago, that if Congress did not pass Gramm-Rudman, lock, stock, and barrel, he was willing to do everything including disinvest the Social Security system in order to have it pass.

I led the opposition to Gramm-Rudman; I did not see the President on my side. I saw him on the other side of the argument. He also tells us that it is a sham to consider a budget which is presented by the President of the United States. That is absolute nonsense.

We have had a lot of concern expressed by the minority leader about the fact that the budget process is not working. Let me tell you something: That is right; it is not working. Let me tell you why, and it is for quite different reasons than the reasons cited by the gentleman from Illinois.

Since 1921, the President has been at the heart of the preparation of our national budget. For over 60 years, 10 Presidents carried that responsibility. They carried it with dignity, and they carried it fairly. They carried the responsibility for taking that first step in producing a realistic budget that could be supported by the Congress.

The executive branch of Government has 95 percent of the resources in this Government available for putting together a budget. But what has happened for the last 5 years? For the last 5 years, those resources have been used to put together a Presidential budget that did not spend what it said it would spend, that did not raise the revenue and did not hit the revenue target that it promised it would hit, and that did not divide the resources in a way that a majority in either party could support. I think we will see that demonstrated here today.

There is nothing wrong with asking the Members of the President's own party to stand up and say "yes" or "no" to the budget which the White House is saying we ought to pass in an elaborate public relations campaign on television at this very moment.

Let me tell you some things about this budget. It does not meet the statutory requirement laid out for it under Gramm-Rudman, first of all, because it underestimates the cost of its own military spending by $15 billion.

Second, it is based on economic assumptions that are to be kind rosy. It estimates that this year and for the next 5 years the economy is going to grow every year at the rate of 4 percent. Let me point out that over the last 5 years, the economy has grown on average at 2.3 percent. If the economy grows over the next 5 years at the rate that it grew the last 5 years, this budget will be $30 billion short in revenue. That will mean we will run into sequestration even if we pass it.

Where will that shortfall impact? This chart demonstrates where it will impact. Since 1980, interest has inceased by 60 percent in budgets that the President has submitted. Military and foreign operations have increased by 25 percent in the budgets he submitted since 1980. But where have the cuts fallen?

The cuts have fallen in the remainder portion of the budget that has been cut from 21 percent of the budget in 1980 to 11 percent of the budget this year. What does that mean? That is the portion of the budget that invests in the future of the country. It is the portion we invest in kids by way of education; it is what we invest in workers by way of job training; it is what we invest in science by way of science research or medical research; it is what we invest in community infrastructure so our businesses can make a profit and workers can earn a decent wage.

What is happening to that section of the budget? CBO points out that in 1962 domestic discretionary programs, before we ever heard of Lyndon Johnson's Great Society took up 4.2 percent of GNP. In 1980, they had grown to 5.8 percent. Today, they are down to 4.1 percent, a smaller portion of our national treasure devoted to solving our domestic problems that we were spending before we ever heard of the Great Society. If the President's budget passes, that will take us down to 2.7 percent of our GNP by 1991—30 percent lower than it was when we decided we had a problem that needed correcting in the first place.

This budget cuts cancer research by $70 million. It cuts heart research by $60 million. It cuts AIDS research by $30 million. It cuts agriculture by $8 billion. It cuts transportation by $5 billion. It cuts educational opportunity, student loans for middle-income kids by one-quarter. And what does it do? It adds $34 billion in military spending which has doubled over 5 year's time, and it adds $2 billion to foreign aid, over which my subcommittee has jurisdiction.

What does that budget do on foreign aid? For low-interest, military loans abroad, while we are throwing them out the window back home, for low-interest, military loans abroad, the budget contains a 46-percent increase. Grant military assistance, is the giveaway stuff Republicans used to squawk about when Democratic Presidents were in the White House.

Grant military assistance under Ronald Reagan, that is the stuff we give away, has gone up 800 percent since the day he became President. This budget alone asks for a 30-percent increase this year over last year, when we are cutting back on the domestic side the way I have just described.

Mr. Chairman, a great country has to defend its interests around the world, but a great country also has to pay its bills. And a great country owes it to its own citizens to provide a square deal by providing the basic investments that we need to make human life better and to make this country stronger, not just militarily, but economically and socially as well.

If you do not do it, you have a turkey for a budget, and no matter how nice the man is who presents it, the policy in this budget is wrong. It is wrong for the country. It is wrong for our future. It is wrong for the people we represent and I urge you to vote it down.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I might consume.

I just wanted to say on behalf of the chairman of the committee and myself how glad we were, if I may take a personal note in the midst of this partisanship, how glad both Chairman GRAY and I were to see the true ranking minority member back today and voting, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. DEL LATTA. He is not on the floor right now, but on behalf of all of us, I just wanted to say that welcome.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Indeed, I will.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I certainly would like to join the gentlewoman in welcoming back our colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LATTA], who has normally been our ranking member on the Budget Committee for so many years, representing the minority side so ably and we are just glad to see him back after serious illness and surgery. We pray for his speedy recovery and welcome him back and, of course, he has been ably represented by the gentlewoman from Illinois.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. I thank the chairman for that small personal tribute. I know the chairman and I share that.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOULTER].

Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Now to continue somewhat with I suppose the partisan rehetoric, in spite of my chairman's explanation as to why we are voting on the President's budget today, I do still wonder about that. I wonder why we are voting on the President's budget when we have a Budget Committee that has not yet had any meeting, not one meeting all year to actually work on any budget document and to start the budget process.

I wonder if it has something to do with the desire to defer any serious budgetary process until automatic sequestration takes place in October.

We all know that the President's budget is supposed to be a staring point and that the President has come forward with his budget and now the ball is in Congress' court. We know that we are supposed to be responsible for coming up with a budget that meets the Gramm-Rudman deficit target for fiscal year 1987 of $144 billion.

We should be marking up the President's budget or marking up a document that has been produced by the Democrat majority of this House, not simply holding up the President to ridicule in this House.

Obviously, there is the usual political posturing that has to be done. The Reagan budget must get its annual lashing from partisans whose philosophy of Government is nothing more than the sum of constituency group demands that they can identify; but this year there is a new wrinkle in the gamemanship and it is Gramm-Rudman and the threat of sequestration.

Notwithstanding what my chairman said about his desire to produce a budget and not doubting for a moment the sincerity of his personal remarks on that, I do not think I am going too far to say that there are many Members of this body, mostly on the Democrat side of the aisle, who not only would be perfectly content to see, but would wish to see automatic sequestration take place in October, putting the President and his political party to embarrassment as a means to getting a tax increase so that you will not have to fundamentally change your spending habits in any way.

Before March 1, I introduced a resolution which would have avoided automatic sequestration and was told there was no time to do it before the March 1 cuts, and yet we went on a week of recess. We came back and I think the first week we were back we had but one vote, one vote only, and yet we are told there is no time.

Here we go again, no Budget Committee meetings to produce a budget.

It is just time that we began getting down to serious business and start putting together the budget. Under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law, Congress must complete action on the budget resolution for fiscal year 1987 by April 15. Does anyone think that is going to happen if theatrics such as today's so-called vote continue? I do not.

Let us put aside the posturing and get down to the business of putting together a budget.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROEMER].

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague for yielding.

I would like to respond to my good friend, the minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] when he said, "Don't look at the President's budget too closely. Gramm-Rudman messed it up."

Well, it was not Gramm-Rudman that caused the President and his budget to add $34 billion in additional spending to the military to continue unabated a long-term buildup. It was not Gramm-Rudman that caused the President to set the following priorities, to increase foreign aid and decrease health care for Americans.

It was not Gramm-Rudman that caused the President to set the priority of reducing aid to public education while pulling in $2 billion in tuition tax credit.

You cannot blame that on Gramm-Rudman. You blame that on the President's priorities. That is why we need this vote today for the President to hear what we have got to say about his priorities.

I judge this budget simply. I judge it in the highest terms.

Abraham Lincoln when he was a Member of this body said, "Do you know what the difference between the American dream and the dream of everybody else in the world is? It's easy. Everybody else in the world dreams of coming to America."

That is what the President's budget is about. It is about America.

I do not like his priorities and that is what we are going to vote on today. We are going to vote about America.

That is why the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] is wrong. Good man though he is, he is wrong when he asks anybody in this House to be present, but to be uninvolved. He says, "Don't vote yes or no. Vote present."

Bad advice, bad dream, bad budget. We ought to make the President hear us today.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BROWN], a member of the committee.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman and express my appreciation for the time to address this bill.

Let me suggest to the Members gathered here that this exercise this afternoon is a slap in the face for the budget process and a slap in the face of I think the reputation of this institution.

Let us be honest. This budget does not meet the Gramm-Rudman target. That is not my statement. That is the statement from your own folks. This budget does not meet the $144 billion deficit and the Democratic leadership has so indicated.

The Congressional Budget Office with more updated figures has remarked it and shows it as $16 billion over the budget.

The Gramm-Rudman budget axe clearly indicates that it is out of order to bring a budget to the floor that does not meet the $144 billion target.

Our very rules call for it. It is a fundamental tenet of trying to get our budget deficit under control to say that we are not going to consider a budget that is not under $144 billion in deficit.

The simple fact is this is brought up, it is a political game. It is a slap in the face at the integrity of the process that we have tried to adopt to bring this under control.

I have great respect for the gentleman from Louisiana who just spoke. He talked about foreign aid and defense.

Let me share with this body what the reality is. I voted against the defense authorization and appropriation bill since I have been in this body. I believe there is one authorization, but every defense appropriation bill I voted against; but let me tell you how they pass it, because they passed it. There is not a cent that has been spent in the last 5 years for defense in this country that was not approved by this body.

And do you know who passed it? Both Democrats and Republicans, and if you want to check the RECORD, the majority of Democrats voted for those defense appropriation bills.

To stand up and point the finger at the President for the spending that the majority of Democrats in this Chamber voted for is ludicrous and every Member in this Chamber knows it.

On the foreign aid bill, I have not voted for foreign aid, but I can tell you, the majority of this Chamber has. To blame the President for the explosion in foreign aid spending may sound like good rhetoric, but it overlooks the fact that the majority of the Members of this Chamber have been the ones who pushed that foreign aid forward.

Now, let us be honest. What this involves is a cute political trick. It is business as usual where we forgo what is good for the country and play games. Is there anyone here who does not believe that?

The reality is we need a new approach. What we are dealing with is more important than the Democratic Party or the Republican Party. It is the future of our country and anybody who does not believe this budget is not out of control is simply not keeping their eyes open.

What can we cut? Can we possibly make the budget fit? We have a honey program that takes American production of honey and puts it in warehouses while we import the product that is sold in this country.

For heaven's sake, if you cannot eliminate a silly program like that, what can you do?

But we do not vote on that today. The democratically controlled Rules Committee would not permit amendments.

We have got a land program that puts land into production, at the same time we have a program that takes land out of production, but we cannot vote on that today because the Democratic Rules Committee would not allow that to be offered.

We have 1,200 guards on Capital Hill to guard our offices up here. We have as many guards as we have people on the U.S. Mexican Border Patrol, but we cannot vote on that today because the Democratic Rules Committee would not allow it to be considered.

This process is an insult to the American people. Let us dispose of this, go back to the committee and draft a bill. Let us not anymore consider a process that avoids the problem and avoids solutions. Let us go forward with a process that allows a vote in the committee and a vote on this floor on the issues before this country. Let us be strong enough to face the issues and vote on them. Let us solve the problems, not turn our backs on the needs of the American people.

This process is a game. It is a game where all Americans loose.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has introduced a budget committee of his own, with some illustrious help?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. With a number of my colleagues, I have introduced a budget.

Mr. FRENZEL. The gentleman did not have any trouble putting it together, the trouble with making the choices, is that correct?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. The very difficult choices, but the budget itself reaches the $144 billion figure with properly adjusted CBO figures and it does it without major tax increases.

Mr. FRENZEL. I am kind of surprised that the gentleman as a private member and I using our own staffs and a few other members were able to complete a budget.

It surprises me that the Budget Committee with the vast resources of a hundred or more staff people and an expense of several millions of dollars, the vast resources of the Congressional Budget Office, whose expense are even more, which has hundreds of underemployed economists working night and day in windowless cells that whole aglomeration has been able to come up with nothing other than the President's budget.

We do not have a budget from the Budget Committee or from the Democrats. What does the gentleman suppose is inhibiting them?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. I am glad they are here today and will perhaps speak for themselves. I think it is important they address that, but I must tell the gentleman, I think it is a failure to deal with the issues and an unwillingness to come forth with a budget of their own.

Mr. FRENZEL. Well, if the gentleman will yield further, I think this is important. As I understand it, the Budget Committee has not met recently and the Democrats are meeting in some kind of caucus action and moving around.

I really think that taking the time of the House with this adventure is mischievous. I believe the President's budget should be considered if he wants it, or they want to consider it, when they present their budget, when we get a chance to present our budget and when other Members of the House or other significant Members of the House present their budgets. They can be considered one against the other, but to bring this budget up here in a separate sequence, it seems to me simply reveals the committee is not getting its job done.

It is willing to spend a day in caucus, a day in the Committee on Rules, a full day on the floor, instead of doing the job that it is his obligation to do under the rules of the House.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. I believe the gentleman has stated the situation correctly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BROWN] has again expired.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I will yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, is it not true that the gentleman went to the Committee on Rules yesterday and withdrew his request to make in order an amendment so he could produce his own budget today on the floor? He did not ask the Committee on Rules for an amendment so that he could produce it as a part of the voting process and debate it?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. I am not sure the chairman had an opportunity to stay for our presentation. We brought a fully prepared, ready-to-go budget, along with the appropriate amendment and the appropriate papers.

Our purpose was to offer it as a substitute for the Democratic budget and, unfortunately, as the gentleman knows, there was no Democratic budget to offer it as a substitute for.

So we did not refuse to withdraw it or offer it. We went to offer it as a substitute for the Democratic budget.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I want to thank the gentleman.

In other words, you have a budget but you wanted to offer it as a substitute for a Democratic budget as opposed to a substitute for the President's budget. That is correct, what the gentleman said?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. The gentleman is exactly right and, of course, he understands that the budget that we are referring to is the budget that properly comes out of the Committee on the Budget, as our rules call for.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RUSSO], a member of the Committee on the Budget.

Mr. RUSSO. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, Benjamin Franklin once said, "If a man empties his purse into his head, no man can take it away from him. An investment in knowledge always pays the best interest." Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman the President has chosen to pour our purse as follows: $34 billion more in budget authority into the Pentagon and $3 billion more in budget authority into foreign aid—that's his priority. I'd like to talk about the President's budget for education because it reveals a tragic shortsightedness about the real sources of our national strength.

In the simplest terms, the President's education proposals threaten our economic vitality, our national security, and our children's future. A growing economy, a healthy society, and a strong defense depend on an educated and knowledgable citizenry. It is knowledge that our machines, develops our ideas, manages our business, and places America in the forefront of scientific advance.

The President refuses to recognize that our citizens want an adequately funded system of education. Polls indicate that 70 percent of all Americans want education funding to be increased or stay the same. In contrast, 56 percent do not want an increase in military spending.

Our citizens realize that education is the real source of growth and productivity. However, the President ignores the pulbic's wishes. His blueprint for American greatness, instead, cuts education funding from $18.4 billion in fiscal 1986 to $15.2 billion in fiscal year 1987. Fewer young adults will-have the opportunity to go to college—fewer people will confront the mysteries of science—fewer people will be qualified to run the sophisticated computer systems our society relies on—fewer young Americans will master the intricacies of the business world—fewer people will discover cures for the illnesses which plauge our society—fewer Americans will learn the skills to represent this great country in international athletic competition—fewer students will be inspired to teach future generations the secrets of our modern life—fewer handicapped and disadvantaged children will receive the special attention they need to realize their potential. The President has presented us with a blueprint, all right, a blueprint for a home with closed doors and broken windows.

The President has chosen to force-feed the Pentagon at the expense of education. Cutting education, is like fighting a war with plenty of guns and no ammunition. Yet the President continues to super inflate the defense budget. A recent GAO study of the 1986 Defense Department budget recently discovered an inflation windfall from 1982 to 1986 of over $40 billion. In the last few months of 1986 alone the over estimation for inflation reached $7.5 billion This $7.5 billion, which is currently gathering dust in the Pentagon, equals almost one-half of the education budget. Wouldn't the education of our children be a better use of this money?

We must understand that education is as important as defense. We all know this is true. And yet this administration continues to propose a broad array of cuts which are truly astonishing in their magnitude. In 1980, the Federal Government provided only 9.2 percent of education spending: In 1985, this dropped to only 6.2 percent. This has amounted to a real decline of 15 percent. One out of seven young adults fails to finish high school and one-fourth to one-half of these dropouts are currently unemployed. The cuts in students financial assistance would result in 1.4 million students being dropped from the rolls. The cuts in Pell grants alone would cause almost 300,000 students to lose their awards while cutting the grants of another 500,000 young Americans.

Is this what America stands for? America has always been the land of promise and opportunity. Is this becoming a thing of the past? A better future, filled with every opportunity, is something that all parents want for their sons and daughters. And education is the way to achieve this goal.

It is wrong for this administration to deny young adults the possibility of a better future—it is wrong for this administration to impose an excessive burden of debt on those seeking self-improvement—it is wrong to waste the potential of our own children—it is wrong to develop weapons systems rather then minds—it is wrong to adopt funding policies that hasten the day when a quality education is available for only the wealthy—it is wrong to ignore the threat of ignorance—I hope that my colleagues will recognize this basic inequity and vote down President Reagan's blueprint for the future which denies a brighter future to many young Americans.

Rev. John Richardson, president of DePaul University, my alma mater, recently stated: "Students are the most important resource this country has. Our future depends more on these people than on all of the armaments we can amass." I ask my colleagues to heed this wisdom and reject the Reagan administration's budget.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSO. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard this consideration of the President's budget today called mischievous, and referred to as a charade and President-bashing. I think all of that is nonsense.

I think, as the chairman of our committee has said, the President's budget is a roadmap to get to the future of which President Reagan so eloquently speaks. It contains his solutions.

The American people know that there is too much illiteracy in America. What is the solution in this budget? The President eliminates funding for the Nation's libraries.

The American people know there is too much jobless among America's youth. What is the President's solution in this budget? He eliminates 379,000 young Americans from jobs next summer.

The American people understand that college tuition costs are rising at record rates. What is the President's solution? He takes 250,000 college-bound youngsters off of eligibility for loans next year.

The American people know that immigration in America is a problem. What is the President's solution? He eliminates education for America's immigrants.

The American people and President Reagan know that the basic reading, writing, and arithmetic is a problem in this country. What does the President do? He eliminates $8 million for chapter I, the program that teaches moderate-income children reading, writing, and arithmetic.

And the worst of it is, what does the President do with the money? He gives it to "Cap" Weinberger at the Pentagon.

We indeed should be talking about these solutions and this President's roadmap.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PORTER].

Mr. PORTER. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I want to express first my profound respect and admiration for the chairman of the Committee on the Budget. He is truly, in many ways, an amazing man.

Yesterday he went before the Committee on Rules not as chairman of the Committee on the Budget, but personally, and asked for this rule and the consideration of this resolution, and then the rule came out taking jurisdiction away from his own committee. So this is a man of great power who can personally take jurisdiction away from his own committee by a rule that, if it did not exist, would create a resolution that is terribly out of order, and I have to admire the smart lawyers who put the answer to the House on the point of order of my colleague, the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. Chairman, I am also amazed that the chairman of the Committee on the Budget has time to be here, and time yesterday to be before the Committee on Rules, because it seems to me we are using up valuable time in this political exercise that is very, very much needed in getting a budget resolution that can be passed by the House of Representatives and the Senate, too, before these bodies.

Before Gramm-Rudman, the date for having the resolution out on the floor was April 1. There has been no markup scheduled by the chairman of the Committee on the Budget, as I understand it, and here we are with the clock ticking, valuable time being lost playing these kinds of games.

I have to ask the chairman, where is his budget? The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL], the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BROWN], and I offered our version of what a responsible budget ought to be, a freeze on outlays in almost every function, and yet ours meets Gramm-Rudman without a tax increase. Our staff worked on it for some months. It is time, Mr. Chairman, that we see your budget.

No one, I think, believes that the House of Representatives will be in actual session with votes on March 24 and 25. After that we are scheduled to recess for the Easter holiday. So as I read the schedule, Mr. Chairman, you have next week in which to bring a budget resolution before the House or fail to meet the deadline that we provided by law less than 6 months ago.

Mr. Chairman, I do not knock giving people the opportunity to criticize the President's priorities. I do not agree with every one of them myself. But it seems to me that it is time we had a commitment from the chairman of the Committee on the Budget that he will, in fact, have a budget on the floor for us to consider next week, that we will have a chance to vote on it, that we will have a chance to offer, as a substitute for it, the budget that we put together ourselves.

So let me ask you, Mr. Chairman: Can you give us an assurance that you will have a resolution?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, let me point out, because it has been mistakenly stated here on at least two occasions today, that according to Gramm-Rudman there is a requirement that by April 1 there must be a budget passed by the House.

I would think if you would read the Gramm-Rudman Act, you will find that that is not true. The April 1 deadline that you are talking about applies to the Senate, I believe, and there is no April 1 deadline for the House. It is April 15.

So I would just say to the gentleman I have a little bit more than next week.

Mr. PORTER. Let me respond to the gentleman and say that the April 15 deadline is for a budget resolution to pass into law, so if you do not have one out by next week, it seems to me that there will be very little opportunity to conference with the other body on a budget resolution and get the job done. I simply say to the gentleman it is fine to vote on the President's budget resolution; let us do it. But let us see what you have to offer. We would like to get on with this process and meet the deadline.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. DOWNEY], a senior member of the Budget Committee.

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Chairman, our Republican colleagues are embarrassed by this exercise. They are embarrassed because the President's budget is an embarrassment. The most shameful of which happens to be the money that the President asks us to spend on defense. That is why the President's budget is in such terrible shape.

If you take a look at what we have spent during the Reagan years, we have spent over $1 trillion on defense. Yet the President continues to insist that we are behind the Soviet Union in military power. Indeed, a House Armed Services Committee report has suggested to us that this trillion dollars has not really bought us very much.

What is the President's response to this? Is there a wholesale examination of how we do our defense business? Well, there is a look at it, but what there really is, in a defense is more of the same.

In 1980, we spent about $140 billion on defense. Last year that amount was nearly doubled, it was $268 billion that we spent on defense. The President wants to spend $34 billion more on defense this year, a 12-percent increase, when every other aspect of the budget, save foreign aid, goes down.

What does this President suggest? He tells us that if you spend more for defense, you will be stronger and, in fact, we are marginally stronger, but not that much stronger. Not $1 trillion stronger.

But when you take a look at the other side of the coin on education, and the President says, oh, but if you spend more on education, you will be stupider, if you spend more on health, you will be sicker, if you spend more on training programs, you will increase unemployment. This is a world turned upside down. The American people will not accept this budget and neither should we. The party of Lincoln and Teddy Roosevelt in this House is going to walk away from their leader as well they should. But I pray that they don't vote "present." We are elected to take positions not avoid them.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. NIELSON].

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Mr. Chairman, an old farmer was asked how his wife was, and he answered, "Compared with what?"

I think that is the problem today. We are asked to evaluate the President's budget without looking at alternatives.

In previous budget years, both in 1984 and 1985, we had a series of budgets. The President's budget was presented, we had a Democratic substitute, we had a 92 Group substitute, we had a 21-percent solution from the conservative wing of the Democratic Party, we had a Darnemeyer proposal, we had a Black Caucus budget, and we had a regular minority budget. We had a whole retinue of things to look at, and comparing all of those budgets, we were able to make decisions.

I voted against the President's budget last time because it was not my set of priorities, but how is it to be compared right now? I have no choice. I will simply vote "present" because there is no alternative presented.

I agree with some things that have been said. I do not agree with the President's priorities in everything. I have been a supporter for a long time of both the handicapped and vocational programs. In fact, the original program to help the handicapped receive a free education was provided by a bill I sponsored in the Utah State Legislature. I am proud of that, and the principle was later made into public law on the Federal level.

I would like to say also that we do have a deadline coming up on the 15th of April. You can argue the 1st or the 15th of April, but the fact is we are out of session between the 26th of March and the 7th of April, and that does not leave very much time to consider any of the sets of alternatives at all.

I am dismayed that the Budget Committee has not met on a bipartisan basis. I know that Budget Committee members have met in little groups to some extent, but the committee has not really put anything together. It would appear to me that this would be the appropriate thing to do in connection with other budgets.

I do not support the 12-percent increase in the military. I think that along with the other agencies defense should share the pain. I voted with the 92d Group budget and the Republican alternative last year. I voted with the conservative Democrats in 1984. I vote for those budgets which are responsible, and I will do so again. I think there are many on this side as well as the other side of the aisle who want to look at all of the alternatives.

The previous speaker said that the budget the President presented is an embarrassment. It has to come down to a $144 billion deficit. I suggest and I predict that any budget that comes before this Congress that has to come to $144 billion deficit will be an embarrassment because it will have to cut a great many programs. The pain will have to be shared in a great many areas. We will have to make difficult choices, and it will be such that no one will accept any budget with any great enthusiasm.

I am waiting to see whether the budget produced by the Budget Committee might also be an embarrassment.

I am also concerned about the fact that when we first came here in 1983-84, we could not wait to pass 20- and 30-percent increases to make up for the so-called lost time of 1981-82. Last year we sobered up a bit and we were more responsible. The realities are with us now and we are waiting to see how we can get a budget resolution which is not an embarrassment. I am willing to look at all possibilities and to work with any group. But I think we must be responsible.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished deputy whip, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, for citizens who are watching this debate today, I suspect that they are confused. People are confused because Members of this body are talking about several different subjects, and citizens are also confused by the Federal budget. While the size and scope of the budget are complicated the purpose is simple.

The Federal budget is a statement of two goals. It is: First, a statement of fiscal policy; and second, a statement of the President's priorities for the Nation. Those are the basic purposes.

It is first a statement of fiscal policy. Since 1969 when I first became a Member of the Congress, fiscal policy stated in each President's budget has been to spend more money than anticipated to be received in tax revenues. That policy has prevailed for 16 years with exceptions in 1970 and 1971.

What we have this year is another fudge-it budget, a budget which does not do what the President says that it is supposed to do. It is a fudge-it budget just like the last 16 years of budgets.

I would note also that during 17 of the last 19 years, Presidential spending requests have exceeded the amount of spending allowed by Congress in all but 2 years.

The data for 1986 are incomplete because the year is incomplete. The data for 1987 are incomplete because the year begins on October 1, 1986.

Facts which may be useful in reviewing the table:

The data are for on- and off-budget requests, spending, and deficits;

The data in the "President's Spending Request" column reflects the request presented by the President early in the calendar year with the same date as the fiscal year, thus, do not include supplemental spending requests submitted by Presidents later in the year;

The data in the "Spending Congress Allowed" column are those reported in Budget of the U.S. Government, fiscal year 1987, submitted by President Ronald Reagan on February 5, 1986;

Fiscal years 1969 through 1976 began on July 1 of the previous calendar year, that is, fiscal year 1969 began on July 1, 1968;

Fiscal years 1977 through 1987 began, or will begin, on October 1 of the previous calendar year, that is, fiscal year 1977 began on October 1, 1976;

On March 10, 1981, President Reagan modified the fiscal 1981 presidential spending request and his modified number is shown; and,

Economic conditions affect Federal spending.

During the 19 years covered by the table, the President has been, or will be a Republican in 15 years; and, a Democrat in 4 years.

During the same period, the majority party has been—Democrat in the House of Representatives for 18 years; Democrat in the Senate for 12 years—1969-1980; and, Republican in the Senate for 6 years—1981-1986.

General elections in November 1986, will determine the majority party in the House and the Senate in 1987.

Congress has allowed more to be spent than requested by Presidents only 2 of the last 19 years. Check the data. Let the numbers do the talking.

Since Congress allows less spending than Presidents request, why do budget deficits occur?

The bottom line answer to this question is that Presidents regularly propose that the Federal budget operate at a deficit—that Federal spending be greater than Federal revenues.

For instance, on March 10, 1981, President Reagan, in a budget message to the Congress estimated that total Federal revenues for fiscal 1981 would be $600.2 billion and requested that Federal spending be $678.8 billion. Congress allowed spending to be $678.2 billion, or $600 million less than the President requested.

The table below shows the revenue, outlay, and deficit totals President Ronald Reagan proposed for fiscal years 1981-87, and the actual revenue, spending, and deficit data.

Therefore, I reject the President's budget on the basis that it is not sound fiscal policy. It has in fact added to the President's policies of creating the largest deficits in history during his last 5 years in office.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I quote:

No President, no President in the history of the United States—not Franklin Roosevelt, not Lyndon Johnson, not George Washington or Thomas Jefferson—ever demanded of Congress that we lie down submissively and give him every last detail just as his minions order it. No President has ever demanded that we allow the Office of Management and Budget to write our legislation.

Have we come to this? Has the Congress of the United States—the last repository of the people's will—come to the point that we are willing to let an appointed official in the Office of Management and Budget dictate every last scintilla, every last phrase of law, to tell us what precise provisions we may and may not pass in carrying out his mandate to reduce by $36 billion the cost of Government?

That was the distinguished majority leader, Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. WRIGHT saying things far different a couple of years ago than he said in this well today.

When the politics of the moment a couple of years ago demanded that we stand up for the integrity of the legislative process, we get statements like that. When the politics of the moment dictate that we come to the floor with this charade, well, we get the statements like we are getting on the House floor today.

The chairman said a little while ago, the chairman of the committee, my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania; said: What we are debating is choices.

We are not debating any choices out here today. There is no choice. We have the President's budget before us, and you can vote one way or the other: There is no choice. They have made no choice on the majority side about what their priorities will be. Everybody has to meet that target of $144 billion of deficit. What tough choices are going to be in their budget?

We are hearing nothing about that. We are engaged in an exercise out here of some Presidential budget-bashing or, more precisely I would say to my colleagues, some defense budget bashing. Because person after person has come to the floor here suggesting that what we want to do is slash defense.

I would suggest that if their budget, when it comes forward, is going to take it out of the hide of our fighting men and women. If what you are going to do is cut defense muscle for this country, that that is not a choice that very many of the American people are going to want to do either.

That is beginning to sound like what your budget is going to contain.

There is one other point I think we ought to recognize, too, as we go through this exercise of Presidential budget-bashing, and that is we do have a budget before us without tax increases in it. The President's budget does not require the American people to pay any more taxes. What is your budget going to do?

Are you going to require more taxes? When you went down to the Greenbriar here recently, we heard a lot of talk about tax increases. Well, my guess is that that is going to be one of the options that you would like us to consider. Already, some of your leadership has suggested that the President ought to get on board for some grand compromise of tax increases.

Well, that is not a choice that very many of my constituents would endorse.

I would also suggest that there are some things down in the present budget when you vote "No" today that you may want to consider that your "No" vote is a little bit questionable.

For example, we in Pennsylvania have to pay the full amount of our utility bills. We've got to pay the full price for electricity in Pennsylvania, and there are places in the West that we are subsidizing.

The President's budget suggests that maybe we ought not subsidize utility bills in other parts of the country. And maybe, like in Pennsylvania, people ought to pay the full cost of utility bills? Well, when you vote for this, or against the President's budget, you are voting to say that we in Pennsylvania ought to pay the full price of utilities, but other people should not have to do that.

Well, you know, I would guess that maybe somebody might want to raise that as a political question since this is a political exercise, anyhow.

It is obvious, it seems to me also, as we hear people talking here about spending more, more, more, in all these various areas, that what their choice is really is for bigger deficits as well, and we know from last year's budget process, the budget that we produced here last year, that is what we got.

You know, we were told we were going to get $56.2 billion of budget savings. You know what we ended up with? According to CBO, this agency that we hear quoted all the time, we have ended up getting $4 billion of deficit reduction out of last year's budget.

The budget that we produced that many of us said was smoke and mirrors last year has given us $4 billion in deficit reduction, not the $56.2 billion that we were supposed to get; and how did we get the $4 billion? Well, because of Gramm-Rudman.

We hear Gramm-Rudman criticized out here all the time, but the fact is that only because of Gramm-Rudman did we get any deficit reduction at all, if it had not been for Gramm-Rudman, the budget that we produced in this House last year would have given us $8 billion more of deficit, not $56 billion less of deficit.

We are concerned about that kind of priority, and I would say that we ought to have a real choice out here, not the kind of thing that is happening today.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 5 minutes.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. MACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MACK. The gentleman has mentioned the term Gramm-Rudman several times, and I guess I am mystified. I thought that one of the requirements of Gramm-Rudman was that if a budget comes to the floor of the House it has to meet a certain target; $144 billion.

During the last several weeks, Mr. Chairman, there was a hearing that indicated that the President's outlay number for defense, underestimated the outlays.

Mr. WALKER. By CBO, is my understanding.

Mr. MACK. By the Congressional Budget Office. I think that the Congressional Budget Office is one of those that is supposed to kind of look over the shoulder of Congress and determine whether we are meeting the targets.

How can we have the budget resolution come to the floor of the House, even though it is the President's, I understand, that does not meet the target—is there a game being played here?

Mr. WALKER. Well, we have a simple matter of the majority playing politics. What we had was a rule that overruled the rules of the House so that we could come out to the floor with a budget resolution that would typically be in violation of the rules of the House.

I mean, it is a neat little game: They go to a 2 to 1 Rules Committee that they stack against us, and they come up with this rule, and then the Chair rules in favor of a process which, by every measure, is a violation of Gramm-Rudman that is supposed to protect us from this kind of thing happening.

That is what happened; we have got the majority forcing their political will on the House.

Mr. MACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MACK. Is there an implication in the fact that this budget resolution has come to the floor with the outlays that the President has indicated; is that saying the President's outlay projection is correct, then?

Mr. WALKER. My guess is that we have to accept the fact that the President's figures are indeed right, and everything that we heard before was just an obfuscation for political purposes before. Because now what we have had is, we have had a ruling by the Chair of the House of Representatives, by the Speaker of the House, that in fact the budget was in order; that suggests that the President's figures are correct.

Mr. MACK. So then we do have a budget that the President has put forward that meets the target of $144 billion?

Mr. WALKER. That is the ruling of the Chair of the House of Representatives. That is correct.

Mr. MACK. And this particular proposal does not raise taxes?

Mr. WALKER. This particular proposal does not raise taxes; that is right.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Arizona, Congressman MO UDALL.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, there are many serious problems with the President's Budget. Today I want to bring to the attention of the House just a few of the serious problems that I have found with the Reagan budget in the programs that are within the jurisdiction of my committee.

The administration asks us to sacrifice programs for American Indians, Alaska Native peoples, and the peoples of the U.S. territories and commonwealths, and other American citizens so it can increase funding for its own agenda which is far out of line with the needs and priorities of all our people including those who most need help.

It is unfair to sacrifice these programs to the misguided priorities of this administration.

We who represent the people who live in the small towns, the reservations, and the islands stand with the mayors of our cities in redressing this radical attempt to imbalance our Nation's priorities.

As a people we believe that an outstanding Republican and conservationist, Teddy Roosevelt, was right to set aside unique lands for national parks, and the Congress should continue to do so.

Mr. Chairman, the committee which I chair—the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs—is the trustee for the American people when it comes to protecting their lands, their resources, and their heritage. It is, also, the trustee for people whole voices frequently go unheard—the native Americans who live on our Indian reservations and the millions of Americans who live in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, and the Northern Mariana Islands.

Now I want to address several specific problems I have with respect to Indian programs, territories and the land and water conservation fund as they are proposed to be funded in the President's budget.

Mr. Chairman, the programs of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, except for education, and the programs of the Indian Health Service are within the jurisdiction of my committee. We need only look at the President's budget request for these two agencies to see the basic unfairness of the administration's budget.

Mr. MACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UDALL. I will yield briefly to the gentleman.

Mr. MACK. I am just curious if the chairman could tell us what the figure that he recommended to the Budget Committee, as far as the expenditures for his committee would be? It would be helpful to those of us on the minority side who are trying to put a budget together, if we could know that figure.

Mr. UDALL. I will get to those later in my statement. I would be glad to work with the gentleman on getting adequate funds for Indian programs.

The basic unfairness of the administration's budget can be seen looking at the programs of Indian health service. We have a special trust responsibility for the Indian tribes and their members.

The United States has a special trust responsibility for the Indian tribes and their members. The Indian people are almost solely reliant upon the programs and services made available by these two agencies. Yet despite this special responsibility, our Indian citizens remain the most destitute and impoverished in the Nation.

Official unemployment on the reservation is about 35 percent and real unemployment ranges from 50 to 80 percent.

Nearly half of the Indian families live on incomes below the national poverty standards.

Nearly 40 percent of the Indian housing is in a substandard, unacceptable condition.

In the critical field of health care and status, Indians lag behind the rest of the Nation by almost every indicator. In the words of the recent report of OTA on Indian health, "* * * Indian health is a generation behind that of the U.S. non-Indian population * * *"

Mr. Chairman, even in this era of Gramm-Rudman and high Federal deficits, we might expect the administration to seek budget increases for these two agencies to enable the United States to meet its unique responsibility to Indian people or, at least, to maintain current program effort.

But, unhappily, I must report that this is not the case.

The President's fiscal year 1987 budget request proposed to impose a $126,000,000 cut on the Indian Health Service, a cut of nearly 16 percent. Mr. Chairman, Indian people in this country already bear an unacceptable burden because of inadequate health care. This new cut would simply impose additional human suffering on them.

For the Bureau of Indian Affairs, which provides a broad range of programs and services for Indian people, the administration is proposing a cut from fiscal year 1986 of approximately $35,000,000. With poverty a way of life on Indian reservations, this kind of cut is unacceptable to my committee. This is particularly true when the cut is taken in light of severe cuts which have been made and are proposed for the many other Federal social programs upon which Indian tribes rely for essential services.

Mr. Chairman, my committee has submitted recommendations on the various programs within its jurisdiction. Those recommendations generally provide that the BIA and IHS budgets should be maintained at the fiscal year 1986 level after the Gramm-Rudman reduction.

This is the minimum we should do. Even that is inadequate if we are to make meaningful progress toward solving serious Indian health problems, toward ending poverty on Indian reservations, and toward upgrading Indian housing.

Among the most needy and least powerful of our fellow Americans are the 3.7 million Americans of the 5 territories and commonwealths.

Their per capita incomes range to a third of the national average and their unemployment rates range to three times the national average.

Our Federal system denies the insular areas the voting influence over their future that it provides States. So, we have a trust-like responsibility to see to it that their basic needs are provided for in national decisions.

The President's budget does not pass the test on this score. It would ignore basic human needs in the insular areas.

Its most grievous violation of our responsibility to our insular Americans is its proposal to ignore the plight of the hungry in Puerto Rico. The President signed the Farm Security Act which would have increased nutrition assistance to these needy Americans just last December. But his budget would deny the increase mandated by that law.

Already Puerto Rico receives 20 to 40 percent less nutrition assistance than the States and territories participating in the Food Stamps Program. By not increasing the block grant Puerto Rico receives for its own Food Assistance Program, the President is asking us to widen that gap.

We cannot agree to worsen the discrimination created by the Reconciliation Act of 1981, especially when we began to rectify it with a law the President signed weeks before submitting his budget.

The Interior and Insular Affairs Committee's reaction to this proposal was bipartisan and virtually unanimous. We felt the same way about other elements of the President's budget regarding the insular areas.

Another important way that the President's budget fails to meet our responsibility to insular America is that it would not correct a serious injustice that even the Director of the Office of Management and Budget admits was created by Gramm-Rudman.

Throughout this century, the Federal Government has collected taxes, customs duties, and fees for Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands and transferred them to the insular governments. We are obligated to do so by the laws which establish our political relationship with the islands, some of which were adopted on a mutual agreement basis.

A basic element of our policy toward the insular areas has always been that revenues from these islands unrepresented in the decisions of how to spend Federal revenues should only be spent for the people of these islands.

Gramm-Rudman failed to make provision for this and these collections for the insular governments are being sequestered although even OMB agrees they are not really a part of the Federal budget.

We have a responsibility to correct the error and restore the amounts withheld.

The President's budget would also deny the Interior Department a portion of the money it needs to pay the Federal share of the debt of the Guam Power Authority. Since the system serves both civilian and military needs, imperiling the financial position of the utility could undermine important Federal responsibilities.

The President's proposal to substantially increase spending for essential public infrastructure in the Northern Mariana Islands is a step in the right direction. But it makes little sense in light of his proposal to decrease meeting similar needs in American Samoa and Guam.

These islands have critical needs for medical equipment and facilities needed to give their people access to the quality of health care to which every American is entitled.

The President's proposal to eliminate the small amounts being spent this year to develop the tremendous indigenous, renewable energy resources of our insular areas is penny wise and pound foolish.

Their current costly and almost total dependence on imported oil is an economic burden to the Nation as well as the islands themselves. It can be alleviated by development that is a bargain by comparison.

Our islands in the Caribbean and the Pacific are our insular borders in strategic regions of the world. They serve national interests just as we have responsibilities to them.

Hit far harder by budget cuts than any other area of the Nation, we need to meet our responsibilities better than we have and certainly better than the President proposes.

Mr. Speaker, for 5 long years now my committee, with the strong support of the Appropriations Committee and the House, has fought off the misguided efforts of the Reagan administration to gut or to misuse the land and water conservation fund. This is the sole source of Federal money not only for Federal park land acquisition, but also State and local parks, and other vital outdoor recreation and conservation needs. One of Secretary Watt's highest priorities during his lamentable tenure was to stop Federal, State, and local acquisition and development and to turn the fund into an operation and maintenance account for the park service.

If my committee has learned little else over the years, it is the foolishness of this approach. Not only do the American people overwhelmingly support the fund's activities, it also is abundantly clear that failure to finance the fund only pushes off onto future budgets the higher costs of today's inaction—whether it be through escalating land acquisition costs, unfinished projects in community after community that must be finished at a later date or through damage to resources that must be mitigated at great expense. I might add parenthetically that the fund's activities are so important and the lack of money for them so destructive that President Reagan's own Commission on Americans Outdoors is seriously considering ways to dramatically increase spending and make the fund self-financing.

We in the House defeated Mr. Watt's effort and have defeated the proposals of each subsequent Secretary to starve the land and water conservation fund into ineffectiveness. The pressures of Gramm-Rudman must not now be used as the excuse to achieve this extremely shortsighted piece of the administration agenda.

The administration's proposal this year is, once again, unrealistic and unacceptable.

Last year's minimal appropriation to the Park Service of $48 million for land acquisition and $50 million for grants to the States would be slashed by $83 million. The Park Service would have just $15 million for land acquisition. The administration wants to rub salt in that wound by seeking a rescission of almost $20 million in fiscal year 1986 in land acquisition funds and $36 million in State grants. The Fish and Wildlife Service is reduced from approximately $39 to $1.5 million, the Forest Service drops from $27 million to just over $3 million, and the Bureau of Land Management gets nothing at all.

This is Secretary Watt's old moratorium wine in a new bottle. It was wrong then, and it is wrong now. To those who say the fund must take cuts like everybody else, I say we already gave at the office. During the Carter years we appropriated up to $900 million annually for the fund. Now we are fighting for $150 to $200 million. This is a reasonable and realistic funding level that acknowledges current fiscal realities without adopting the radical and needlessly destructive approach of the Reagan administration.

Mr. Chairman, once again the President has sent to the Congress the same misguided proposals that we have rejected in his past four budgets. The Congress will have to again reject this budget and maintain the priorities that it has established over the past 4 years so that the needs and interests of the American people will better be served.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES].

Mr. BARNES. I thank the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Budget for yielding to me. It is a great honor to serve under his leadership as a member of the Committee on the Budget.

Mr. Chairman, as cochairman and founder of the Federal Government Service Task Force, I have seen President Reagan submit the same shortsighted proposals over and over again.

The proposals offered in this year's budget are all repeats of past, unsuccessful offerings.

It is critical that we reject these proposals or we will drive our best Federal employees out of Government service.

Previous cutbacks have already taken their toll. Most of the original leaders of the space shuttle program have left for the private sector where they can make two, three, four times as much money. I don't mean to criticize the new people, but who knows whether what happened is the result of the fact that we lost a lot of our most experienced people.

If the President's proposals were implemented, the value of the Federal compensation package would be substantially reduced. Coupled with the failure of the comparability system, which has left Federal employee pay lagging 19 percent behind the private sector, implementing these cuts would send a signal to Federal employees that we don't think they're worth much. That is wrong.

COLA'S

Under this administration we have seen delayed COLA's, diet COLA's and last year we got the un-COLA. The President now proposes to continue the un-COLA into 1988.

If the January 1987 COLA is frozen, Federal retirees will have received only two inflation adjustments, worth 7.5 percent, in the 57 months since their COLA's were first delayed. During that time, inflation has gone up nearly 23 percent. That means Federal retirees have been denied two-thirds of their adjustments.

Social security recipients have been getting their adjustments. Over the past 10 years, social security retirees have received 10 percent more in COLA's than Federal retirees. We should not pit these groups against each other, we should treat them equally.

This year marks the 65th anniversary of NARFE, and I think that's a good time to show our good faith to Federal retirees who kept their end of a bargain made many years ago.

STRUCTURAL CHANGES

In addition to the COLA freeze, the President has proposed several structural changes to the retirement system.

The key number in the President's proposals is two.

When COLA's resume, he proposes to pay them at 2 percent less than inflation. While that sounds like a modest cut, if inflation continues to run around 3 percent, that means a 66-percent cut in the adjustment.

He also proposes to change the method for calculating annuities by 2, by changing the base from a high 3-year average to a high 5-year average. If implemented, this proposal alone would cost the 1986 retiree 7 percent of his or her annuity through 1990, a loss of over $1,000 a year.

The President again has proposed to raise the retirement age to 62, and penalize employees who retire early by cutting their benefits by 2 percent for each year they are under 62.

In addition, he proposes to increase employee contributions to the retirement system by 2 percent—from 7 percent to 9 percent. All these changes would mean that Federal employees are paying more money for fewer benefits. That is unfair.

PAY

Although the President's final recommendation on pay won't be made until the fall, after his pay agent reports on the disparity between private and Federal pay, the budget proposes a 3-percent raise for Federal employees, delayed until January 1987.

That would not bring Federal pay anywhere close to where the law says it should be. Title 5 states that Federal employees should be paid wages comparable to their private sector counterparts. Yet, for the past 10 years, their pay has lagged far behind.

Last year, the Advisory Committee on Federal Pay found that Federal salaries are now over 19 percent behind private sector pay. Taking a longer view, in the 10 years ending in 1985, inflation has outpaced Federal pay, also by 19 percent. So, when people say that Federal employees have gotten raises, that's not really right because those raises haven't even kept pace with the cost of living.

CONCLUSION

The Wall Street Journal recently reported that for 1986, the average private sector pay raise was 6.9 percent. Federal employees got nothing.

It is awful what we are doing to our public servants. We are driving the best people out. Any manager can tell you that if you don't pay decent salaries, you won't get top employees. Our Nation cannot afford that. Now more than ever we need a first-rate Federal work force that can make the most use out of fewer resources.

If we implement these cuts, our top producers will leave Government service to work for employers who appreciate their work and give them 7 percent raises.

We must show them that we appreciate their work. This country boasts the finest civil service in the world and we need to hang onto it.

The administration is once again being pennywise and pound foolish. Under the guise of cutting costs, President Reagan is gutting a major part of Federal employees' compensation.

It is up to us to once again reject these proposals and show our commitment to the people who carry out the policies and programs that we set. If we adopt the President's shortsighted view of Federal compensation and benefits, we will find ourselves with a workforce that is unable to function.

We need, and the American public deserves, the highest caliber Federal employee that we can find.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, there has been a great deal of talk today that this is a political charade.

I want to be perfectly honest. When we speak of the 1984–85 budget a year or so ago we were inundated on this side of the aisle with mail saying, "Do not change one word of the President's budget, do not change a single word." And then when we finally adopted a budget, the President himself was continually saying, "I sent a budget up and the House would not consider it."

So, yes, I insist, as a Member from the Democratic side, that we give due consideration to the budget of the President of the United States. He ought to have his opportunity to have his priorities considered by this body today. And Members from the Republican side of the aisle can do whatever they desire to do. You can run, but you cannot hide. I believe I have heard that saying before, "You can run, but you cannot hide."

If you want to increase foreign aid, then vote for this budget. If you want to decrease Medicare, which we have increased by 70 percent over the last 4 years where old people are now paying $800 a year for a hospital visit out of their own pockets, whereas it was $300 4 years ago, then vote for this budget. But do not vote "present;" stand up, don't hide. Say, "I support my President. I support his budget. I support it today." Do not be ashamed. Do not be embarrassed. We all love the President. We simply believe his priorities are wrong. We simply believe that we ought to look after the handicapped a little bit more before we look after foreign aid; we believe we ought to look after education, we believe we ought to look after American people first.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I only have 1 minute. If you will give me time after I finish.

Mr. WALKER. I do not have any time.

Mr. JENKINS. We believe we ought to look after Americans first. We do not consistently oppose foreign aid. We understand the need for it at times. But we believe that in a time of crises there is a time for our priorities. We believe that we deserve a better set of priorities for education, for the handicapped, from the standpoint of the hungry in this Nation, and our own Third Worlds within the borders of this country. We believe that we ought to have the opportunity to set our own priorities. So I say to you rather than vote "present" if you do not like the President's priorities, do as we shall do on this side of the aisle and vote "no." Thank you.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KASICH].

Mr. KASICH. I appreciate the gentlelady yielding.

Let me say that since we passed the Gramm-Rudman proposal, I have had a steady stream of people who have entered my office to really talk about what the impact of Gramm-Rudman will be in fiscal year 1987. They have said, "Can we do anything to avoid actually implementing Gramm-Rudman in fiscal year 1987?" I am talking about everybody. Everybody in this Congress in fact wants to avoid the enactment of Gramm-Rudman in fiscal year 1987. That is why I am so disappointed today because as the steady stream of people comes through my office I tell them everyone in Congress, when you look at the tremendous vote we had in passing Gramm-Rudman, everybody in this Congress is sick and tired of coming to this floor and raising the national debt without any formula or hope for ultimately getting this budget under control. Gramm-Rudman is going to force us to work together.

What I am disappointed about today is we bring a working document, and that is essentially what it is, a working document from which the Budget Committee is able to start. We bring that to the floor and we say, "Are we going to pass it? Are we going to accept the President's priorities?" Everybody in this House has disagreements with some of the priorities of the President. It is a working document. In my hand are three pages worth of changes that were made in the Carter years under President Carter's budgets. Budgets really only are a working document. Then the Congress works to try to shape priorities.

Now what do I tell these people when then come in? What do I tell them to ease the fears of veterans who go to "SONNY" MONTGOMERY to talk about how do we avoid Gramm-Rudman effects on veterans? Or who wants to go to NANCY JOHNSON and talk about the effects on transportation? Or the people who go to anybody who serves on the Committee on Agriculture? The answer is we have got to forget our partisan affiliations, we have got to drop some of our own parochial interests and on this side that means for those interested in transportation we have got to drop some of those parochial interests, on defense the same thing. We have got to work together. So what I am disappointed about is we are running out of time to work together to avoid Gramm-Rudman. Yet we bring a political document up on the floor now.

Now I mean you all know this is not going to pass. Why do we bring it up? All it does is really put us at odds again. If we are going to do this, if we are going to be able to effectively avoid Gramm-Rudman, pass a budget that is compassionate, pass a budget that still provides for the defense needs of this country, and pass a budget that is fiscally responsible, we have got to stop playing politics on this floor because we flat out are running out of time.

I say to the chairman, as he knows, I was willing to accept one of his budget recommendations in the last Congress out of a spirit of good will, and I urge my colleagues on the Budget Committee to not get hung up on one or two issues but let us work together.

I ask the chairman today: Let's stop the politics, let's stop the infighting and let's do something for the country. Let us do something for our constituents who come into our offices.

Let me just conclude by saying we can avoid these effects of Gramm-Rudman. I believe we can get a budget. I have talked to our chairman. I have talked to a number of people on the Democratic side of the aisle and on the Republican side. Let us forget our parochial interests for a while, let us forget them, period. Let us drop our party labels, let us work together, and let us stop this kind of nonsense before it is too late for the American people.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KASICH. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. The gentleman referred a couple of times to the fact that we are running out of time. You know when I first heard that during this budget cycle? Do you remember back in January or early February when some of us suggested that maybe there were some more reasonable approaches to the sequester that was going to take place on March 1 and suggested that each of the committees ought to decide where they are going to make the cuts and where they are going to make the reductions so that rational thought will be put into the process? Do you remember what the response was? We do not have time. Apparently nothing has happened during that time that was going to be devoted to putting the budget together because we have no alternative on the floor today.

So I share the concern of the gentleman for time.

Mr. KASICH. I guess a legitimate argument could have been made about the time factor in the last cycle. But no argument can be made today that there certainly is enough time to do this thing intelligently and to avoid these across-the-board cuts.

I can tell you that the leadership on our side has said repeatedly that they want to be able to work this thing out. I think they can. I believe the gentleman from Florida believes we can work it out if we are all willing to give a little bit and that is what the nature of being able to pass a budget is.

But we are not starting it when we get the politics raised in this Chamber and try to argue that we are going to pass this budget in total. I do not agree with many of the priorities the President establishes. It is a working document, something by which Congress can come togther, Republicans and Democrats, and put something together that makes sense for our country.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BEVILL].

Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to express some concerns over the President's fiscal year 1987 budget request for programs under the jurisdiction of the Energy and Water Development Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee.

With regard to water development programs, the President's budget is generally supportive of the legislation we included in the supplemental appropriation bill last year. Legislation for cost sharing and certain user fees is currently being considered by Congress. While I have certain reservations about user fees, my subcommittee will certainly follow whatever legislation that is enacted.

I do have a number of serious reservations with regard to the President's fiscal year 1987 budget, however.

The budget proposes the sale of a number of the Government's assets. These include the sale of the Bonneville Power Administration, the four other power marketing administrations and parts of the uranium enrichment program.

I have not seen any analysis by the administration as to the benefits of such a sale, but I have heard from constituents that see the potential for increased electrical rates.

I am also greatly concerned with the budget proposal to eliminate the job creating, economic development programs of the Tennessee Valley Authority and the Appalachian Regional Commission. These programs are vital to the continued ongoing health and education of Appalachia, the Tennessee Valley and the country.

With regard to the Department of Energy, I am not significantly concerned with the total request, but my committee will have to review carefully the balance of Energy Research and Development.

We will need to be assured that we are not allowing the wasteful cancellation of nearly complete projects with significant investment to date.

The budget for the Defense portions of the Department of Energy is at a healthy level. We are conducting hearings on these programs and will include our recommendation in the fiscal year 1987 appropriation bill.

In general, that portion of the President's budget that falls under my jurisdiction is adequate in total, but may require a number of significant adjustments to the President's proposed priorities.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEVILL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Chairman, I was curious if the gentleman could give us a figure that his committee is going to be dealing with that we might be able to consider.

Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Chairman, for the gentleman's information, my subcommittee has come under the President's budget every year. We have never appropriated as much money as he has asked for. We have never appropriated as much money as the joint resolutions of the House and Senate asked for.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the Chair how much time this side has remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] has 54 minutes remaining and the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN] has 53 minutes remaining.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO], a member of the committee.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Chairman, I thank my chairman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, it is rather strange that we have just been asked by our friends on the other side of the aisle to not bring this political document to the floor. That is a rather strange way to typify the budget submitted by the President of the United States, with the admonition that we not consider it dead on arrival, that we give it complete and thorough consideration.

What it really is is a statement of the values of this administration, the values of this President, what he believes in, who he wants to help, and who he thinks he must hurt.

If we look simply at transportation, I think we get a very clear view of what the President's budget priorities are. I think it is summed up very simply when we see that he wants to spend $45 million on a hypersonic plane to get us to Tokyo in 2 hours from Washington, DC, while cutting $4.5 billion from highway and transit funding after pushing through a gas tax increase just 4 years ago.

We on this side of the aisle believe that people are less concerned about the 2-hour trip to Japan than they are at getting to their jobs in rush hour every morning.

Can our constituents look forward to a balanced transportation future that cuts highways and mass transit funding by 79 percent? I think we all know they cannot. Mass transit would be reduced from $3.6 billion in 1986 to $1.2 billion in 1987, a 66-percent cut in 1 year. We will be paying higher fares and higher sales and local property taxes as we abandon our historic, and I regret to say, now declining partnership share.

The low income, the elderly and rural and urban areas will feel the greatest impact of these cuts. Sixty percent of transit riders have incomes under $20,000 a year. Fully one-third have incomes under $10,000. Forty percent are minorities, and 30 percent are too young or too old to afford or to be able to drive a car. Our highways and bridges will deterioriate, pushing the bill we pay further into the future so it impacts our children's future.

I think we all understand that we will have more potholes and more traffic gridlock in our future, because the President will not face reality. All across the land when it is morning in America, as the President's campaign theme would have it, people should think of this President's budget as they sit in stop-and-go traffic and wait at bus and subway stops for a ride to work that takes longer and longer to arrive.

We can do better, and our budget will do so. We should reject this travesty and bring a better alternative to the floor in several weeks. Transportation can accept its share of cuts, as it so frequently has been forced to in the past, but it cannot be devastated because the victims of this cut have no clout with the President.

Yes, in fact, this is a political document, and it accurately reflects the priorities of this President and his party.

Mr. Chairman, I think the time has come that we reject those priorities and move on to a future that has some promise for all Americans, not just the favored few.

The President has proposed ending the Federal subsidy for Amtrak. This means that Amtrak would no longer exist. All passenger train service in this country would end and Amtrak would be forced into bankruptcy. What exactly would this mean?

First, 25,000 employees would be out of work.

Second, The Federal taxpayer would lose over $3 billion that has been invested to make the system modern and safe.

Third, Amtrak would be unable to sell its assets for little more than scrap value leaving an unfunded liability of at least $2 billion in labor protection payments required by law.

Fourth, the Federal Government, as Amtrak's largest stockholder, would receive nothing for its initial investment.

Fifth, other freight and passenger trains that use Amtrak's tracks, such as Conrail and SEPTA, would lose so much business that their viability would be questionable.

Sixth, the 1 million passengers who use Amtrak each year, primarily for their commute to work, would for the most part be left without transportation to a job.

And lastly, if these passengers did try to use airplane or highways instead of Amtrak, the additional congestion in the Northeast corridor would be unmanageable. The head of the Federal Aviation Administration has already said so in congressional testimony.

Obviously, the President's proposal has no merit whatsoever—it would waste money already invested by the taxpayer and cause considerable costs for current taxpayers. The proposal would not only impact severely on the livelihood of individual Americans, but be a financial ripoff of all Federal taxpayers.

FUNCTION 450: COMMUNITY AND REGIONAL AGENCIES DEVELOPMENT TALKING POINTS

THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

The President's proposal for the community and regional development proposal should be viewed in the context of his overall policy for aid to State and local governments.

The President's 1987 budget proposes $89.1 billion in budget authority for aid to States and localities an approximate 25 percent reduction in just 1 year.

In the community and regional development function he proposes budget authority of $3.80 billion compared to a CBO 1987 baseline of $7 billion, a 46-percent reduction.

The reduction in this function is accomplished by significantly reducing or eliminating almost every program in the function, including all of the significant urban and rural community assistance programs.

The largest program in the function is the $3 billion Community Development Block Grant Program which is divided 70 percent to urban communities and 30 percent to rural communities.

The President proposes to reduce the 1986 program funding from $3 billion to $2.5 billion by deferring $500 million. Next, he proposes to reduce the overall 1987 funding level to $2.6 billion—including the $500 million deferral.

This is a prelude to the complete elimination of the Community Development Block Grant Program in his future budget submissions. He is taking a program that we the Congress already reduced from $3.5 billion in 1985 to $3 billion after Gramm-Rudman and further reducing it to $2.6 billion with no program justification whatsoever. Next it will be $2 billion then $1 billion and then gone. This a program that by law must be spent 51 percent on low- and moderate-income people and in fact 90 percent is spent this way. The program is targetted to distressed communities, the urban and rural poor who need assistance. This is not a giveaway program, it is not for the rich, it is fundamentally used to provide needed housing, public works, and other job creation.

The President then has a litany of urban and rural programs that he wants to eliminate, Urban Development Action Grants, the Economic Development Administration, the Appalachian Regional Commission, The Tennessee Valley Authority, the Rural Development Insurance Fund, rural water and wastewater grants, Small Business Administration disaster loans and others.

We know these programs by their letters, UDAG, EDA, TVA, ARC, and so forth—the President thinks this is an alphabet soup that you can throw down the sink. These are people programs where there is an identifiable cost and an identifiable benefit.

Take UDAG for example, the President says the program doesn't work. I would think the President would like this program since it is a classic example of a true public-private partnership. UDAG by law leverages several private dollars for each public dollar. The President says that UDAG doesn't work, local officials know better. Visit Lowell, MA; Charleston, SC; Baltimore; and many other cities where downtowns have been revitalized, where people have returned to live, visit, and do business—you will find UDAG grants anchoring the projects. UDAG used to be funded at $675 million, we reduced it to $440 million by 1985, a 25 percent reduction in 1986 to $330 and then Gramm-Rudman to $316. The President doesn't want community development programs he wants localities to sink or swim. That's OK if your local economy is strong but it's not OK if you've got problems that need solutions.

It's the same with many of the others, eliminate Appalachian Regional Commission—this is where President Kennedy first envisioned the war on poverty—the President must believe that we've won that war but it isn't so. The poverty rate has soared in the administration and Appalachia is still lagging the Nation. We're still having only 57 percent of the children finish high school there, much better than the 33 percent in 1960 but let's finish the job.

EDA, he says it doesn't work but the House has approved a reauthorization bill 3 years in a row with almost a three to one majority each time.

Rural development insurance fund and rural water and wastewater grants are slated for termination by the President, the net effect of these proposals will be to deny a healthy environment to sparsely populated rural areas where there are insufficient local resources to provide clean water.

One more example of where I think the President's proposals are clearly mistaken is the proposal to eliminate the Small Business Disaster Loan Program. We are a Federal system where the Federal Government is a partner with the States and localities, when natural disasters strike we work together. This function has the FEMA disaster Relief Program and the SBA Disaster Loan Program. Somehow the initials SBA have become an excuse for eliminating a program. The President would keep the Disaster Relief Program and in fact requests a supplemental but he would eliminate the SBA Disaster Loan Program. When floods, tornadoes, and other disasters occur, we the Federal Government will no longer be there to help. When Governors call on the President to declare a disaster area he would now say, I can't help. And it doesn't even save any money because this is a loan program not a grant program and over time the money is paid back when people are back on their feet.

I want to make two last points. First, there are many other parts of the budget that go hand in hand with the programs in this function and serve to build our cities and communities. The President reduces or eliminates many of those programs. A fine example, is housing programs in both the rural and urban programs. We used to build close to half a million units a year. Last year we were at about a 150,000 level—now the President wants only 50,000. If he doesn't realize there are poor people who need housing now he should get out of the limousine and walk the streets of our cities. And in function 850: There is the proposal to eliminate the General Revenue Sharing Program. I understand that this is an issue the Congress must face but I cannot understand his proposal to eliminate this year's fourth quarter payment that has been carried in the budgets of 39,000 local communities all year long.

Finally, I want to point out that the President's proposals to eliminate almost all of the urban and rural community development programs is based on his view that the States and localities of this country are running healthy surpluses and that everything is just fine and dandy with our State and local partners.

Unfortunately, all is not roses throughout the Nation. As you know the unemployment rate just jumped up from 6.7 percent in January to 7.3 percent in February. California's rate jumped up from 5.8 to 7.2 percent with almost 1 million people unemployed, Illinois' rate jumped from 7.7 to 9.5 percent with half a million unemployed and Texas jumped from 6.4 to 8.4 percent with 670,000 unemployed.

Some say this is a statistical quirk, that it overstates the case but back in December when the national rate was going down, West Virginia had a 12.4-percent unemployment rate and Alaska, Kentucky, Louisiana, and Mississippi also reported double-digit rates.

The impact of the farm crisis, falling energy prices and tough international competition evidenced by our record $148.5 billion trade deficit is shaking many State and local economies. Does it really make sense to slash State and local aid by 25 percent in 1 year?

Yes; States are running in aggregate about a $5 to 6 billion surplus with a few States having about half the surplus. But if the President's budget was adopted as is, the budget reductions assumed would exceed the year-end projected surpluses in 43 out of 50 States.

The President's budget should be rejected because his program proposals do not make sense, they are counterproductive in this area and they have no relation to what's actually happening to States and local governments in the real world.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from Connecticut [Mrs. JOHNSON].

Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I do not support the President's budget entirely. My priorities are not precisely those that are reflected in the President's budget. I know that essentially all of my Democratic colleagues did not support President Carter's priorities in his budget either, because every one of his budgets went to committees and were changed by his Democratic-controlled House and Senate.

I do think the folks out there listening ought to know that this has never happened before. The President's budget has never been brought to the House floor circumventing committee consideration, and the hours that are being devoted today to what is basically a sham operation.

But what is sad about what is going on today is that it is sabotaging what was to me the most important part of the Gramm-Rudman bill. Yes, it set deficit reduction targets. Yes, it has an automatic provision that will reduce spending if we prove ourselves incapable of passing a budget that meets the needs of this Nation, and that includes addressing the deficit. But what it did that was revolutionary, the reason it was supported by Members on both sides of the aisle, was because, frankly, it was a last, dying, desperate gasp at trying to put in place a process that would enable us to write a decent budget in a timeframe that could serve this Nation, and it is that process that is being destroyed here today.

We have 10 working days left until that budget is supposed to be out of this place. That means the House has to pass it, the Senate has to pass it, and it has to come back from conference committee. So we know ourselves well enough to know that if we are not debating your budget, Mr. Chairman, today on this floor, we cannot meet that deadline. That is the tragedy of today. That is what we are doing; deceitful to the American public today.

What we should be doing here is debating our budget document, deciding what the House thinks should be the pattern of spending that this Nation should follow next year, and how we are going to take on and discharge the responsibilities to address that deficit that we know threatens our economic well-being and the lives and jobs and livelihoods of the people that we represent. That is what we should be doing today.

But instead of that, the Budget Committee has had an organizational meeting. It has had hearings. It has not begun to mark up a document. So we have 10 working days to pass a budget in the interests of this Nation, to get it through the Senate, to get through conference committee.

What is tragic about what is going on here today is that this shows the willingness of Members to dedicate themselves to sabotaging something we just constructed as a last desperate effort, and we are going to fail again.

What are the consequences of failing to pass a budget? I will tell you what the consequences are of failing to pass a budget. It is not only that we are not going to meet our deficit targets. It is that we are going to condemn administrators in America.

I talked to a friend of mine who has tried to run a jobs program to help people find employment. He has in some instances found himself in May without a budget. What does it mean if your life is on the line, your reputation, and you are spending dollars that the Congress has not finally approved? I will tell you what it means. It means that you run a niggardly timid program. Regardless of what the law is, regardless of what we promise, you run a lousy program because we are doing a lousy job passing a budget that will give you the dollars to get out there and say, "How tough and aggressive can I be in fulfillment of the statutes that govern this Nation?"

We changed the law to put the fiscal year to begin on October 1 because we could not complete our work by July 1. We did that because we said it was important to have a budget before the year begins.

There is not a town or city in America—and I represent plenty that have a population of 1,000. How do you explain to those people who govern themselves that, yes, it is March and we do not know what your revenue sharing payment is going to be in the next quarter? How do you explain year after year that we withdraw from you the right to govern this great democracy effectively?

It is out of that concern that we passed Gramm-Rudman. The deficit was only an excuse. The goals were only an excuse. We have never done things over 5 years. We make our budget each year. That was a lot of hokey stuff.

The automatic trigger was the kind of hammer we hoped would help us to act. But the real reforms were in the process part, and the process part said by April 15 we will have a budget out of the House and out of the Senate, and it said that by July 4 we will have passed all of the appropriations bills, and when we take that vacation we would go home with bills that everyone can look at, that the Congressional Budget Office can evaluate, that OMB can evaluate, and that in an open and clear way, as a democracy ought to function, we can get out there some measure of what is going to be the relationship between our spending plan and the needs of the Nation, and if we failed, then, yes, something automatic would happen.

But, you see, at this point if we cannot keep on track, then by July 4 we cannot keep on track and, ultimately, that ability to measure and say, "Did we or did we not measure up, did we or did we not do what the nation needs?" that opportunity for accountability will be lost, and that is what is at stake here today.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MOODY].

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to the President's budget.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY], the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I appreciate the gentleman yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the President's budget.

Mr. Chairman, I have much difficulty with this budget as it relates to veterans. When the Acting Administrator of the VA appeared before our committee on February 6, committee members raised serious questions regarding VA's ability to provide benefits and services to which veterans are entitled, were Congress to adopt the administration's budget.

For example, under the administration's budget, personnel who work in VA hospitals would be cut by about 8,800. We cannot operate these hospitals with a personnel cut that large. Because of age, we are getting more patients in the VA system. In addition, VA medical construction would be cut about 41 percent, an amount unacceptable to our committee.

The President is recommending that the new GI bill, which only became effective July 1 of last year, be repealed. This would be disastrous for all branches of the military services. We know that 70 percent of the new Army recruits are signing up for the new program. They are paying in $100 a month of their pay for 12 months to get this GI bill. About 50 percent of the other services are signing up for the GI bill. Repeal of the new GI bill makes no sense at all. No way can the National Guard and Reserve make their strength quotas without the new GI bill.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, the administration's budget would double the current 1 percent user fee for veterans who apply for VA home loans. With home-loan interest rates at 9.5 percent, this is no time, really, to discourage veterans from buying a home or refinancing his or her home loan. This is the time for veterans to go out and get a new loan. Our committee is not going to make the VA home loan program less attractive by adding 1-percent user fee.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot support the administration's budget because it does not provide for a level of benefits and services for veterans that I think is adequate. We are not asking for an increase, but just provide us enough service and funds to take care of the veterans.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER].

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank my colleague from Florida for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to be able to say to my colleagues that the budget alternative that I am offering to the House for its consideration would permit us to avoid the problems that have really resulted in political stalemate since 1981 here in the House of Representatives. If we are candid with ourselves, that is where we are.

We have a President who wants to continue to build up defense spending for the country. We have a Democratic majority in the House who resist that. We have Republicans in the House who believe we are spending too much on social programs. Our Democrat colleagues in the House believe we are not spending enough. Our Democrat colleagues in the House believe we Americans are undertaxed. Our Republican President says we Americans are not being undertaxed, and so it goes.

We have a stalemate today in American politics, and it is going to go on until the people of this country decide they want to eliminate the stalemate by an election in November 1986 or November 1988, or at some time. In the meantime, we are tearing at one another because we each protect our own constituencies. I admit that I am a hardliner when it comes to protecting the President's defense buildup because I believe that is what the security interests of this Nation require. I have less sympathy for protecting social programs because I think we are, frankly, spending too much. But the suggestion that I would like to bring to my colleagues today is that we have been concentrating on the wrong item of spending in our budget, at least during this Member's 7½ years-plus service in the House of Representatives, and it is to that point that I would like to speak briefly today.

The third highest item in the budget is interest on the national debt. We are today spending 43 cents out of every dollar that we collect in general undesignated revenue as interest on the national debt. Interest on the national debt this year is $196 billion. Its meaning to every citizen in America is clear. When you seek to go into the housing market today, either as a young home buyer or to buy a home or to refinance a home, you are asked to pay 9 or 10 percent. How would you like to be able to buy a home at 5 or 6 percent interest? That is what this whole discussion means to you or persons in your personal life, loved ones of your family.

And the same interest inflation premium is in the lending rate the Federal Government has to pay. The U.S. Government today is spending about 10 percent on the outstanding debt of $2 trillion. We have it within our ability to reduce the interest expense that we spend in maintaining a national debt by the simple expedient of issuing bonds that are backed by the promise of the U.S. Government to pay interest in gold. This bond would carry an interest premium of 2¼ percent. Now, when you take the inflation premium of 7 or 8 points out of what we are paying on the national debt of some $2 trillion and drive that down to 2¼ percent, you are removing from the annual debt service expense roughly $150 billion a year, and that is the option that I would like to be able to talk about.

Unfortunately, under the rules that pervade today, this Member from California does not have the opportunity of offering that budget alternative. I would hope in the next month or two we would get around to it because I think it is time we have a national debate on what it means not only to every consumer in America to be able to borrow money at an interest rate that they can afford to pay to buy their own home, but begin to talk about the U.S. Government being able to service its debt at a rate of interest that would drive down the annual cost by $150 billion in 1 year.

What does that mean for us? It means that we can comply with Gramm-Rudman this year. It means that we can give the President his request to increase defense spending 3 percent after inflation. It means that we would let any COLA increase as the CPA would require. It means that we would not have to implement any reductions in spending for what are projected in the CBO baseline. And we would do all of this without the necessity of raising taxes. That is the option that I would like to urge to the House today. Unfortunately, as I have indicated, the rules do not permit us to vote directly on that position.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. WATKINS].

Mr. WATKINS. I thank the chairman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I stand in opposition to the President's budget. Let all the American people realize that we all want to reduce the deficit. The question today before the American people concerns our priorities, and I think the priorities in the budget the President has presented are all wrong.

The President has increased the military budget over 100 percent the last 5 years, and in this budget he wants 12.2 percent more increase in funds.

There is $1 billion increase for foreign aid in the President's budget as he proposes to cut health care for the elderly and education for our children.

There is a 6-percent increase in the White House budget while at the same time there is reduction of funds for the homeless.

In Biblical terms, it says we are supposed to pound our weapons into plow shares, but the Reagan budget does exactly the opposite. The Reagan budget is turning our plow shares into weapons.

We have had reductions, massive reductions, in rural programs, and I think the President is fulfilling what he wanted when he said, "We want to export the farmers instead of exporting the grain."

Let me see what the budget does. This budget will force the exporting of rural people from the land. He is cutting the rural water and waste grants 45 percent, the community facilities for rural America 62 percent, and cutting the business and industrial loans assigned to help the jobless in rural America by 87 percent. And, get this: With the rural electric the cuts and along with destroying the Southwest Power Administration the rural people will have a 90-percent increase in their electric bills, over $100 a month. That is a tax increase, a hidden tax increase, just as requiring agriculture user fees happens to be a hidden tax increase.

Let me assure you the only thing worse than Gramm-Rudman is the President's budget whose priorities are all wrong to meet the needs of the less fortunate, and to save the citizen of rural America. The President's budget would further destroy rural America—not rebuild rural America.

So I ask all of my friends and colleagues to oppose the President's budget.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, it looks like today, March 13, 1986, is the day the Budget Committee tries to rub Ronald Reagan's nose into something. I am not sure what, but I do not think it is going to work, because the American people are smarter than that. The American people know, for example, that the budget process includes a series of hearings and the Budget Committee making its recommendations and its reports rather than just taking a message from the White House. We have never done this before. This is very unique. But at least I guess we ought to pat ourselves on the back: We are finally doing something, even if it is wrong.

The American people know that there is a process that ought to be followed, and it is not. The American people also know that the appropriations process has just begun. The chairman of the Committee on the Budget—as is the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and many of us on the floor today—is a member of the Appropriations Committee. We have just begun our hearings on the budget for fiscal year 1987.

I wanted to talk a minute today in this whatever it will be referred to later on, this discussion, I want to talk about something in this budget that has not been mentioned and most people try to ignore.

When you try to blame Ronald Reagan for all of the problems in the world, let me tell you something you are overlooking. When President Reagan was sworn into office in January 1981, he inherited a national debt of $1 trillion, a debt that he had nothing to do with creating.

The interest payment on that debt that year was $117 billion, and that interest payment on an annual basis has now risen since President Reagan took office to $206.9 billion estimated for 1987. That is a 76½-percent increase, making our annual interest payment on the national debt the fastest growing component of our Federal budget.

Outlays for interest payments from the national debt have grown 25 percent faster than those for President Reagan's much criticized national defense program. And as a member of the Appropriations Subcommittee on National Defense, I can tell you that President Reagan's request for 1987 is less than that amount that President Carter projected would be needed for fiscal year 1987 for national defense.

If it was not for the interest on the national debt that has to be paid, the average annual deficit since Reagan became President would be a mere $16.4 billion, rather than the $200 billion that we are talking about now.

The first budget over which President Reagan exercised any control, the fiscal year 1982 budget, had a $127.9 billion deficit. But $117 billion of that $127.9 was interest paid on the national debt that he had no control over.

For fiscal year 1983, the Federal budget deficit was $207.8 billion. But of that figure, $128.6 billion was the interest payment on the national debt. The Federal deficit fell in fiscal year 1984 to $185 billion. But again, the interest payment for that year rose to $153.8 billion. For fiscal year 1985, the Federal deficit was $212.3 billion. Of that deficit, $179 billion was interest on the national debt.

Estimates for the current fiscal year show that the Federal budget for this next year in effect would be balanced, yes, I say balanced, if it were not for the interest payment on the national debt. These are the figures that are estimated.

For 1986, the deficit is estimated to be $202.8 billion; $196 billion of that figure is the interest payment on the national debt. Finally, for fiscal year 1987, the budget we are now considering, it appears that the Federal Government would actually show a budget surplus were it not for the annual interest payment.

The President's projected fiscal year 1987 deficit is $143.6 billion, but the interest payment on the national debt for this same period is estimated to be $206.9 billion; $66 billion more than the deficit itself.

For those interest payments, we are not getting any hospital care or medical care. We are not getting anything for education. We are not getting anything for national defense. We are not getting anything except paying the interest on a debt most of which the incumbent President inherited when he took office.

From fiscal year 1982, the first budget submitted by the President through the fiscal year 1987 budget, President Reagan has had no choice but to request and spend $981.7 billion just to pay the interest on the national debt. Of the $1.8 trillion increase in the national debt since President Reagan became President, $981.7 billion or 91 percent of that increase has been to pay interest on the national debt.

So those who would like to blame President Reagan for our mounting national debt are laying the blame on the wrong doorstep. The fact is that those interest payments that have provided 91 percent of the increase in our debt since President Reagan took office were to pay interest on something that he had practically nothing to do with. Spending programs that have put this Nation in a near-disastrous economic situation.

Mr. Chairman, it is time that we in the House, the body that the Constitution says shall make these determinations, it is time that we quit playing the political ball games and get down to the business of not trying to avoid the hard votes through a Gramm-Rudman-type approach; not trying to avoid the hard votes through a closed rule on a reconciliation bill or something like that. It is time for the Members of this House to be willing to face up to the very difficult and very controversial and politically sensitive votes that we ought to cast, rather than hiding behind a Gramm-Rudman, or rather than hiding behind a closed rule on a reconciliation bill, or rather than hiding behind a budget resolution that may or may not be presented to this House in this fiscal year of 1987.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. PANETTA. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I guess it is altogether appropriate that we gather here to provide final burial to the President's budget.

Appropriate, if for nothing else, to move on and do the job that has to be done. I think it is a very sad commentary that each year we have to gather to overwhelmingly reject a President's proposal whether it is in committee or whether it is in the House or whether it is in the other body.

We begin a game of "budget chicken" in which we wait for the other side to make the tough choices that have to be made to try to get our budget in line. It is a lousy way to do business; we all understand that. It is what gave birth to the Gramm-Rudman approach, and it is what creates the frustration that we now deal with here.

The hope is that the President would exercise leadership in presenting a budget to the Congress that is realistic and that is serious. But instead of pulling together, he pulls apart. Instead of providing leadership, he plays games. The danger is that we too fall into the same trap. This budget is wrong; we know it is wrong, and it will fail for several reasons.

One, because if you are serious about doing a budget, it has to be joint responsibility. The President has to work with the Congress to get a budget adopted, not pull in different directions. He has known from the beginning that this was not a budget that either the other body or this body would accept and work with.

Second, if you want to pass a budget, it has to be fair and balanced in terms of the sacrifice that we present to the American people. This budget reflects the same old priorities of increasing defense, of refusing to pay for it, and of taking it out of the hides of the poorest of the poor.

Just on nutrition, an area that I deal with in the Agriculture Committee, we have recognized in this country a growing problem of hunger in our society. We have passed a Hunger Relief Act. We have passed additional proposals on the farm bill. This budget would cut $4 billion from nutrition programs. It would provide that 8 to 10 million children would no longer get school lunches; 2 million of whom are the poorest of the poor. That is the set of priorities that are contained in this budget. That is why it is doomed to fail.

I realize that there is anger and there is frustration as a result of that, because the ball has been thrown to us. I guess it is good and well that we go through this catharsis of voting on his budget and voting it down.

Let us defeat it; let us bury it. But let us also get on with the very difficult task that now lies with the Congress to find our way out of this budget morass.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. WAXMAN].

Mr. WAXMAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this resolution. While I find much that is objectionable throughout this budget, I want to confine these remarks to the health proposals.

The President's budget would cut Federal health spending by nearly $73 billion over the next 5 years. According to the CBO, outlays for Medicare would be slashed by $52.8 billion, Medicaid by $9.9 billion and public health programs by $10.1 billion.

If these numbers sound big, that's because they are. They represent what amounts to a scorched earth policy for health care.

Aside from the devastation it would work upon the elderly and the poor, this health budget is remarkable in that it has virtually no public support. No one has ever accused the President of being a lousy politician. Yet he has managed to present the American people with a health budget that they overwhelming oppose.

Last month, the Washington Post and ABC News conducted a national telephone survey in which they asked 1,500 people at random whether they felt spending for particular programs ought to be increased, decreased, or left about the same.

A mere 4 percent of those polled supported a cut in the Medicare Program. More than 60 percent of those polled said they favored increased funding for Medicare. Yet the President's budget would cut Medicare by nearly $53 billion over the next 5 years, including $22 billion in a direct shift of costs to the beneficiaries.

A mere 9 percent of those polled supported a cut in the Medicaid program. Almost half—49 percent—said they favored increased funding for Medicaid. Yet the President's budget would cut Medicaid by almost $10 billion.

The poll did not ask how people felt about spending for biomedical research, maternal and child health, childhood immunizations, and other vital public health programs. But I know the answer. The American people will not tolerate the dismantling of the National Institutes of Health or our Nation's public health system. Yet that is precisely what the President's budget proposes.

The Nation's physicians, nurses, hospitals, and other health providers certainly understand the threat that this budget poses. They have joined together in an unprecedented coalition of 108 groups to oppose the President's Medicare and Medicaid cuts. They put the matter bluntly: "Neither Government nor providers can be expected to continue to deliver more care to more people for less money."

In other words, if these cuts are enacted, the availability and quality of care for the elderly and the poor will deteriorate. We are not talking about frills. We are talking about basic physician, hospital, and nursing home care.

Nowhere is this more apparent than in the President's Medicaid "cap" proposal. This is essentially the same proposal that we rejected in 1981 and again last year. It would limit Federal Medicaid payments to $23.6 million next year, regardless of how much the States need to spend in order to provide basic medical care to the poor.

According to the National Governor's Association, this would result in a loss to the States of $2.5 billion next year. The States that would be hardest hit by the cap are those in the weakest economic position right now. Florida, Idaho, Indiana, Michigan, Mississippi, New Mexico, Ohio, Oregon, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Utah would all have to increase their current State contributions by at least 25 percent just to maintain current service levels.

Obviously, few if any of these States will be able to offset Federal funding reductions of this magnitude. As a result, eligibility will be cut, benefits will be cut, payment rates will be cut, and the poor will go without needed care.

Of course, the cap would completely stymie any initiatives that the States might want to start to reduce infant mortality and morbidity. The Southern Governor's Association and the Southern Legislative Conference has recently proposed a modest, bipartisan Medicaid initiative to enable the States in that region to better target Medicaid funds on poor pregnant women and their infants. But under a cap we would not be talking about providing more prenatal care and saving more babies' lives. We would be talking about more preventable infant deaths, and more preventable lifelong disabilities like mental retardation.

The major health issue facing many States right now is how to provide health care to the 35 million uninsured people in this country. Under a Medicaid cap, more people, not less, would end up without insurance coverage and without the ability to pay for needed health care. Fewer people would be eligible, and their services would be cut back.

The President's Medicare proposals are equally unacceptable. Once again, he is proposing that beneficiaries pay higher premiums, higher deductibles, and higher copayments. Over the next 5 years, these proposals would shift about $23 billion in additional out-of-pocket costs onto Medicare beneficiaries.

The President seems to be under the illusion that Medicare beneficiaries don't pay enough for their health care already. The fact of the matter is that the elderly already spend a greater percentage of their income on health care than before Medicare was enacted. And while the President and his upperbracket colleagues might not think much of a monthly premium increase of $21.10, it means a great deal to the 7½ million poor and near-poor elderly who rely on Medicare to protect them from spiraling health care costs.

A few years ago, we could say that Medicare spending could be cut by going after the providers without harming beneficiaries. But after 5 years of continuous cutting, that won't work. We've squeezed provider payments to the point where the quality of care available to beneficiaries is beginning to deteriorate. Further cuts will only make matters worse.

Take hospital care for example. The President would cut Medicare hospital payments by nearly $27 billion over the next 5 years. This will work major harm on those hospitals that serve large numbers of poor or very sick Medicare patients. We would be moving toward a two-class system of care, with the quality of care in hospitals used by lots of Medicare patients falling further and further behind.

I won't stand by and let the President butcher one of this Nation's great social welfare triumphs. And I know that my Democratic colleagues will not allow Medicare to be destroyed. But I can't understand why the President continues to press the members of his own party to whack away at Medicare, even though they have repeatedly shown no support for the scale of the cuts the President has sought.

Neither Medicaid nor Medicare are strangers to budget cuts. Medicaid has been cut by nearly $4.5 billion since 1981; Medicare by more than $21 billion.

At some point, further meat ax cuts will jeopardize the health and safety of the elderly and the poor beneficiaries. In my judgment, we have reached that point.

It is not just Medicare and Medicaid that are damaged by the President's budget. Many of our finest public health programs would be hit as well.

Consider what would happen to the Childhood Immunization Program. Under the President's budget, States would be forced to choose between buying the vaccines or employing staff to give the shots. And even if the States choose to use all their money on vaccine alone, the President's budget would protect 400,000 fewer children. By scrimping on funding for vaccine purchases, we will lose hundreds of millions in avoidable health care costs for sick and disabled children.

The President's budget would freeze funding for the Maternal and Child Health Program at current levels. States will have no choice but to cut back on the number of ventilator-dependent and other special needs children that these programs now serve.

The President's budget for the National Institutes of Health would mean a 17-percent reduction in the number of new and competing biomedical research grants. What does the President think has driven medical progress in this country? Why does he insist on stifling research opportunities for promising young scientists and physicians whom this country will need if it is to maintain its leadership in biotechnology?

Why does the President's budget do so much violence to our Federal health programs? Because he does not believe that the Federal Government has a responsibility to finance the delivery of health care services or research in this country. He believes that this is the responsibility of the States, the counties, and the private sector.

Well, the American people flatly disagree. Over 90 percent of the American people oppose further cuts in Medicaid. Over 95 percent oppose further cuts in Medicare.

I urge my colleagues to reject this budget.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 9 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEMP], a member of the committee.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague, the gentlewoman from Illinois.

I do not know if the gentleman is watching on television in his office, but I want to join my colleagues on both sides of the aisle in welcoming our colleague, our friend and comrade in arms, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. DEL LATTA, back to the House today. We appreciate him and have missed him and we are glad he is here.

I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY], the chairman of the Budget Committee with whom I have worked, as well as my good friend, the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN] that the purpose for which I have come to the well of the House today is to try to suggest some points that have not yet been made in this debate over how we can get our Nation toward a budget equilibrium, lower deficits, and a better economy for all the American people.

Mr. Chairman, it smacks of politics to take so many pot shots at President Reagan without offering an alternative, but that point has been made, so let me lay it aside and recognize that this is a political atmosphere. I can understand people standing up and saying that the President was wrong here and there, but I want to stand up and say that he is right fundamentally on changing the course of this Nation's economy, job climate and future. It was not so long ago that we were standing around debating whether America had much of a future.

In 1979, we wondered whether we ever would be able to get inflation down. There were some folks who said that mortgage rates were perpetually at double digit levels. Oil prices in 1979 were going toward $40 a barrel. Interest rates on short- and long-term instruments were anywhere from 15 to 21 percent, unemployment was rising, there was despair and despondency. Of course, it is not fair to say that we have cured all the macro- or microeconomic problems, but the corner has been turned. We have had a new beginning and the budget of the President is the first step in drawing the attention of the Congress, as it should be, in debating priorities. But, again, it is pretty tough to debate with Democrats over priorities because there is no Democratic budget, other than to tell us that we have got to raise taxes and slash defense.

I am only speaking for myself up here, but I do not think the American people want to weaken the modernization program of conventional and strategic forces upon which this Nation depends and our allies depend for a more peaceful world and a freer world.

Again, we can debate whether the buildup should be at 3 percent per annum or 4 percent per annum, but most of the American people recognize that you cannot defend peace through a weak defense.

Now, that is not really why I wanted to stand up here. It was to bring some good news to an otherwise gloomy debate. Even among my own colleagues on my side of the aisle, I do not think enough has been said about the progress that has been made toward achieving our goals of reducing interest rates, reducing unemployment rates, reducing prices, reducing long-term projections of deficits, as well as short-term projections of deficits.

I am going to vote "present," not to cop out, but to simply say that from my standpoint I have voted for the President's budget in the past and I can vote for it again. I am going to vote "present" because I believe that the President deserves credit. He is not getting credit for changing the debate in this country from redistribution of wealth to how to create wealth from increasing spending to bringing down spending, from raising taxes to bringing down taxes. I think the agenda is on this side of the aisle, not on that side of the aisle. That is a very partisan statement and I will just let it be.

But the fact remains that there is some good news today.

Interest rates on long-term instruments are down 4 full percentage points since last year. Each and every one of us said last year that we wanted to get interest rates down.

Mortgage rates are now in single digit levels. I think they should be lower.

Short-term interest rates have come down almost 200 points, or 2 full percentage points.

When this debate was taking place last year, and I was part of a coalition of Democrats and Republicans trying to work out a compromise on the budget, the overnight cost of money was around 9 percent. Today it is about 7½ percent.

Last year at this time 30-year Treasury paper was about 12 percent. I do not know if you noticed in the morning New York Times, it is 7.9 percent.

CBO and OMB made their projections of the deficit for the fiscal year budget upon which we are working with long-term interest rates at least 1 full percentage point over where we are right now. I do not know how much that translates into budget deficit savings, but if interest were to stay 1 percentage point below current forecasts the deficit in 1991 would be $25 billion less than it is projected to be by both OMB and CBO.

The oil price upon which CBO and OMB made their projection for the deficit in fiscal year 1987 is $26.50 a barrel. I do not know what it is today in the Rotterdam stock market, but it is closer to $16.50 than $26.50, $10 off the oil price.

Allen Sinai at Shearson Lehman Brothers, recently estimated that translates into an $85 billion deficit reduction over the next 3 years.

CBO and OMB in January 1983 predicted that the fiscal year 1987 deficit would be $300 billion. Now they are talking about $179 billion to $182 billion.

Could it be that the deficit mania misled the American people and the policymakers and the Congress? In light of the recent good news shouldn't we revise our estimates to give us a better picture as to where we are and how we are going to get to the Gramm-Rudman targets? I want to stand up and say that I do not think we need to raise taxes. I do not think we need to gut programs for the poor. I do not think we need to abolish conventional or strategic modernization programs for defense.

I would hope that after we get out of this political framework that we can get down to the business of drafting a budget that will get us from here to there, like we ended up doing last year. Do you remember when all the debate and all the politics were over. Democrats and Republicans got together and fashioned a budget? It was not perfect, but it was a heck of a lot better than just standing up and posturing day after day on who is right and who is wrong.

I just ask my colleagues, why do we not after today join together and begin to hammer out a budget?

The gentlewoman from Illinois, LYNN MARTIN, has worked harder than anybody I have seen work in a long time around here to offer an olive branch to our friends in the Democratic Party.

I would suggest the time is rapidly approaching when we put politics aside and take note of some of the good news.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT].

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to state that the President's budget proposal is a national tragedy.

In this moment our Nation faces unprecedented challenges. It is absolutely crucial that we regain our economic strength and our position of leadership in the world economy. For the United States of America, it is now or never.

In this moment, our top priority must be to invest in the resources that will enable us to meet these challenges. And those resources are human resources. Now more than ever before we must invest in our people.

We must make absolutely sure that our citizens—all our citizens—have the education, the training, the opportunities to develop to their full potential and become creative and productive members of our economy.

This administration's budget proposal will send the country in exactly the wrong direction, at a time when we can least afford to lag on the road to growth and increasing national strength. The future the President is leading us to is not the future we want—not the future we need.

To plan for the future we want, we have to understand the present. And America today is brimming with contradictions.

When Charles Dickens wrote, "It was the best of times, it was the worst of times," he could have been talking about our era.

To hear the President tell it, times are very good. And they are—if you measure success by the number of months without recession, or by the rate of inflation, or by the corporate profits and stock prices quoted on the Dow Jones Index.

Unfortunately, that's only part of the story. Our economy isn't just a set of cold numbers laid out on a spreadsheet. The American economy's goal should be—must be—to expand and promote opportunity and empowerment—to give every one of our people the chance to fulfill their potential.

When 1 in 7 Americans lives in poverty, when at least 23 million Americans are functionally illiterate, when approximately 1 million students fail to graduate from high school every year, when almost 8 million Americans are jobless, when those Americans who are working see their paychecks and their hopes shrinking, we simply aren't fulfilling our potential.

For some, these are the best of times. But others are being told they should settle for less. And nowhere is this more clear than in the President's budget.

In his State of the Union Address, the President borrowed a line from the movie, "Back to the Future." He said, "Where we're going, we don't need roads."

A day later we got a look at his budget proposal—and according to that plan, we don't need roads—or bridges—or schools—or farms—or nutrition either. When it comes to education, or training, or housing, or nutrition, it seems this administration knows the price of everything—and the value of nothing.

Let's take a look at some of the programs, proven effective in giving our citizens the opportunities they need to fulfill their potential, that the President proposes to cut or eliminate.

Let's look first at education, that most crucial of tools. The administration proposes to spend a paltry 1½ percent of its total budget on education, all education, in this country next year. The total Department of Education funding request for fiscal year 1987 is $2½ billion less than in fiscal year 1986. And by 1991 they propose to be spending 36 percent less than we are now.

They plan to reduce guaranteed student loans by 30 percent and student financial assistance by 23 percent. The overall effect of these cuts would be to eliminate 2 million student financial aid awards and significantly reduce 1 million more. Other higher education programs are to be cut 45 percent.

But our students won't even make it to college unless they have strong early childhood, elementary, and secondary educations. And what does the President propose to do here?

The Head Start Program with its proven record of breath-taking effectiveness is starting youngsters out on the path to educational success, is to be frozen at fiscal year 1985 levels. And by the way, the Head Start Program currently serves only half of the eligible population.

Chapter I, the compensatory education programs in elementary and secondary education, is also frozen at fiscal year 1985 levels. As a result, the Department of Education estimates that 260,000 fewer children will be served by this program in 1987, and only half of the eligible population is being served now.

At a time when our unemployment rate seems stuck at around 7 percent, when the nature of jobs in this country is changing at a dramatic rate and workers need new skills, the President proposes to cut our job training programs by 17 percent, and to eliminate the Work Incentive Program [WIN]. After trying unsuccessfully to eliminate Job Corps in fiscal year 1986, the administration has settled this year for cutting funding 43 percent, to reduce Job Corp's operating capacity to 1977 levels.

Just when we need to give our citizens, particularly women and minorities, every possible opportunity to start their own businesses, the President proposes to decimate the Small Business Administration, totally eliminating the loan fund and cutting the rest of the program by close to 90 percent.

Our child poverty rates are a national scandal. In 1984, 21 percent of America's children—13 million children—lived in poverty. Children in female-headed single-parent families fared much worse: 54 percent of these children lived in poverty. And remember that when children are poor, it is most often because their mothers are poor—too often locked into lives of dwindling hope for themselves and their children. This is an outrageous waste of human potential.

What is the President's response to this outrage? For the sixth year in a row he proposes massive cuts in programs for poor families and children. Children would lose another $6 billion in fiscal year 1987—and in the 5 years from 1987 to 1991, they would lose $33 billion.

Here is some of what he proposes to do to programs for poor children and families in fiscal year 1987: Cut Medicaid by 6.5 percent; cut child nutrition programs by 14 percent; cut food stamps by 3 percent; cut AFDC by 14 percent; completely gut the subsidized housing and rental housing programs.

My colleagues, I ask you: Is this any way to plan for the future? Can we ever reach our full potential as a nation if we squander our human potential in this way?

I think the answer is "no"—and I think the American people agree with me. A recent Washington Post-ABC poll revealed that the American people differ sharply with the President's spending priorities. And no wonder. It is the American people who suffer from the President's spending priorities.

A vote against the President's budget today is a vote for the American people. I urge you to vote against the President's budget proposal—to show the American people that we believe in them and that we intend to give them the opportunities they deserve to fulfill their potential and become full members of a strong and vibrant America.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOYER].

Mr. HOYER. I am glad to join my friends and colleagues Mr. FAZIO and chairman HOWARD to discuss the President's budget request for transportation. I rise today to speak directly to the President's termination of the Federal commitment to the Washington Metrorail System.

Along with other members from the Washington metropolitan region I was taken aback by this request since it violates the continued support of administrations of both parties since 1960. This administration in particular, in testimony before the Appropriations Transportation Subcommittee last year, assured the Congress of its continued support for Metro. Ralph Stanley, director of UMTA, stated in testimony that the current administration "affirms its commitment to complete funding under the Stark-Harris authorization." Mr. Stanley went on to commit to "provide construction funding for the Washington Metrorail System until the funding provided by the Stark-Harris legislation is exhausted." It is no wonder then, that the Washington area should feel betrayed at this budget proposal which zeroes Metro out of the budget. It is a 180 degree turnaround and an irresponsible abrogation of the Federal Government's commitment to assist in building a fully operable, regional metrorail system

Breaking the commitment at this critical construction juncture jeopardizes a delicate regional agreement which provided for construction of a fully operable system with the remaining funds in the Stark-Harris authorization. These important line extensions can be quickly completed through a smooth continuation of Federal and local funding.

The House should note that local governments have continuously met their funding commitments.

Further, WMATA has worked very hard to ensure that Metro is operated efficiently and effectively. They have created a glowing success story. Metro now carries over 12 million riders each year, and ridership continues to grow. Metro has sparked over $2 billion in local development and is responsible for even more in planned future development. Fifty-five percent of all new jobs in the Washington region are located near a transit stop. And Metro aids the inner city by carrying Federal employees and other city workers into the city each day, thereby reducing congestion which would occur with their estimated 90,000 autos on the streets.

This Congress has long recognized the importance of this system for our Nation's Capital. We have consistently supported the regional nature of the system through authorizations which recognize the unique nature of the system and its special service to the Federal Government and our workers.

This Congress has recognized again and again, in the words of Chairman LEHMAN, that—

This is not just a metropolitan area rapid transit system, it is the rapid rail transit system of the capital of our country and the capital of the country that is the leader of the free world. It should be made representative of this kind of symbol.

I would say to this House, let us keep our commitment. Let us reject the President's budget and restore funding under the Stark-Harris authorization. Let us continue to build a transit system that we can be proud of, that our Nation can be proud of.

The President has proposed a meager 1-percent pay increase for Federal employees. I say 1 percent because though he has recommended a 3-percent increase for civilian workers, he has also recommended increasing retirement contributions by employees from 7 to 9 percent, thereby whittling away 2 percent of the proposed increase. This proposal again fails to close the gap between public and private pay rates, which grew to a 19-percent lag with last year's denial of a pay raise for Federal workers. If we are going to attract and retain quality people, we cannot and must not, continue to pay 19 percent less than the private sector.

Last year the House rejected the President's recommendation for a pay cut for Federal employees. This year I hope that we will reject what is essentially another pay freeze for employees. We must begin to abide by the long-ignored "Pay Comparability Act of 1970" and recommend a genuine raise for Federal employees.

Second, the President again proposes to freeze retirees' COLA's, while awarding Social Security recipients a 3.7-percent COLA. I would submit that the pain of inflation is no less severe for Federal retirees than it is for our deserving Social Security recipients. Their needs are just as pressing, and it is patently unfair to deny them their cost of living adjustment once again. We should meet our commitments to our workers and our retirees. We should accord them the dignity and security that they deserve. Because without them what we do here is meaningless. Let's send them a signal of our support and let's reject the President's budget.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished chairman of the Public Works Committee, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to House Concurrent Resolution 296, the concurrent resolution on the President's budget for fiscal year 1987. There are many aspects of this budget that I would like to speak out against today, but I will restrict my remarks to those matters which fall under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation.

The committee has examined the President's budget very carefully and has found that it fails to provide for the needs of our Nation in many areas. The President's proposal ignores the vital elements of the Nation's infrastructure which must receive adequate funding for the good of the entire Nation. If we do not pay these costs now, we will pay more later. These needs will not disappear and must be faced.

The decision to cut these programs will have the counterproductive effect of adding costs to the budget through the additional unemployment benefits that will be paid to thousands of unemployed workers who would otherwise have jobs. These increased benefit costs must be deducted from the savings that are attributed to the reduced programs. The budget must be viewed in overall context—not as a one-dimensional accounting procedure.

In the area of highway transportation, the President's budget contains funding levels significantly below current law, levels which are inadequate to meet the capital needs of the Federal-aid highway system, and which do not adequately reflect the fiscal ability of the highway trust fund to support the highway program. Specifically, the administration's highway budget and legislative proposal cuts over $2 billion annually and virtually abandons the national goal of completing the Interstate Highway System; it ignores the accumulation of interest income in the highway trust fund as a basis for determining program levels, a disturbing and damaging break with precedent; and it provides no assurance that the President's legislative program, however inadequate it may be, even if it is enacted, will not be ratcheted-down each year by OMB or by Gramm-Rudman.

Frankly, we can see no compelling reason why our user-supported and financed programs should be subject to cuts of this dimension. Mr. Chairman, trust-funded programs don't add a penny to the deficit! In fact, they are deficit-proof by law.

Mr. Chairman, the President's mass transit budget is an assault on all users of public transportation—whether in urban, suburban or rural areas. It will provide service reductions and fare increases. What the President is saying to the working people of this Nation is your needs are not important, your transit systems are not a Federal concern. While we may not be able to get to work on the train, the President wants us to be able to get to Tokyo for lunch.

Here's what it does for local transportation programs:

It eliminates all general fund support for mass transit;

It slashes total funding by two-thirds, with no guarantee that any funds will be spent on transit under the highway/transit block grant program;

It eliminates operating assistance for the 116 largest urban areas and cuts funding in half for the smaller areas; and

It effectively halts new start and extension projects, cancels over $500 million in prior-year money, and pits highways against transit in competition for interstate transfer dollars. In short, it makes Gramm-Rudman look kind and generous.

In the area of water pollution, the President has truly proposed a dirty water budget. After years of obvious success with federally supported sewage treatment plants that have cleaned up the Nation's waters, the President has actually proposed no fiscal year 1987 funding for the construction grant program that has made these plants a reality. The President does say he will agree to a minimal amount of funding for 3 years if we enact authorizing legislation that will kill the program in 3 years, but that is an unacceptable bargain.

In the late 1970's, this program was funded at $5 billion annually. Since 1981, it has received $2.4 billion annually and, during the last fiscal year, the Federal share of the projects was reduced from 75 percent to 55 percent. To eliminate this program in the way the President has proposed ignores the health and environmental needs of the American public. The people want clean water and I hope this Congress will recognize the importance of this program in fighting water polution. We should be acting to eliminate pollution as quickly as possible, not eliminating our antipollution programs.

It should be made clear that these transportation and pollution programs must be funded. If we do not do it in fiscal year 1987, it will be done in 1988 or the next year or even later. But the longer we wait, the more expensive it will become and the worse the problem will be. These programs are essential elements of our governmental responsibility in providing for a smoothly functioning society and they should receive proper funding.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DASCHLE].

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, this is the first debate this year as we consider the President's budget this afternoon to decide what matters, what matters for us in determining where we put our limited resources. What matters for us determining what is most important as we look to the fiscal 1987 budget.

The President is saying what matters is national security, that in the name of national security, he wants the taxpayers to cough up another $34 billion, to provide $100 million in aid to the Contras, that to provide for this funding and yet meet the deficit reduction targets for this fiscal year that we must eliminate 43 programs in the Federal Government now providing for the needs of our Nation, while cutting hundreds more.

In the name of national security, just in the two areas of Government of veterans benefits and agriculture, this is the most destructive budget ever proposed to the House of Representatives. It cuts extension by 59 percent, that is 59 percent. It cuts export promotion by 20 percent while eliminating entirely the rural electrification and telephone programs.

In the name of national security, it cuts the GI bill. It eliminates 8,900 VA medical personnel. It eliminates 57,000 patient visits to VA hospitals just in the next fiscal year.

If this House has been criticized for anything, it has been criticized because we have not accepted the President's position on what matters in this country. Well, we have a chance today. If the President is right, support this budget. If he is wrong, oppose it. If you do not know, vote present.

I think he is wrong. I think the administration is looking at national security with blinders on. National security is supporting more than just something that explodes. It depends upon how educated we are, it depends upon how we care for those who have fought for this country. It depends upon how we care for the land and those who farm it.

This budget does not enhance national security, it jeopardizes it and it does not signify what matters, it paralyzes it. I am convinced that it would be overwhelmingly rejected by the American people if this afternoon they were the ones voting on this budget. I know that it will be rejected by the House this afternoon.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes and 30 seconds to the gentleman from California [Mr. MINETA].

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Chairman, I would like to take a couple of minutes to bring to the House's attention the impact of the President's fiscal year 1987 budget on the Nation's aviation programs.

Yesterday the Aviation Subcommittee, which I chair, held hearings on the President's budget for the Federal Aviation Administration and the National Transportation Safety Board. We, of course, knew the dollar amounts a few weeks ago when the President submitted his proposals to the Congress. But what we learned yesterday was most illustrative of how this administration really feels about maintaining the safety and capacity of our Nation's aviation system.

In the executive branch's development of the budget, the FAA requested $1.4 billion for carrying out their facilities and equipment program. This is the program that is aimed at modernizing the air traffic control and navigation systems and implementing long overdue safety improvements, such as radar to detect dangerous wind shear conditions.

The administration told FAA: No, only $825 million will be spent to meet those safety and capacity needs. What was realized in our hearing and in earlier discussions with the Administration was the fact that the $825 million figure was not arrived at through any project-by-project analysis of needs or priorities. It was simply an amount dictated from on high. Apparently FAA was told that they'd have to take this substantial cut, and it was left to them to work out the details so that there would be the least damage to the safety and capacity of the system. They are still sorting out which particular programs would have to be curtailed, but there is no question that the safety and capacity of our Nation's aviation system would be damaged by the President's proposal.

In another area, Congress has authorized just over $1 billion for grants at local airports for needed safety and development projects. The President again wants to limit spending to $712 million. Projects such as runway overrun areas that saved an Eastern shuttle flight here at National Airport will not be funded to the extent necessary. Projects for new and longer runways to enhance the capacity and efficiency of the system will have to be foregone, creating further delays in the system.

On the operational side, the subcommittee received most distressing news about the air traffic controller work force. At the Congress' behest the administration finally came around to the view that more controllers are needed. But we learned yesterday that a significant number of the new hires were only going to be offsetting normal attrition in the controller work force. It must also be added that the administration staffing levels are substantially below the staffing levels specified in last year's continuing appropriations resolution. The air traffic control system, which we all know to be stretched to the limit today, will most certainly continue in that state under the President's budget.

Mr. Chairman, I could go on for some time about the implications for the President's budget for aviation safety and development. In brief, the President is proposing that the Government step way back from its important role in aviation safety. I oppose the President's budget for a wide range of reasons, but in my capacity as Aviation Subcommittee chairman I want my colleagues to know that the aviation aspects of the budget are not in the interest of the traveling public—especially since these programs are paid for by user taxes—not the general budget—and there's a $3.2 billion unobligated balance now in the aviation trust fund.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BURTON].

Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Chairman, some Members of this House say we should not vote on this proposal. I ask them: If the President was not serious about this budget, why did he send it to us? We have a responsibility to vote on this proposal, not to simply ignore it and hope that no one will notice the poor judgment that went into its drafting.

My colleagues who object to this vote should have joined my good friend BILL GRAY when he and his committee traveled across this country to hear what people think of this budget. In San Francisco, my hometown, witness after witness came before the committee and detailed the loss of opportunity, the suffering and the neglect that would result from this budget.

Mr. Chairman, the budget we will vote on today is so unfair, so distorted in its priorities, that I could spend the entire day highlighting only its most outrageous proposals. I urge the Members of this House to listen to this debate, to hear from members of those committees that have spent years developing effective and valuable programs that will be devastated by this budget. Listen, and then vote against this ill-advised budget.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTON].

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I speak in support of the President's budget. Do I agree with everything in the budget? No, I do not. I think perhaps that the President has requested too much for defense; I think perhaps the President has cut some of our farm programs too severely. I agree with my colleague from California that some of the aviation programs have perhaps been subjected to too severe cuts; but I do agree with the overall thrust of the President's budget.

Just what is that? First of all, the President does not request or require any tax increases. I think the taxes that the American people pay are too high now, and they should not be subjected to any higher tax increases.

I agree with the President that we need to make every effort to meet the deficit targets of the Gramm-Rudman bill, that a majority of Members in this House recently voted on, right before Christmas.

I agree with the President that we need to restore the historical balance between Federal spending, State spending, and local spending. I agree with the President that those things that can best be handled by the private sector should be handled by the private sector.

Those are significant things that I think the majority of my colleagues, if they will sit down and reflect, would agree upon.

There are several things that I think need to be pointed out about the President's budget. Many Members in this body would have the American people believe that spending is going to be cut. That is not correct. Spending is actually going to rise in fiscal year 1987 as compared to fiscal year 1986 by $14 billion, rising from $890 billion to $994 billion.

Receipts are going to go up if the President's budget is enacted, by $73 billion, from $771 billion to $850 billion. Obviously, receipts are not as large as outlays, so there is going to be a deficit; and we need to begin to reduce that deficit.

Many Members are against the President's budget because they have strong reservations about one particular program that is very important to their district, or two particular programs or three particular programs.

I have similar reservations about some of the programs, but we have to look as the deliberative body that makes the law, that passes the budget, we have to look at the larger picture. The President has done that.

I would ask the question: Is it wrong to encourage welfare recipients that can work to work? The President says yes; I say yes; I think a majority of the American people say yes.

Is it wrong to set Government loan rates at levels that at least allow the Government to recover its cost of borrowing. I think it is right, the President thinks it is right, and I think we should support him in that area.

Is it wrong to encourage efforts to combat such high priority issues as drug abuse and drug smuggling? I think it is right; the President thinks it is right, and I support him in that area.

Is it wrong to eliminate those programs that no longer serve any useful purpose such as the Interstate Commerce Commission? I think not.

Is it wrong to eliminate programs such as Amtrak that help very, very few Americans? I think not.

The bottom line: Is it wrong to begin to set spending priorities and to make some decisions? I think not, so I support the budget that the President has proposed. I hope my colleagues will vote for it. I intend to vote for it.

I would point out that we have no alternative at this point in time. Our distinguished colleague, the chairman of the Committe on the Budget, has not yet brought forth any alternative budget. For this reason this may not be the best budget, but right now it is the only budget that we have; it meets our national objectives, and I think we should vote yes for it when we have that opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN] has 21 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] has 29 minutes.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to a distinguished member of the committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE].

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to the President's budget proposal for fiscal year 1987. I do so because the President's budget priorities, in my view, ignore entirely the fundamental economic challenge facing this country: Creating and protecting jobs for Americans by restoring America's competitiveness in international markets.

The competitiveness of American industry—both at home and abroad—has become a vital issue of monumental concern to American business and American labor. And the essential role American education must play in helping business and labor restore our Nation's competitive position is now almost indisputable.

In the last 30 months, no less than 17 national studies have been concluded on the topic of industrial competitiveness. And initially all of these studies—including the report of the President's own Commission on Industrial Competitiveness—argue that the effort to rejuvenate our Nation's trade performance must begin with a "no-holds-barred" commitment to accelerating our rate of investment in these areas: in education, in research, and in worker training and retraining.

But this budget ignores that advice. This budget doesn't merely relegate this cluster of issues to the back burner—this budget takes them off the stove altogether.

Japan—with half our population—graduates twice as many scientists and engineers as the United States every year! Is it any wonder, then, that Sony, Mitsubishi, and Hitachi are becoming household words while Zenith, General Motors, and 3M are laying off workers? There is no question that we must increase the pool of scientists and engineers from which American industry can draw its personnel. Nonetheless, this budget would actually cut Federal aid to higher education by 25 percent, and reduce the number of advanced-degree students graduating from American colleges and universities by slashing the Guaranteed Student Loan Program by 30 percent.

American colleges and universities now conduct about 12 percent of all American research and development and about half of our basic research. But at a time when these institutions face substantial, growing and unmet needs to replace obsolete research equipment and modernize existing laboratories, the President proposes to cut funding for university-based research facilities by $78 million. These reductions will surely hamper the process of modernization needed to support local industry's attempts to boost technological competitiveness and to develop new products.

Finally, as American industry continues its difficult adjustment to the new realities of high-tech manufacturing, it will need to draw upon an American work force that is equipped with new and highly flexible skills. That work force will not magically appear overnight. Developing that work force will require a clear national commitment to worker training and retraining. But this budget ignores that need. The President proposes to eliminate the Trade Adjustment Assistance Program, and to make deep cuts in the Job Corps and Summer Youth Employment Program. Moreover, the President would reduce Federal funding for vocational education by 32 percent, and would accomplish those savings by eliminating the general improvement, innovation and expansion of vocational educational services.

Mr. Chairman, in January of 1985, the President's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness warned that "Americans must take on the challenge of competitiveness as the economic agenda for the next decade." It's a warning that we must heed. The stakes are very high.

No one denies that soaring Federal deficits must be brought under control—that is not the issue. The issue is how we—as a Congress and as a Nation—will choose to achieve deficit reduction. To target for budget cutting those programs that promise to see our Nation through its difficult economic transition and to boost our competitive position both at home and abroad is a foolhardy proposition and should be rejected.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VOLKMER].

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, I've just returned from several days in my district—several days of trying to explain to my constituents just what the President's budget will do to rural America. They did not want to believe that this budget will devastate rural America, including my ninth district of Missouri.

Mr. Chairman, education is vital to my district. But apparently education is not vital to this administration. This budget will cut student loans, this budget will gut vocational education, this budget will cut from $10 million to $4 million funding for extension at the University of Missouri, this budget will put higher education beyond the dreams of many.

But far worse for the majority of my constituents will be the damage this budget will inflict on the farmers and agribusiness in my district. This budget will devastate funding to REA and mean higher electrical bills to all coop members. These farmers can't afford higher electrical bills. Rural housing will be cut. Under this budget there won't be any more housing projects vital to our rural elderly. Rural highway funds will be cut, soil conservation will be ignored, rural water and waste systems will be curtailed under the budget. The list goes on and on. In a year's time the President will be hard pressed to come to my district in Missouri and find one person who has not been adversely affected by this budget.

Mr. Chairman, this budget is wrong. When you hurt rural America you hurt all of America. My people are hurting enough. America is hurting enough. It's time this administration rethought its priorities.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRAFICANT].

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Chairman, in listening to this debate, one would think everything was milk and honey. Mr. Chairman, foreclosures on individually homes are at record levels. Farm foreclosures at record levels. Bankruptcy failures for small business are at record levels.

Ladies and gentlemen, it is not all that great. What I have come here to address today is, the President has submitted a financial blueprint to operate this country. He put his priorities down on paper and the American people should recognize it.

I do not believe the other side of the aisle wants to see the Democrat version. I believe the other side of the aisle does not want to get aligned with a priority system that tramples on many Americans in a line item that cannot be decieved nor denied.

My district suffers the greatest unemployment in America. This budget tramples on us and it literally destroys many opportunities for Americans in this society.

I believe that a "present" vote by anybody in this House today should be reviewed by the constituents of those Members very carefully and scrutinized.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STENHOLM].

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the resolution before us today, in opposition to the President's budget. I do so for several reasons, not the least of which is that it is $16 billion over the Gramm-Rudman targets that Mr. President, you endorsed and I voted for.

It proposes to continue: First, the policies that have given us $1 trillion in new debt over the last 5 years, most of which I have supported. It is time for a change in the game plan, and I vote against, oppose the President's budget today for another major reason.

In agriculture, where I spend most of my time in the legislative process in the committee, I find myself in very strong opposition to the priorities that are established, Mr. President.

The suggestion that we go to user fees in the area of meat inspection. Meat inspection is not an industry prerogative, nor a private benefit; it is a public health measure which will be funded out of general revenue, because the public is the primary beneficiary.

I have concerns about the priority that suggests that we are going to cut 59 percent from the Extension Service, in the area of agriculture, at a time when we have a need of training and retraining and assisting the farmers of this country; those who are going bankrupt and have the need of doing other things with their lives. It just does not make sense.

If you are going to criticize, though, you must be prepared to offer something in the alternative. Last year I was a part of that alternative. It is very simple; it is called Leath-Slattery-MacKay. It is a realistic budget. It cuts everything, straight across the board, with no exceptions. I think that is where we need to go.

There has been a lot of talk about bipartisanship. Well, today is my day to be partisan, because I listened to my colleagues on the other side who philosophically I vote with quite often. They have their field day, and they are going to continue to have their field day dealing with the budget, but it is time for us to get realistic and start supporting a program that will do something about the deficit. Today it is partisan; tomorrow it is bipartisan.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution. First, I want to touch on my serious concern about what the President's budget would do in the area of agriculture and then discuss in broader outlines the problems in this budget not the least of which it is $16 billion over the Gramm-Rudman target.

The President's fiscal year 1987 budget proposes cutting $8.6 billion—12 percent—out of the overall USDA budget and contains many "repackaged" and ill-advised cuts proposed in previous years in virtually all agricultural areas.

I question the adminintration's wisdom and priorities in attempting to lower the deficit by reducing or termination programs such as conservation, and extension, which could help alleviate some of the severe problems facing American agriculture today. Moreover, the long-term consequenses of these cuts may considerably exceed the short-term savings.

At a time when we are trying to incease our farm exports in order to decrease surpluses and improve farm prices, the President's budget proposes drastic cuts in farm export credits provided for in the 1985 farm bill.

Furthermore, I oppose OMB's continued effort to impose a user fee to pay the cost of Government-mandated meat inspection. Meat inspection is not an industry prerogative nor a private benefit. It is a public health measure which should be funded out of general revenues because the public is the primary beneficiary.

Do not misunderstand me. The answer to the woes of our agricultural economy lies not in increasing Federal outlays, but in long-term reforms that will increase farm profitability through the marketplace. In fact, as one of the principal sponsors of the balanced budget constitutional amendment, I propose we can freeze farm program spending at fiscal year 1986 levels and make major spending cuts from that figure over the next 3 years.

Such a true general freeze would go a long way in reestablishing progrowth national economic policies and lowering the deficit. Let me be quick to point out, however, that my reference to a general freeze means across the full board—not two-thirds or one -fourth of the board—but all the way.

Overall, CBO's baseline projections for 1987 show that almost 18 percent of outlays will be deficit spending, a figure that falls no lower than 14 percent, even if we meet the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings target for 1987. Looking down the road, we cannot balance the budget by taking all of that 18 percent—or even 14 percent—of total spending out of the 16 percent that is domestic discretionary spending, unless we want to destroy the family farmer, gut law enforcement, and forget about investing in job training, education, and science. The question is, where is the realistic budget?

It does not come from the White House, in a budget that overestimates economic growth, underestimates the defense spend-out rate, and is afraid to touch entitlement reform or revenues in the slightest. If we need any defense increase above a freeze, it should be covered by additional revenues on a "pay-as-you-go" basis.

Where is the realistic budget? I can give you last year's answer in three words: Leath-Slattery-MacKay. Last year, our three colleagues offered a budget that would freeze defense, restrain growth in Social Security while still providing fully for the elderly poor, and modestly raise revenues. The more you put on the table, the lower and more equitable are the shared burdens. As was obvious long before Gramm-Rudman, the more you take off the table, the more you hurt the programs—and the people—that remain.

The Leath-Slattery-MacKay amendment would have brought us to a balanced budget at least a year ahead of the Gramm-Rudman schedule. Last year, only 56 House Members voted for the real deficit reductions in that amendment. This year, we have an opportunity to be more responsible.

Some say a Member has to come from a pretty secure district to be able to tackle defense, Social Security, and taxes all in one budget resolution. I disagree. I give the American people more credit than that. Voting courageously can make a district secure. We don't need the six postal patron mailings we are allowed each year to explain a courageous vote cast for the good of the Nation.

In a recent opinion poll conducted by the "Farmer-Stockman of the Midwest," no less than 82 percent of the respondants said they favored spending cuts if they were "across the board." More impressively, 94 percent said they were willing to sacrific some Government programs, if the Federal deficit were really brought under control.

The American people realize we have come to a point where we must all hang together or we'll all hang separately. We have heard the saying, "To govern is to choose." Like it or not, harnessing Government spending requires hard choices. We may wish for some quick, painless answer, but we've got to work with the cards we've been dealt.

Today we roundly criticize the President's budget, and that budget deserves it. Tomorrow, this House must offer a better budget, a real budget, that doesn't shrink away from the difficult decisions that must be made.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. FROST] a member of the committee and also a member of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Chairman, the President's budget proposal is unfair, unworkable, and unrealistic—and nothing illustrates this point better than his proposals for function 550.

This function covers most of the Federal programs which provide direct health care services, including Medicaid which finances health services for approximately 22 million low-income people. The President has proposed a cut of $15.5 billion for Medicaid over the next 5 years, to be achieved by setting an annual limit on the amount of Federal payments to Medicaid. In 1987, the program's funding level would fall more than $1 billion below the level needed to maintain current services. Beginning the following year, the capped Federal payments would be allowed to grow only at the annual medical care inflation rate—no other increase in Federal funds would be permitted. No increases in funds would be permitted for program improvements and no increases would be allowed in the often extremely low fees that sometimes discourage providers from participating.

The implications for Medicaid recipients—the poorest of the poor and their children—are frightening. Medicaid has been under constant pressure from the administration and has already suffered from both funding cuts and administrative program changes. Under President Reagan, Medicaid has already been reduced by $4 billion. The result is that many States have had to reduce eligibility and provide fewer services for those who remained eligible. States have been forced to place limits on the number of hosptial days and the number of visits to the doctor for which they will pay, regardless of how ill the patient is. According to the National Governors' Association, almost every State will be seriously impacted by the President's Medicaid proposal.

Before we ask Medicaid recipients for any further sacrifice, it's important that we understand who they are. Many working poor families were dropped from the program as a result of the President's earlier cuts, leaving only the very poorest of our families as beneficiaries. Currently, Medicaid reaches only 46 percent of poor and near-poor families in this country and that number will drop even lower under the President's budget. More than half of Medicaid recipients—11.4 million—are children. Medicaid also provides primary health care to 3.3 million elderly Americans, 3.1 million blind and disabled, and about 5.8 million AFDC mothers. In fact, this program is often the only source of prenatal care for poor mothers, preventive care for children, and nurisng home care for low-income elderly and the disabled.

Finally, Medicaid is a program that works. It provides critical assistance to many of our poorest families and has produced some remarkable results. Access to health care for low-income mothers, infants, and children has improved radically and, as a result, their health status is much improved. For black infants, mortality dropped by 49 percent in the first 15 years of the Medicaid Program. By averting more serious and more costly health problems, Medicaid has proven cost-effective. Research shows that for every dollar spent to provide comprehensive maternity care for pregnant Medicaid recipients, $3.50 is saved in caring for disabled children.

Included in the President's budget proposal is also a $450 million cut in biomedical research in 1987, with the number of new research grants dropping by 950 in 1 year. He suggests an almost wholesale elimination of Federal support for medical training, and cuts Indian health services by over $100 million.

Frankly, we cannot afford the President's health care budget. Our national health policy must be cost-effective, but it must also make decent health care available and affordable for all Americans. The President's budget presents a real and a serious threat to the well-being of our most vulnerable citizens. I urge my colleagues not to abandon their commitment to these individuals and to join me in voting against this dangerous budget.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN].

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. The minority leader said at the beginning of the debate, "Don't take the President's budget seriously, it is only the President's budget." Well, I took it seriously. I took it home. I took it with me to a Job Corps site. The President proposes to cut the Job Corps. They do not like the President's priorities.

I took it to campuses. The President proposes to cut student loans. They do not like his priorities.

I took it to a veterans' hospital. The President's budget proposes to make it more difficult for veterans to obtain medical care. They do not like the President's priorities.

I took it to housing sites. The President's budget would make it much more difficult to rehab public and other housing. They do not like his priorities. I took it to a major vocational education center. The President proposes to cut vocational education support 50 percent. They do not like his priorities. The same with the city commissions, their views of his cuts in CDBG and revenue sharing.

I say to the Republicans you can run away from the President's budget, but you cannot hide from its mistaken priorities.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LUNGREN].

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Chairman, it has been very enjoyable watching the debate for the last couple of hours. I have not been able to watch the reruns of the "Gong Show" for a long time. It appears that is what we are doing here. I am not sure about the seriousness of today's event because, I do not know, the Democratic Party has overtaken what we in the Republican Party used to be. We used to be the party of the nay-sayers. We managed to lose election after election after election being able to say more loudly and more persistently "no" than the Democratic Party. But having seen our success for saying "yes" the other party has said it is now time for them to become the "no" party. And that is what we have heard here. We do not like this about the President's budget, no we do not like that about the President's budget; no, this does not look like a very good idea. Unfortunately it appears to me we are witnessing today something that is very sad. What we are witnessing is an acknowledgement by the majority political party in this country, at least in this House, that they have run out of ideas. All they know how to do is to present a budget here and say they do not like it. They have run from a job site to a college to everyplace else saying "Tell me what's wrong with the President's budget." Did they go to those same places and show them their particular budget? I do not know. We have not seen it. If they did, why isn't it here? Why did we not have a chance to vote on this particular thing?

We can all find things wrong, we can all find things wrong when we are trying to cut back.

At Christmastime when my children come to me and say, "Gee, we've got all these presents we would like you to buy," it is not easy to say to them, "Well, there are five great presents you have there, but we can only afford three, so you cannot have those two." I suppose if someone went to them and said, "Your father is not going to buy that for you. Do you think that is a good idea or a bad idea?" most of them would say it is a bad idea.

What do we do here in Congress? People come to us with 300 different programs and instead of saying we can only afford 200 of them in Congress we say, "Here are all 300 of them and here are 200 more you haven't thought of and forget about the cost."

Now you know what Gramm-Rudman is going to do with the President's budget if we follow this out for a number of years. If we follow this out we would deny ourselves so much that at the end of the 1980's when we begin 1990 we would only have saddled ourselves with a $3 trillion debt. That is all we do. We just go from $2 trillion to $3 trillion. So obviously this is such an austere budget it ruins this entire economy. Now I do not understand why we have the President's original budget here without us having an opportunity to reflect the new economic circumstances that we know are about us. CBO, the Budget Office, analysts across the country have said they were not bullish enough on the economic circumstances at the time this particular budget was presented. So we are denied by the rule the opportunity to have this budget reflect new economic circumstances. I guess we give new meaning to the idea of legislating out of ignorance. We not only legislate out of ignorance, we ensure that we legislate out of ignorance because we are not allowed the opportunity to bring the new economic forecasts upon which there is general agreement here. Yesterday I was privileged to chair a meeting of the Joint Economic Committee on the subject of the impact of falling oil prices.

Now even though there was discussion about how in particular areas for some short period of time there might be some economic dislocation, all of the economists who appeared before us talked about lessening of the deficit, lessening of interest rates, lessening of inflation, and increase in employment. All of those things added together ought to at least be reflected in whatever document we are going to adopt here. But we were not allowed by the majority party to even consider those things here. So this is more than a charade, this is more than a sham, this is a suggestion that we are doing something serious when we specifically are not allowed to deal with the economic circumstances with which the country is presently confronted. That does not sound like serious work. I think that is unfortunate because I thought there was a bipartisan effort beginning to work in the Budget Committee that would bring us some opportunity to vote on something serious. But instead we have this, we have this.

So what are we supposed to learn out of today's discussion? I suppose that the President's budget has some problems with it, I think we all acknowledge that. I suppose that cutting is difficult and easy to criticize; we expect that.

Where are we going to go? I am waiting for the other side to tell us where they are going to go. Maybe they will come up in the last few minutes and tell us some new ideas about where we are to go. But since they are not, I have to turn to the newspapers to find out and I look to the Speaker of the House, Mr. O'NEILL, when he was quoted in the Baltimore Sun on October 17 of last year in which the Speaker of the House said, "Should we pay through the nose by taxation? The answer is yes." Maybe that is a hint of what we are going to get from the other side.

Congressman ROSTENKOWSKI, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in the Chicago Tribune on the 19th of October last year, "We all know we are going to raise taxes, raise taxes."

Congressman GEPHARDT, quoted in an AP story on the 20th of January, "The idea that we are going to balance this budget by cutting loans to me is wrongheaded."

Washington Post of January 21, Mr. GEPHARDT said he would prefer to raise income taxes.

So maybe that is what we are talking about. If you have the President's budget out here all by itself, you can criticize it a lot. But let us compare it to the alternative, and the only thing I guess we can do is read the newspapers and see what they are saying and that says raise taxes, or compared to the other alternative, which is sequestration.

In hearing after hearing that I have attended I have heard the horror stories about what sequestering will do. So if we are not going to sequester, we have to have an alternative. The President's budget out here is the alternative. Where is the other alternative?

Mr. Chairman, I ask you, where is your alternative? Don't just tell us what is wrong with the President's proposal; don't just disallow us the opportunity to reflect true economic circumstances.

Mr. Chairman, where is your alternative? Let us give the American people some hope. Let us not make such a downer out of this whole thing. I am sure that your side can come up with some alternative. If you want to have new taxes, tell us about it. If you want to gut defense, just tell us about it. If you want to go to sequestering, tell us about it. We cannot hope against hope that the Supreme Court is going to say that sequestering is no good and we will not have to reach that point. Let us realize if you do not have this budget then you are going to have sequestering unless you come up with something else.

I ask you, I implore you, Mr. Chairman, tell us I am wrong, tell us TIP O'NEILL was wrong when he said last year, "Should we pay through the nose by taxation? The answer is 'yes'." Say it isn't so, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2½ minutes to the chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, and a member of a subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I want to address the President's budget wearing both of my hats today. As chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service where during the President's administration he has been successful in taking $25 billion in benefits and pay away from the Federal work force and the retirees. During all of this time he has been successfully convincing them that it is the Congress that has done this and that he had nothing to do with it. That is why I find it interesting that my friends on the other side of the aisle who somehow think that when the Congress gets blamed for something it is only the majority in the House that the people look to for responsibility, that for the first time the President's budget and the priorities that that budget suggests is before the American people.

The speaker before me said he cannot understand why the Democrats pick it apart and say it is so bad. He did not say it was good. He has not indicated that he is going to vote for it. As a matter of fact the leader on the Republican side recommended the Republicans to vote the most irresponsible way that they possibly can and that is to stand by looking at the stars and vote "present" and then go home and tell people they voted "present" because they could not tell whether they wanted to vote against the President's bad budget or vote for the President's bad budget and here they are now able only to represent their people by voting "present." It should be noted that as an opponent of Gramm-Rudman and one who opposed it and voted against it, I now find it interesting that people would say, "Well, if you adopt the President's budget, you can avoid Gramm-Rudman." Well, I submit that adopting the President's budget would be worse than Gramm-Rudman.

As bad as that is because, unlike Gramm-Rudman that would cut all of the education programs, the President's budget would kill the Guaranteed Student Loan Program in this country dead as a doornail, thereby throwing 2,300,000 young people who are now borrowing money to go to college out of the program, and it would result in losing $8 billion in private capital that we would expect to be invested this year by banks, savings and loans, and credit unions in student loans.

Each of the cuts the President proposes shows, not an attempt to cut as the irresponsible Gramm-Rudman resolution does too deep, they show an attempt to cut the throats of these programs and kill them so that they can never be funded, even when the President and the Congress finally come together and find a way to resolve our fiscal problems in this country.

No one in this country is fooled by the fact that we now are locked with the President saying, I sent a budget to the Congress that will get the job done and save you from Gramm-Rudman, without taxes, without any pain; all the Congress has to do is have the responsibility to adopt that budget and everything is fine. I challenge my friends from the President's party to stand up with your President and do what he has been asking you through the American people for now 3 months, as he started to prepare and then sent us the budget.

Mr. Chairman, today I rise to speak in opposition to the fiscal year 1987 budget recommendations proposed by President Reagan in the area of postsecondary education. This year, as in the 4 previous years, the administration's request would significantly reduce spending for higher education. It demonstrates the low priority which the President and the Secretary of Education place on the education of the American people.

Under the President's recommendations, 2.3 million awards to needy students would be eliminated. Of particular significance is the President's recommendations for the Guaranteed Student Loan Program, which through cutbacks in special allowance, reduced subsidies for students, and reduced reinsurance, would probably result in the demise of the program. This would mean an additional 3.2 million students would be denied Federal education benefits and there would be a reduction of over $8 billion in private capital which is now available to students.

These recommendations follow 5 years of substantially reduced Federal support for postsecondary education:

The Pell Grant Program today includes a half-million more students with family incomes under $12,000 than in 1980. However, over this period, the total number of students in the program has remained the same. That means that the modest increases we have allowed for Pell grants have been absorbed in a losing race to meet the increased needs of families who have no resources to contribute to their children's education. The value of the Pell grant has been eroded by 16 percent in constant dollars.

The availability of other grant aid for needy students has been reduced by almost $3 billion during this period, through the loss of two programs which in the late 1970's provided the largest sources of Federal support for student assistance—social security educational benefits which provided $1.9 billion in benefits in fiscal year 1980 and today have been totally eliminated and veterans educational benefits which have declined from $1.7 billion in fiscal year 1980 to $746 million in fiscal year 1986.

The loss of these programs has increased the importance of supplemental educational opportunity grants, college work study and national direct student loans to needy students. However, appropriations for these programs have been reduced since 1980, and in constant dollars their value has declined by 27 percent.

The President's education budget proposals always contain long explanations of how the Federal role in education is small and Federal funds represent only a small fraction of the total dollars spent each year. While that may be true overall it is not true for student aid; 75 percent of all assistance to students comes from Federal dollars. When the President requests reductions in higher education in excess of 20 percent, as he has this year, he is effectively forcing thousands of needy students to give up their goal of a postsecondary education and he is robbing our future of the brainpower that is necessary to maintain the quality of life we now have and essential to bringing about a better world for all of us.

I urge my colleagues to join me in rejecting this ill-conceived and shortsighted budget.

Mr. Chairman, for 5 years now this administration has been playing recklessly with the pay and benefits of the Federal work force and those who have retired from it, causing serious problems for the Federal Government in its ability to recruit and retain the best people to do the work of the people.

What this means is that we are having great difficulty getting the best qualified people to protect our President, guarantee that our foods and drugs are safe, gather the intelligence that is so important to our security, solve our space problems and do all those things that are so essential to a nation as complex and diverse as ours.

And from my vantage point, it is clear that the administration's latest budget proposal exacerbates the problem with some of the most severe recommendations to date.

I don't think there is any question that if we continue to treat Federal employees and retirees the way we have in recent years we are going to end up with a work force drawn from a pool of those in our society that are unable to find employment anywhere else. The Government will be the employer of last resort and it is the people of this country who pay.

In other words, we will have workers who have been turned away by the private sector performing critical tasks at NASA, the Food and Drug Administration, the FBI, the State Department, the IRS and all the other vital departments and agencies which perform critical services for the people of this Nation.

Since this administration took over, more than $25 billion has been cut from the checks of Federal workers and retirees.

And now, on top of this, the administration wants to extract another pound of flesh from pay, cost-of-living adjustments and mindless changes in the Civil Service Retirement System.

The President had proposed a 5-percent pay cut for this year. This cockeyed idea was rejected by Congress, but the result was that there was not a penny increase. Now the President wants to limit the 1987 increase to a paltry 3 percent.

When taken together with the administration's proposal to increase from 7 to 9 percent the employees' retirement contribution, it would result in an increase of less than $50 a year in take-home pay for the typical GS–5 and less than $20 for the GS–9. For the typical GS–12 it would be a net loss of $63. And a senior executive at ES–4, where we are having real trouble recruiting the best and the brightest, would have a net loss of $348.

The effects of the administration's proposals to base annuities on the high five instead of high 3 salary years, a proposal to penalize early retirees a 2-percent reduction for each year under 62 and limiting future COLA's to the CPI minus 2 percentage points would be horrendous.

According to the GAO, the overall effect of the three proposed benefit reductions would be a loss of a whopping $111,767 over the typical life expectancy of 80 years.

Retirees already have suffered enough over the past 5 years in COLA losses. There was no increase this year as a result of Gramm-Rudman. Now the President wants to eliminate the one due in January 1987. And if Gramm-Rudman is allowed to stand, COLA increases could be denied for 5 straight years.

Mr. Chairman, I just think we have to stop this beating up on Federal employees and retirees now or start paying the piper.

In addition, the President proposes the elimination of the revenue forgone appropriation which will again increase the postage paid by certain types of preferred mailers such as the Salvation Army, Crippled Children's Society, publishers of small rural newspapers. Since December 31, 1985, postage for these groups have increased as much as 173 percent. Also the President would eliminate the free postage now used by the blind and the handicapped.

The President's proposal to increase the Postal Service's payment to the Civil Service Retirement Fund and increase its payment for health insurance for its annuitants could certainly result in increasing the price of a first-class stamp by a penny within the next year.

Mr. Chairman, my Committee on Post Office and Civil Service has recommended that the President's proposals be rejected. I urge the House to follow suit.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1½ minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, the centerpiece of the President's budget is a 12-percent before-inflation increase in Pentagon spending, and we all know that a lot of this has little to do with defense, and it invites waste, and it has very little to do with national security.

So I suggest to our friends that what we ought to do is define national security.

Every time we deny young people a chance to have a college education, we affect our national security, and the President's budget attempts to do that. Every time we eliminate cost of living adjustments for our elderly, this case Federal employees and retirees, we affect the national security of our senior citizens. Every time we eliminate a training program for unemployed, we affect our national security. Every time we eliminate the chance to repair our infrastructures, as the President would have us do in his budget, we affect our national security.

One of the things that deeply concerns me, as someone who represents an urban area, is the wholesale abandonment of our cities, wholesale abandonment. When you look at the President's budget that seeks to cut community development block grant money, guts the UDAG program, the coalition of business and cities working together to create jobs, the elimination of revenue sharing, if you look at his deferrals and rescissions, you know that the President's priority is to abandon our cities, our urban areas.

I want to say that if this does not affect our national security, the abandonment of our American cities, I do not know what does.

Mr. Chairman, the President's fiscal year 1987 budget calls for the largest outlays in our country's history—nearly $1 trillion—yet it would require the American people to accept great sacrifices and move our society into a generation of austerity and decline. The unprecedented $994 billion outlay request should be sufficient to provide for all of our country's priorities, but only if they are allocated in a way that is consistent with our values and genuine national security and domestic needs. The President's budget is out of step with these priorities and should be rejected. I urge my colleagues to vote no on the budget resolution.

The centerpiece of the President's budget is a 12-percent before inflation increase in Pentagon spending. This level of increase invites waste. Very little to do with national security. Over the last several years, the defense community has demonstrated its inability to efficiently administer that level of fiscal resources. In addition to the acceleration of domestic military spending, the President is asking for a $2 billion increase in foreign military aid, a request that amounts to an investment in military adventurism and conflict. To the extent that waste and unnecessary military spending limits our country's ability to meet its other priorities, our national security is weakened. This irresponsible increase in defense spending would be reason enough to reject the President's budget. The unwise request for peacetime austerity is another.

The wholesale cuts in education, employment and training, housing, community development, transportation, agriculture, health, commercial development, retirement security, and numerous other basic services would result in a further unraveling of our social fabric and a disinvestment in our future.

The treatment the President's budget would give the Nation's transportation system is indicative of the skewed values that would relegate our country to a second-class status. The administration budget proposes to cut $5 billion in ground, air, and water transportation. This would turn our Nation's back on the serious but solvable problem of our decaying infrastructure. Neglecting our roads, bridges, airports, harbors, and canals will come back to haunt us with diminished economic activity and in decreased safety.

Related to cutbacks in our transportation system, is the administration's budget proposals that would abandon the cities of our country. The President proposes a 70-percent cut in mass transit. Were this proposal to go into effect, nearly every small transit system would be forced to close. Larger cities would have to implement drastic cuts in service and disruptive fare increases. The victims of the 70-percent cut would be that sector of our society that relies on public transportation—the elderly, the young and those trying to work their way into the economic mainstream by commuting to work on public transportation. In addition to massive cuts in transit, the President's budget would totally eliminate UDAG's, general revenue sharing, and the Ecomomic Development Administration.

At a time when it advocates a transfer of national responsibility to the States the President's budget also includes deep and unwarranted cuts in community development programs that revitalize our cities and urban areas, create jobs and economic growth, and expand the State and Federal tax base. Community development block grants and UDAG's are the very programs this administration should be heralding the loudest. Through a cooperative and successful partnership, public dollars are leveraged with private investment at better than a 5-to-1 ratio. In my own city of Cleveland, OH, $53 million in UDAG money has stimulated $277 million in private investment and the creation of more than 8,000 jobs. The budget would reduce assisted housing expenditures by 91 percent from levels just 4 years ago and impose new taxes in the form of user fees on Federal housing credit agencies that make home ownership possible for millions of Americans. The President's budget for community development gives clear and indisputable evidence that his administration has no urban policy.

Implementation of the President's budget would not only affect the health of our Nation's cities and towns, it would also affect the health of the people who live in every community of our land. Under the administration's proposal, Medicare would be cut by $55 billion over the next 5 years and $17.2 billion of that would come directly from the pockets of our hard-pressed senior citizens. Right now, Medicare covers less than half an elderly citizen's health care bills. Instead of looking for ways to provide more comprehensive health care coverage, the administration seeks to transfer costs onto the backs of those least able to pay, our elderly Americans.

The President's budget would also shortchange young Americans, who constitute our country's future. Education, the most important and the most basic investment we can make, would be cut more than 15 percent from current levels. Middle-class parents trying to give their children a college education, low-income parents, parents of the disadvantaged, and the handicapped will all find it more difficult, perhaps impossible, to provide their children with the tools they need to cope with a changing future. In such a case, the whole country would suffer.

The administration's proposals for Federal employees and annuitants are another strong reason to reject the President's budget. While the budget would provide a 3-percent pay increase for civilian employees, it would take back more than that in retirement and benefit cuts, in a series of complex proposals that have been submitted by the President in previous years and have been rejected by this and previous Congresses. The proposals were rejected because they were unfair. Federal employees are not faceless bureaucrats. They are scientists at the National Institute of Health, seeking a cure for cancer. They are letter carriers and postal employees, law enforcement officers, astronauts, and other dedicated professionals who provide the American people with vital services. Their wages and benefits already lag far behind those of their counterparts in the private sector. Implementation of the President's budget proposals would have a severe impact on the morale and productivity of Federal employees, as well as on the vital services that they provide their fellow citizens.

The budget that the President is asking Congress to approve proposes an America in decline, an America that is unable to educate its children, unwilling to accept the moral obligation to provide a dignified retirement for its senior citizens and an America that is no longer capable of providing for the basic services of civilized society. I do not believe that America is in decline. We can and must allocate our budget resources in such a manner that continues our progress to a sound and proud future for our country and its citizens. I urge my colleagues to reject the administration budget and its priorities so that we can address the real needs of our society in a responsible budget resolution that reflects our values and our priorities.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS].

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding and rise in strong opposition to House Concurrent Resolution 296, President Reagan's fiscal year 1987 budget.

Mr. Chairman, what a dirty, rotten trick we are playing on the Republican Members of this House. We are giving them the chance to vote yes or no on the budget of the President whose policies they claim to support. That is absolutely diabolical. How dare we do that to them.

Although they think that is awful for us to do that, I have not heard anybody on the Republican side say that they disagree with the President's policy of doubling military expenditures, of giving windfall tax benefits to the wealthiest corporations and individuals in this country. They seem to be in favor of devastating the domestic programs of this country. That is what the President's budget does.

I say to my Republican colleagues: If you favor the President's policy, here is your chance. Vote for it. Then we will see once and for all whether you are for essential programs for the people of this country or whether you are for Ronald Reagan's destructive policies.

Mr. Chairman, in its broad outline, this budget is not unlike the previous Reagan budgets. It endangers the future of our Nation by ignoring the pressing needs of the American people. Instead, it feeds the unceasing appetite of the Pentagon for more and more heinous weapons of destruction—weapons that make our survival on this planet more tenuous with each passing day.

What are the priorities of Ronald Reagan?

The President does not believe in affordable housing, so he is shutting the middle class out of the markets and throwing the poor out on the streets.

The President does not believe in quality health care, so he is cutting Medicare by 14 percent in the next 5 years and forcing older Americans to make impossible choices between basic human needs.

The President does not think the AIDS epidemic demands an immediate response, so he is slashing funding for research and control of this devastating and tragic disease.

The President does not believe in quality education, so he is reducing college financial aid programs by 25 percent and disrupting the educational plans of millions of students.

The President wants to make scapegoats of Federal workers, so he is reducing their retirement benefits and capping their pay.

And he wants to stab our State and local governments in the back, so he is terminating the Federal Revenue Sharing Program, slashing social services, and derailing mass transit.

But what the President takes with one hand he will give with the other. The Pentagon will receive another windfall bonanza—another opportunity to go on a shopping spree in the supermarket of gold-plated, destabilizing weaponry. For this year, the President wants a 12-percent defense increase. For the next 5 years, he wants the taxpayers to kick in $1.8 trillion more than we have already spent for defense.

The President's budget is setting America back. It sets our people back. It sets our economy back. And it sets our arms control efforts back.

Even worse, the President is not being honest with the American people. First as a candidate and then as our President, Ronald Reagan has railed against our massive deficits. We all know what all that rhetoric has led to: the biggest deficits ever, a doubling of our national debt, and rapidly escalating interest costs that must be borne by the taxpayers.

However, we now know that the President has never wanted to reduce the deficit. Rather, he has purposefully created the massive deficits of the last 5 years in order to convince Congress and the American people that we cannot afford domestic spending programs any longer.

Last year, the President endorsed the Gramm-Rudman law that forces declining deficits in the coming years. But this year, he had to use unrealistic economic assumptions and fudged defense numbers to pretend that he is meeting the Gramm-Rudman targets.

All the rhetoric and all the posturing will not hide the real motive of Reagan's budget policy. The President wants to completely eliminate the progressive achievements of the past 50 years. This is what the President's budget is all about. This is what Gramm-Rudman is all about. This is what is threatening the future of our Nation. And this is what we must reject out of hand in this body.

Until Congress and the President are willing to cut excessive military spending and raise more revenue by closing unfair tax loopholes, there will be no solution to the deficit crisis. Instead, the American people will continue to bear the burden of a budget that ignores their wishes and disregards their needs.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to reject the Reagan budget of despair.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, before I yield to the gentleman from California, I would just tell the Members that a new head of the World Bank has been announced, our former colleague, Barber Conable. I thought the membership might like to hear that.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN].

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I come to the well on that good news about our former colleague, Mr. Conable. The first thought that flashed through my mind and why we received applause from both sides of the House is we will get phone calls answered from the vaunted World Bank. It is nice to see former Members in positions where they can interact with this great body and the other body.

My colleagues, you can feel the pain in the well. Those of you who are not Californians probably do not remember a line of our great President when he was running for Governor in California. He said, "It should hurt when you pay taxes." I guess the budget process should hurt also. As much respect as I have for my Chairman, I hope the gentleman does not mind my observing that, because of his good nature, some people might not notice that it is painful to have the job that the Chairman has. It is very difficult.

I have no problem. As my distinguished colleague from New York said, it is a dirty trick; it is fine for me to stand up and support the President's budget. I have not had the fun of voting for the President's budget since 1981, when Mr. JONES' budget went down and we had that last opportunity. I look forward to it.

Mr. Chariman, I have heard a lot of talk about priorities from my colleagues on the other side of the aisle and I have to say that it is certainly clear from their statements that they do not share the President's priorities. However, that is all we have heard from them—what their priorities are remain a mystery.

I now want to share with my colleagues an excerpt from a recent article by David Broder that appeared in the Washington Post that may shed some light on the Democrat's budget strategy for the year. Mr. Broder wrote:

> The real reason House Democrats dodge the tax question is that many of them have concluded that their party cannot regain power until more voters feel real pain from the Reagan-imposed budget cuts.
> One of O'NEILL's close associates told me, "Our strategy is to be sure the Republican Party has its name emblazoned on every program cut * * *. It may take more than a few months for the middle-class families to feel the painful effects, but inside 2 years, they will know the price of supply-side politics."

Now I ask my colleagues, what has happened to the vaunted Democratic capacity for compassion?

It is amazing that the same Democrats who so roundly ridiculed Gramm-Rudman as an "abrogation of responsibility" are now eager to see its irresponsible sequestering provisions go into effect. It is amazing that the same Democrats who whine the loudest about the President's budget don't have one of their own to offer. It is amazing that we are wasting valuable time here today so that the Democrats can engage in a little President-bashing.

My colleagues from California recently cited some polls showing that the American people are not in favor of reducing spending on health programs. I am glad my colleague is so responsive to the will of the people because I have a couple of polls I would like to share with my colleagues.

When asked if they favored spending cuts or tax increases as the best way to balance the budget, a New York Time/CBS News poll showed that 83 percent of those polled favored spending cuts, while only 7 percent favored tax increases. Another 7 percent said some combination of both was the way to go. I hope my colleague keeps this poll and those numbers in mind when it comes time to debate the democratic budget.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ATKINS] a member of the committee.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, much has been made today of the question of whether the House leadership acted in good faith in bringing this budget to the floor today. I think the real question is whether the administration acted in good faith in submitting it to the Congress in the first place.

In the swirl of numbers that make up this year's Federal budget debate, one number is more equal than all the others. Three months ago, when Congress passed and the President signed into law the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Reduction Act, we agreed that the deficit for 1987 would be $144 billion.

The administration's budget does not meet that requirement of law. In fact, it misses by $16 billion, and a careful examination of the overspending would suggest that it is the result of deliberate policy decisions.

The Congessional Budget Office, in its annual reestimate of the President's budget, calculates that the defense outlays resulting from the administration's budget request will be $296.7 billion, rather than $282.2 billion as the administration claims. It stretches credibility to suppose that the extra $14.5 billion for the Pentagon is an accident.

At issue is the technical question of how fast the budget authority requested by the President will spend out. CBO uses spendout rates that follow historical averages under this administration. Those rates, applied to the period 1980 to 1985, yielded outlays within 2 to 4 percent of what they actually turned out to be.

Furthermore, CBO's estimates adhere to outlay rates published by the Defense Department of its financial summary tables, which were released at the same time as its 1987 budget. DOD's own numbers offer outlay projections much higher than the administration proposes, virtually identical to CBO's.

CBO and the administration have never had outlay estimating differences of this magnitude before. In contrast to the $14.5 billion difference for 1987, the average difference from 1980 to 1985 was less than $400 million. In no year was it greater than $700 million.

The administration might have gotten away with the disappearing outlays trick if they'd limited it to 1987. But they blew it when they tried the same trick for each of the next 4 years.

Any magician worth his wand knows you can never explain your sleight-of-hand. As soon as people know how it's done, the magic is over and the show closes.

The administration justifies its lower outlay estimates for 1987 on the basis of policy and management changes that will slow the spendout of funds. The problem is that simple logic dictates that the 1987 budget authority has to spend out, and thus be counted against the deficit, sooner or later. If outlays are less now, they will be more later. For the administration's budget to ring true, the outlay savings claimed in 1987 would have to be offset by increased outlays in the outyears.

But the bell clangs. CBO, using historical outlay rates, estimates that in each of the next 5 years the administration has understated defense outlays by amounts that far surpass any technical estimating differences in past years. The difference is $14.5 billion in 1987, $17.5 billion in 1988, $13.8 billion in 1989, $11.7 billion in 1990, $10.6 billion in 1991. A total of $68 billion over 5 years in unspent budget authority.

Holding back on the Pentagon's pursestrings has not been a distinguishing characteristic of this administration. In fact, Cap Weinberger has specifically rejected stretchouts of military spending. Yet most of the outlay savings claimed here are from management initiatives that amount to paying contractors more slowly and stretching out production schedules.

Maybe the administration is planning never to spend the money. Or maybe they're looking for a way to exempt the Pentagon from the reductions mandated by Gramm-Rudman.

The real trick here is that, as usual, the administration is trying to turn defense budget increases into domestic budget cuts. If the hidden outlays trick worked, the budget snapshot taken by CBO and OMB would show that the deficit was $14.5 billion above the target. Then the sequestration order would take half the savings needed to get down to $144 billion from domestic and half from defense. Presto. The domestic budget picked up half the tab for the increase in defense spending.

CBO's technical estimates also found that the administration's budget understated outlays in other areas. In agriculture, OCS receipts, and the sale of the naval petroleum reserves and the power marketing administrations, CBO finds $3.6 billion in differences. In all other areas of the budget combined, another $1.1 billion would be added to the budget deficit. When all is accounted for, the president has missed by $17.9 billion. The budget should be rejected.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DERRICK], a senior member of the committee.

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I am vitally concerned about rural America and what the President's budget would mean to the agricultural and rural portions of our country. His budget would terminate nine major programs of benefit to rural America, including the elimination of Farmers Home rural housing loans and Farmers Home rural water and waste disposal grants, termination of conservation programs in the ASCS, elimination of the Appalachian Regional Commission, the Economic Development Administration, and the phaseout of the Rural Electric District Loan Program by 1991.

In addition, he proposes significant reductions in other programs affecting the agricultural and rural sections of our country—reductions that will have a severe impact on my State of South Carolina—a part of the country still struggling to recover from the recession. Last year the President proposed a 39-percent reduction for programs directly serving our rural citizens. Even though the Congress did not agree to all of these cuts, substantial reductions were made by the Congress in this area. Now, the President has come back again proposing a 20.5-percent reduction.

For example, his budget requests a 57-percent cut in Federal funding for the Agricultural Extension Service. This is a very beneficial program which has been in existence since 1914. It works through the Department of Agriculture and the land-grant colleges to provide practical assistance in agriculture. Those being helped by this program are given information and assistance on issues ranging from pesticides, to fertilizers, to animal management, to 4-H Club work for our youth, to helping a low-income homemaker stretch the food dollar into the most nutritional diet possible for the family. On top of all this, it is the only Federal program providing direct support to farmers facing the possible trauma of foreclosure. In my district and I am sure that of my colleagues from rural areas, this program has had a tremendous impact on the quality of life. It represents one of the most desirable commitments our Government can make to its citizens—that of teaching people to help themselves.

The President also wants to privatize the Federal Crop Insurance Program by phasing out all Federal subsidies for crop insurance premiums and operations by 1991. This program provides the only viable disaster protection available to farmers. I fear that without the Federal support for this insurance program and with current conditions in the farm economy, this vital protection would be priced out of the market for farmers as they would simply be unable to pay the premiums. I might also add that loan assistance is not available unless the farmer has the insurance protection.

I have been provided statistics for South Carolina which indicate the average premium cost per acre for insurance would be increased from $16.15 per acre to $51.48 per acre. With such premium increases, many farmers will be faced with the unavoidable decision of leaving the farming business because they cannot afford the cost of insurance or going without it and facing sure financial ruin if a natural disaster such as a tornado, hailstorm, or unseasonable cold weather struck. If this happens, the political pressure would be on the Congress to provide other disaster assistance, which would be far more costly than the crop insurance premium subsidy.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure that I don't have to remind my colleagues that our farmers are struggling to survive the worst economic times since the Great Depression. We have had sharp increases in farm loan delinquencies and bankruptcies. Our farm exports are declining. At the same time, the Federal Government has provided necessary support to farmers. Can you imagine what the financial distress in the farm community would have been without this help?

There is not just one cause for this situation and there are no easy fixes. The Congress is reassessing its role in agriculture through the 1985 farm bill, enacted this past December. This legislation represents a significant shift in the focus of agriculture policy by helping to make American commodities more competitive in world markets, protecting farm income by freezing target prices, and by conservation programs to protect land from overproduction.

I urge my colleagues to give the farm bill a chance to work—to strengthen our farmers—and not agree to the President's proposals for farm policy such as the insurance program or useful extension service support. To support his policies would further hamper our farmers in recovering from their difficulties and once again becoming a very vital sector in the American economy.

Mr. Chairman, if I may continue, in the section of the budget affecting Commerce and Housing Credit, I want to call the attention of my colleagues to just a couple of areas in the President's budget which cause me great concern—his proposals regarding rural housing and the revenue forgone postal subsidy.

The Rural Housing Program operated by the Farmers Home Administration is targeted to very low-income households. The average income of participants is at or below the poverty level—$10,600. Since its inception, over 2 million disadvantaged rural households have received assistance through Farmers Home.

The President proposes termination of the Farmers Home Administration Rural Housing Program, and transfer of this function to the Department of Housing and Urban Development, but his budget proposes no new loan commitments in fiscal year 1987. If his proposals are accepted, Federal spending for low-income housing will drop from about $13 billion in fiscal year 1986 to $2 billion in 1987. Assisted housing units will drop from 175,000 to 50,000. Over 15,000 rental assistance contracts specifically targeted to the very low-income and elderly participants would expire.

As my colleagues will recall, the Congress in fiscal year 1986 reduced rural housing lending by 40 percent. I fully realize that all areas of Federal spending need to be carefully looked at for savings, but I submit to you that this program has received its fair share and the need for this assistance is still overwhelming. Over 2 million rural households live in substandard housing. Over 1 million rural units are without complete plumbing, another million are overcrowded, over 2 million lack adequate drinking water, close to 17 million lack adequate waste disposal, and over a million rural residents with incomes of less than $10,000 pay more than 35 percent of their income for housing costs.

We have made tremendous progress in improving the quality of housing in rural communities over the past decade. Termination of these programs means an end to this progress while the need is still so great. Thus, the President's proposals should be rejected.

In addition, the President proposes termination of the revenue forgone postal subsidy which reduces postal rates for various classes of nonprofit uses. This would mean that the postal subsidy which goes to the blind and handicapped, rural newspapers, libraries and schools, as well as charitable organizations would be eliminated—resulting in sharply increased postal rates for these groups.

Mr. Chairman, already this year these groups have experienced significant increases in their postal costs. Due to action taken by the Congress in fiscal year 1986 and the sequestration on March 1, 1986, the funding assistance provided by the Congress has dropped from $1.04 billion in 1985 to $716 million in 1986. This has resulted in postal rates increasing anywhere from 10 to 19 percent for these uses. For example, a rural newspaper in my home area has advised me that just last month their postal rate went up 16 percent.

Again, this area should not be exempt from its share of reductions, but a drastic termination of the postal subsidy such as the President proposes cannot be absorbed all at once without severe disruption in the services and activities provided for the users of this subsidy.

Mr. Chairman, the thoughts I have shared here today represent just a few of the areas where the President's budget does not meet the needs of our citizens. I urge its rejection.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the Chair how much time is remaining for both sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] has 12 minutes remaining and the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN] has 12 minutes remaining.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER].

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, the President wanted a vote on his budget and he will have it today. This President's budget is isolated from reality. I want to address just one part of the fantasy: The Reagan defense number—an increase of $34 billion in Defense budget authority—$34 billion in addition to the $100 billion already added into the Reagan years while everything else has been cut.

Once again, the President has submitted a budget that would mean another early Christmas for the military-industrial complex, while showing little mercy or compassion for middle America and those who are vulnerable: the sick, the elderly, the homeless, the students, the veterans, and the poor children of this country.

If we have learned one thing over the past several years, it is that there is waste at the Pentagon; that there is room in the military budget for belt tightening.

Let me briefly review some of the facts which prove this point:

A 26-cent plastic stool cap that the Air Force paid over $900 for and whose price tag jumped to $1,100 a year later.

A $9,600 Allen wrench, courtesy of General Dynamics. The original price, before minor modifications, was 8 cents.

A $435 claw hammer.

A $7,600 coffee brewer, built to withstand an airplane crash that would kill all coffee drinkers on board.

And what is the President's reaction to these facts? He adds another $34 billion to the Defense budget.

In August 1985, Secretary of Defense Weinberger canceled the Divad air defense gun. It couldn't hit the targets it was designed for, but it was great at locking onto latrine fans. Cost to the taxpayer: $1.8 billion.

In light of the budget deficit, the Congressional Budget Office has suggested the AMRAAM missile could be canceled, because it has had performance and cost problems and is more than 2 years behind schedule. I hope the Armed Service Committee heeds the CBO's recommendation. Cost to the U.S. Government so far: $1 billion.

The General Accounting Office has just concluded that the Army did not conduct realistic testing of the Bradley infantry fighting vehicle. In truth, the $1.7 million dollar apiece troop carrier is a deathtrap for the soliders inside. And I commend my colleagues, MEL LEVINE and DENNY SMITH for their commitment to exposing the Bradley's problems. The CBO has also placed the Bradley on its budget deficit hit list. But the Pentagon wants to spend $13 billion more for the Bradley.

And despite these facts, the President's budget includes $34 billion more for the Pentagon.

Last year we heard about contractors charging the Government for dog kennel fees, country club memberships, and trips to Swedish massage parlors.

And the President wants to increase the Pentagon's budget by $34 billion.

Last year, Secretary Weinberger admitted to having an extra $4 billion to play with because he overbudgeted for inflation. This year, the GAO tells us, the Pentagon will wind up with an extra $7½ billion for the same reason.

And what does the President do? He wants another $34 billion for the Defense budget.

We've all heard about former Assistant Secretary of the Navy, George Sawyer, who negotiated contracts with General Dynamics while he was negotiating for a job with that company.

We're also familiar with the fact that eight Army officers involved in either the testing or development of the Ford aerospace prototype of late Divad air defense gun, went to work for that company or its subcontractors.

There are hundreds and hundreds of cases of revolving door, an obvious sign that there has been little accountability at the Pentagon.

And what does the President do? He asks us for $34 billion more for the Pentagon.

This administration has had its way long enough. But they have gone too far. The times, they are changing. The same administration that gave us unprecedented budget deficits and endorsed Gramm-Rudman, now has to accept the consequences.

In the process of balancing the budget, we are going to have to balance our priorities. Unfortunately, this President's priorities are out of whack. We can no longer allow him to keep feeding the Pentagon's insatiable appetite, while ignoring those in our country who go hungry. One in four children in America are poor. And what does the President do? He adds $34 billion to the Defense budget.

And how does he pay for it? He cuts the same amount from domestic programs, from small business, from transit, from local government, from health, from education, from everything else.

Mr. President, we do not support your budget. It is a mean-spirited and isolated document and its priorities do not match those of the American people.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OWENS].

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the President's budget.

Mr. Chairman, the President's budget presently being debated tramples on the people of the 12th Congressional District of New York. This budget represents the spirit of Ebenezer Scrooge and is unworthy of the richest Nation in the world. The President's budget represents a poverty of spirit and a poverty of vision. At a time when American corporations are earning more money than ever before, at a time when the stock market is booming, we are behaving as if the national Treasury is on the verge of bankruptcy. The American Colossus has the capacity to meet the needs of all Americans. We can prepare for the future by educating all who need to be educated. We can provide decent housing and adequate food for all.

The problem is not a lack of resources. The problem is a lack of will. The President appeals to the worst instincts of Americans while at the same time he camouflages the real waste in the budget. This budget is a coverup for 5 years of bad judgments made by Ronald Reagan. Each Member of this House who cares about the future of this country should join me in voting no on this spirit of Ebenezer Scrooge. The American people and the people of the world deserve better leadership and a better use of the abundant resources which God has made available to America.

Mr GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LEATH], a member of the committee.

Mr. LEATH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, obviously there are some on my side of the aisle who would bring this budget before us today, naked as it is, for purely partisan reasons. I happen not to be one of those. I am not one of those who would do that because I think I have proven that in the past. And let me remind my Republican colleagues that this Member does have considerable credibility as a nonpartisan player on an issue such as this, as I have joined with you on numerous occasions in the past, in direct contradiction to my own party.

But that was back in the old days, 1981 and 1982, when it appeared that this President was much more concerned about deficit spending than he has been for the last 3 or 4 years.

So why, then, today should we examine this budget and look at this budget and focus on this budget?

Purely and simply, because this is the fourth budget in a row that this President has sent to this Hill that is nothing more than a real giggler. Of the three previous proposals that the President has sent here, two were never even brought up. The one that was brought up received one vote on the floor of this House.

Now, I ask you: Is a proposal like that, whether it be from me or from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] or the President of the United States, a serious and honest proposal?

Absolutely not. I do not think anybody can claim that it is.

Year after year we get these budgets from the President, we look at them and we giggle and we throw them in the can, and then we attempt to sit down and write one on our own while the President sits down there in the convenience of the Oval Office and criticizes the Congress for not doing its job. "Why don't you do what I asked you to do, and we won't have these problems."

Then we spend the rest of the year listening to the White House tell the American people, "If only they would have done what I ask them to do, we would not have these deficits."

Well, Mr. President, today we are going to lay your 1987 budget on the table and we are going to dissect it as we have here now for several hours, we are going to debate it, we are going to ask the people's House how serious you are.

I for one want to know, before I go any further trying to write a budget, just how right you are, Mr. President.

I want you, Mr. President, to be an honest broker in this game. That is all I ask you to do. I want you to be realistic. I want you to, finally, once and for all, understand what Gramm-Rudman is and understand what it is going to do to the defense of this country and what it is going to do to other programs in the domestic part of this budget that do not need cutting if we do not face up to this problem.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON].

Mr. EMERSON. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I will vote "no" on the proposition this afternoon, for several reasons. The first is, of course, that I do not agree with all of the President's budget proposals, although I do agree with many and I do agree with the target numbers. Modifications of his priorities are in order. That is to be expected. But this resolution has not even been treated with the normal, ordinary, mundane, legislative consideration or courtesy that we would give to any "commemorative observance" bill. I resent the process that is being foisted upon us this afternoon; a real ruse, a charade, a rhetorical Reagan-bashing exercise that does not become the House.

This House should have a higher sense of responsibility than to purport that there is real meaning in what has been done here today. There is no opportunity in this exercise to reprioritize or for the House to make any input into the process based on the concerns of our constituents.

Of course we will have that opportunity to be involved in the weeks and months ahead, if we ever get down to our own budget process.

This House, the other body and the President should work sensitively with each other in addressing the deficits, one of the most serious problems and concerns on the agenda, do it seriously and stand back from this game-playing, this sophomoric game-playing.

It is, after all, time for us to admit, time for this House to admit, that no President ever spent a nickel that was not authorized and appropriated by the Congress.

It is time for us to get on with legislating, not sequestrating, of seeing the budget process work as it should rather than going through these charades.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER] a member of the committee.

Mr. SCHUMER. I thank the distinguished Chairman for giving me some time this afternoon.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard a lot of rhetoric. Most of it has really come from the people saying that this side of the aisle is rhetoric.

Let me say to my friends on the other side of the aisle that only one of you today, a gentleman from Texas, had the courage to say he was for the President's budget. We have heard words like "charade" and we have heard words like "political" and we have had people holding up pads that are blank, but only one person on the other side of the aisle has screwed his courage to the sticking board and said, "I'll back my President."

Ladies and gentlemen, if this exercise is a charade, then the President's budget is a charade. And, conversely, if the President's budget is real, then this exercise is real, because all we are doing, no more, no less, is asking every Member of this House to say yes or no to the President on the President's budget priorities.

And why is there such consternation, confusion and, yes, rhetoric from that side of the aisle? Because there is a lot of squirming going on. The leader of their party and the people on that side of the aisle simply disagree in priorities.

Would it not be more honest, would it not be more fair, would it not be more effective back in your districts to simply say, "Mr. President, we disagree with your priorities. You are a good President, you are the leader of our party, but we disagree on priorities."

That would be the honest thing to do. But instead of examining the President's budget, instead of admitting that you simply do not like it, no more, no less, you attack the Democrats.

Members of this body, that attack will not wash. That attack will not wash; it will not work. Your vote will be the ultimate arbiter of what happens today. There will be a yes or there will be a no, and maybe there will be a few people abstaining or not voting.

But that is what we will leave. That is what will be at the end of today. Not all the language, not all the accusations but a yes or a no. Are you with your President or are you against him?

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE].

Mr. CONTE. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Committee, I have been watching this debate and listening to it all day, and it really is a sham.

I, for one, standing in this well, do not like the President's budget, and I will vote against the President's budget. But to hear that other side get up, one after another, and say what the President's budget is going to do is a sham, because over 100 Democrats voted for Gramm-Rudman.

I pleaded here in this well, I told you what Gramm-Rudman was going to do too. Look at education. On March 1, you bleeding hearts, 290,000 students went off the Pell grants in this country of ours because of your vote.

At least 500 older Americans will not get safe and decent subsidized housing because of your vote.

Nine million fewer meals on wheels will be served because of your vote.

You hurt the air controllers, you hurt the Coast Guard which was cut by $86 million, you hurt the Customs which was cut by $34 million; everybody got cut across-the-board, 4.3 percent. And do you know why you voted for Gramm-Rudman? Because you did not have the guts to make the proper cuts.

You were hoping that sequestration would do the job for you. I happen to be one of the 12 guys that brought suit against Gramm-Rudman, and the 3-judge court down at the District Court ruled in our favor. Hopefully, the Supreme Court will rule in our favor.

You did not have the guts to make the tough cuts, and to make the tough choices. You were all going to hide behind sequestration, and then when your constituents came to you, the students came to you the health professions came to you, the social programs came to you; you were going to say, "Hey, I am with you. I am with you, but that is sequestration. Those awful people down there did it; we did not do it."

You wanted the President to handle sequestration. But now, after the Supreme Court rules, you are going to have to make those tough decisions. You do not like the President's budget; I do not like it. But what are you going to come up with? You have only got a couple more weeks. April 15 is the deadline, and we just cannot wait to see that beautiful budget you'll come up with.

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Chairman, consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 296 makes a sham of the entire legislative process. The Democrats in Congress, who control the purse strings, who control the staff, who control the committees, are bringing to the House floor a budget bill that has not been considered by any subcommittee, any committee, or any public forum at all.

We are expected to vote on a bill that has not been examined at all by those Members who are charged to do so. This, in the old phrase, is a pig in a poke. Instead of meeting the hard challenge of constructing a budget to meet our national needs, the Budget Committee, with no notice to anyone is simply dumping the President's budget out on the floor for an up or down vote.

The Democrats have not even taken the time to construct an alternative budget. That says either they so wholeheartedly agree with the President or they simply don't care enough about the budget of the United States to take a serious approach and come up with a serious alternative.

Public policy, particularly public budgets, are always a matter of choices. I have consistently stated that I would prefer the President's budget, with all its flaws, to the consequences of the Gramm-Rudman sequestration process. But, I never imagined that that is all this House would consider. We, and the American people deserve to look at and make choices about this budget.

The legislative procedure used now by the Democrats ignores the need for a democratic society to have choices. The Democrats are using this tactic to simply vent their complaints about the President's budget. That's fine. But where are the choices? If they have problems with the President's budget, then they should offer an alternative, or at least allow the rest of us to offer alternatives.

In failing to come up with legitimate alternatives, the Democrats abandon their shared responsibility with the executive branch to govern this country. By ordering this vote in this fashion, the Democrats are failing in their constitutional responsibility to hold the purse-strings of this Government.

Because this vote fails to give me or my constituents any choices in setting Federal budget priorities, and because this vote represents an abdication of our solemn responsibility as Members of the U.S. House of Representatives, and is merely a Democratic political ploy. I am compelled to vote present to protest this unseemly and politically inspired legislation.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, failure to address persistent budget deficits of unprecedented magnitude would wreak such havoc on our way of life that this Congress, just a few months ago, in an extraordinary show of bipartisanship, passed an extraordinary measure, the Gramm-Rudman-Obey amendment.

The bipartisan support for that mechanism, not the mechanism itself, is the most promising development in the struggle to overcome the deficit.

Now that we're committed to reducing the fiscal 1987 deficit to $144 billion, there's only one way to do it. Republicans and Democrats in this House must set aside their partisan differences and work together.

Mr. Chairman, bringing the President's budget to the floor, knowing full well that there aren't enough votes to pass it, may be a good way to embarrass the minority in this House, but it's no way to cut the deficit.

Let's go ahead and have the vote. We all know what the outcome will be. And then let's put aside this partisan posturing and work together to develop a budget. The American people don't want games. They want us to deliver on our promise of progress toward a balanced budget.

Mr. HUTTO. Mr. Chairman, I am voting present on the President's budget because I do not think it means a thing. It is purely an exercise since the Budget Committee has not yet marked up a budget resolution establishing a figure to be used by the authorizing committees and the Appropriations Committee to meet the $144 billion deficit figure for fiscal year 1987.

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the administration's proposed budget for fiscal year 1987. This budget reflects the same priorities that have characterized the administration's budgets in the past: large increases in defense spending and foreign assistance and deep cuts in domestic spending.

We need a strong defense—but we can never have a strong defense unless it is backed by a strong country—strength that can only come by developing our Nation's resources—our real wealth—with an educated, healthy populace, with adequate food and nutrition flowing from a strong agriculture base.

The administration, however, proposes to exempt the Defense Department from the budget cuts required to meet the Gramm-Rudman deficit limits. Instead, the Reagan budget would increase defense appropriations by $34 billion—12 percent—in fiscal year 1987, and by 42 percent over the next 5 years, the same period in which the Gramm-Rudman law would require the complete elimination of the deficit. The administration's plan for domestic programs, on the other hand, is quite different: Deep cuts in virtually every portion of the domestic budget, with Social Security Benefits the major exception. The Reagan budget would cut domestic spending $22 billion below current spending levels and $28 billion below what is needed to maintain current services.

Today, our national debt has doubled to over $2 trillion and large sections of our Nation's industry are bankrupt. The textile industry is facing bankruptcy from imports—with similar disasters in shoes and steel and others. Land values have dropped as much as 75 percent. In 1985 more banks failed in any year since the Depression. Of course we need a strong defense but we must also have a strong economy. The drastic cuts proposed in this budget would preclude the growth by business and industry that is needed to attain economic vitality.

More than 40 domestic programs would be completely eliminated under the President's budget. Many of these programs are essential to my district and the Nation such as the Small Business Administration, the Appalachian Regional Commission, community urban development and action grants, and general revenue sharing. Our farmers would be deeply hurt by the elimination of the agriculture conservation programs, the rural development programs, farm loan programs and agriculture research and extension.

This budget would deprive hundreds of thousands of low- and middle-income students of the opportunity for a college education by making it much harder for their families to obtain the financial help they need. Drastic cuts in funding and changes in student financial aid programs would eliminate 2 million student aid awards and reduce 1 million more. The proposed changes in the guaranteed Student Loan Program may force many banks to stop issuing student loans altogether thereby leaving even more students without any financial aid. This budget would slash vocational education and severly cut funds for handicapped education.

This budget would shut hundreds of thousands of middle-income families out of the housing market, leveling disastrous effects on home builders and realtors.

As you can see from these facts, clearly, an increase of nearly $2 billion in fiscal year 1987 for foreign assistance is unconscionable. We must prioritize to make this country grow and prosper and we cannot continue to subsidize to make this country grow and prosper and we cannot continue to subsidize foreign governments at the expense of our own farmers, steel and textile workers. We must continue to maintain a reliable flow of Federal support to cost-effective programs that enlarge and enrich our human and physical resources and our capacity for innovative research and development. The administration's budget will not meet those goals. I urge my colleagues to join with me in voicing strong opposition to this proposal.

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Chairman, as whip of the freshman class, I have had the honor and privilege of working closely with the leadership of my party to advocate a responsible budget process in this House.

The debate here today strongly suggests that our message has fallen on deaf ears.

Today, we are playing a cruel game with sensitive issues affecting millions of Americans. Today's budget vote was a sham of the worst kind.

Many members of the House on both sides of the aisle are waiting for the majority leadership to take responsible action. We want a budget resolution that reflects the sense of the Congress.

When the Gramm-Rudman bill passed the House with a strong bipartisan vote, 271-154, Congress committed itself to a policy of spending limits designed to end deficit spending. The majority leadership must know that its failure to develop a responsible budget within deficit-reduction targets by the appointed deadline will result in an automatic meat-ax approach to fiscal responsibility. But, in spite of that knowledge, today's vote brings us one step closer to the inevitable.

We want to reassure the people that the House is capable of producing a budget resolution by April 15 that ends the uncertainty created by congressional inaction.

All we got today was a meaningless vote that covers up the facts of life in the House.

The facts are that it is March and we have not even started the real budget process in the House.

The facts are that there was nothing sincere or genuine in this highly irregular vote on the President's budget proposal, which was conducted without the benefit of due process.

President Reagan met his legal requirement by delivering a budget to Congress more than a month ago. Obviously, the decisionmakers in the House have chosen to make no decision, to offer no new ideas for solving a serious problem, and to let the clock run on the budget process.

The facts are that we are 8 legislative days away from a required vote on a budget resolution, and the majority leadership has abdicated its responsibility to lead by turning the budget process into a media show.

With this action today, the handwriting is on the wall. During the years before World War II, Winston Churchill watched the clock tick away the wasted hours as British Government ignored the obvious and failed to prepare for their own defense.

Today, those of us who were present for this vote remember that Churchill was rewarded for his constant vigilance with leadership in time of crisis.

Our time of crisis is coming. I hope we, too, will be blessed with leadership when it counts.

Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Chairman, with the submission of the President's 1987 budget plan, the administration has launched its fiscal year 1987 strategy to cripple domestic programs such as health, housing and education while favoring and protecting military spending. If the administration's budget passes and if what many consider to be optimistic revenue estimates turn out to be low, Gramm-Rudman-Hollings will trigger on October 1 and bring a second devasting round of cuts to domestic programs already decimated by the administration's budget plan.

In the administration's budget, OMB estimates the 1987 Federal deficit exceeds the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings targets by only $38 billion—partly due to optimistic revenue estimates. If revenues are lower, deficits will be higher and will likely trigger Gramm-Rudman-Hollings sequestrations.

The Reagan administration's plan for 12 percent growth—8 percent real growth—in defense budget authority ignores deficit reduction priorities established by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. If enacted as presented, the administration's budget will shelter defense from the full magnitude of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. Meanwhile, programs for the poor, elderly and disadvantaged face double jeopardy: cuts under the Reagan administration's budget as well as under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

Over the next 5 years, the budget makes deep cuts in HUD-assisted housing—$29.1 billion, Medicare—$53.8 billion, and Medicaid—$17.1 billion. Once again, the administration shows its disregard for the American life support system protecting millions of vulnerable Americans of all ages. It's tragic that the President proposes to defer, rescind, or eliminate virtually all low-income housing assistance—not based on whether these programs have proven to be successful or not—but rather based on the misconception that we cannot affort to assist the poorest of Americans.

America's health support system is placed in serious jeopardy. Raising the Medicare part B annual premium 82 percent to $452 per year in 1991 and increasing the part B deductible $45 by 1991 will add up to $265 to an elderly beneficiary's health care bill. Elderly out-of-pockets costs may reach 20 percent of income by 1990—substantially higher than the 15 percent level when Medicare and Medicaid began. Further, cutting Medicare hospital and physician payments by $7.99 billion in 1991 will greatly add to current health care quality and access problems facing elderly and disabled Medicare beneficiaries.

In a budget that threatens essential life support programs, the Reagan administration fails to target the true source of $200 billion deficits. According to 1985 Congressional Budget Office estimates, lost revenues and increased expenditures from this administration's tax and defense policies will equal the projected 1989 Federal deficit and exceed the 1990 deficit by nearly $40 billion.

The President's budget does not represent the interests or take into consideration the vast majority of the American public. The President's budget should be rejected.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Chairman, the administration has again proposed a budget with unrealistic, distorted priorities that do not reflect the needs and wishes of the American people. This unbalanced budget would have us cut spending for nondefense programs by $28 billion below what would be needed just to maintain current services—taking inflation and the number of eligible beneficiaries into account. This unbalanced budget would have us totally eliminate 40 domestic programs. Some of the programs targeted for the Reagan ax are Immigrant Education, the Work Incentive Program—WIN, the Legal Services Corporation, General Revenue Sharing, Urban Development Action Grants, Low-Income Weatherization—the list of casualities goes on and on.

At the same time, the administration is asking for $34 billion in increased appropriations for the military. Under the current administration, there has been a sharp increase in the amount of funds appropriated for the military but neither spent nor even obligated under contracts by the end of the fiscal year. This unobligated backlog is estimated to reach $60 billion this year. We all support an effective American military. We are all willing to give the Defense Department what it truly needs to carry out its critical job of keeping the peace, but I cannot and will not support cuts in vital social programs while billions of dollars are being thrown at a military establishment that cannot even spend all the appropriations it has been given.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, when President Reagan sent his fiscal year 1987 budget to Congress last month, he rejected the notion that it was dead on arrival. Instead, he requested that it be considered and approved, and today we make a judgment on that request.

We have had the President's budget for about 6 weeks. Our Budget Committee has held field hearings on it; other committees of the House including the Appropriations Committee on which I serve had had hearings in Washington on it; it has been extensively analyzed by the media; and, if your constituents are like mine, they have let you know what they think of it. In short, I believe we know enough about Mr. Reagan's budget to vote on it.

Budgets are spending blueprints. They reflect their author's belief as to how the Nation's resources should be allocated. Budgets are a statement of priorities; if you agree with those priorities you vote for their embodiment in the budget. If the budget's priorities are not yours, you don't vote for it. It's really that simple. And Mr. Chairman, let me make it clear that the priorities reflected in President Reagan's fiscal year 1987 budget are not my priorities, and I won't be voting for it.

The Presidential budget for the next fiscal year is a rewrite of past efforts by this administration. It is sadly out of balance in terms of priorities. As usual, the President would increase defense outlays while reducing domestic spending. I yield to no one in my belief that one of the primary responsibilities of the Federal Government is to ensure the national defense. I have supported, and will continue to support, the programs I believe are necessary to provide for our national security. I also know, however, that there are investments we must make in our country and its people—investments in areas like education, health care, job training, transportation and the like—which are every bit as important to guaranteeing our security as are the missiles, bombers, and submarines we entrust to the Defense Department. The President's budget would have you believe that all good things flow from a steadily increasing defense budget and a steadily decreasing domestic program budget. That was not true in 1981, Mr. Chairman, it is not true in 1986, and it will never be true.

I do not intend to address the very legitimate concern that the President's budget may have underestimated defense spending by $15 billion and therefore may not have complied with the dictates of Gramm-Rudman. That is obviously a serious issue, but I am more concerned about the direction in which the President's budget would lead the Nation. I don't believe that the American people want to follow the course set forth by this budget, a course that will inevitably lead to a society less able to respond to the challenges of a rapidly changing world. That course, and this budget, deserve to be rejected. I hope this House will go on record today in opposition to them, and I hope that the message of rejection we will send will be received and understood by those who set spending priorities in this administration.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, today's debate over the budget is essentially a debate over the priorities of our Nation. By that I do not mean the priority of reducing our enormous budget deficit; I think on that issue we are all agreed. We must take decisive action to rid ourselves of a deficit so large that it threatens the national economy. Instead, today's debate revolves around how we are to go about doing the job.

Today, we are voting on the President's budget proposal—his priorities for our Nation in the year ahead. They are very clear. The President insists that the deficit reduction targets set by the Gramm-Rudman balanced budget legislation must be met without raising any new revenue, and without reducing his continuing military buildup. Under the President's budget, then, all deficit reductions must come from domestic spending. Specifically, the President would increase military outlays by $16 billion while reducing outlays for domestic programs by $22 billion.

This vote will demonstrate how many Members of the House of Representatives share the priorities of the President. I do not believe the numbers will be great. Last week the Senate Budget Committee, the majority of which belong to the President's party, voted 16 to 6 against adopting his budget. If it is not already, it will soon be clear that the majority of the U.S. Congress does not share the priorities for our Nation. We will not endorse a budget that decimates important health, education, and veterans' programs, and that does so, not to reduce the national deficit, but to finance increased military expenditures.

Mr. Chairman, this vote will demonstrate the obvious desire on both sides of the aisle to craft an alternative to the President's list of budget priorities. This is the business we must turn to. We must act in a forceful, forthright, and most importantly, a bipartisan manner to forge a new set of budget priorities. It is only the cooperative, collective action of both parties in both Houses of Congress that will contribute to a sound, responsible resolution of the budget debate. Let us turn to the task of creating a budget that meets the deficit reduction targets of Gramm-Rudman, but meets them without placing an unequal burden on any one segment of society. Let us work together to craft a national budget which is representative of a consensus of opinion, and is truly reflective of the priorities of the citizens of this country. Thank you.

Mr. MANTON, Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to President Reagan's budget for fiscal year 1987. I want to commend the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Budget Committee, Mr. GRAY, for bringing the President's budget to the floor today. My constituents in Ninth Congressional District of New York, and all Americans have a right to know exactly how President Reagan proposes to reduce the Federal deficit.

Mr. Chairman, President Reagan told Americans in his State of the Union Address that his budget provides a "modest increase" for defense, protects programs for the poor and elderly, promotes family values, and meets the Gramm-Rudman deficit target for fiscal year 1987. A closer look at the President's budget tells a much different story.

First, the President claims his budget would increase defense spending by a "modest" 3 percent after inflation. However, the Congressional Budget Office estimates that defense spending would actually rise by 8 percent in fiscal year 1987 under the President's budget. An 8-percent real increase in defense spending is excessive, unrealistic, and unwarranted, given our current deficit crisis.

Mr. Chairman, Pentagon spending has doubled since 1981. But the more than $1 trillion spent by the Pentagon under the Reagan administration has not bought America a stronger defense. Instead, billions of dollars have been thrown at costly and needless weapons systems like the MX missile, while funds for training and readiness have been cut by 30 percent. Sacrificing readiness to buy highly complex and unnecessary weapons systems has undermined our defense capabilities.

Furthermore, the Pentagon has allowed many of the Nation's largest defense contractors to reap a massive windfall from fraudulent, abusive and illegal contracting practices. The Defense Department Inspector General has found that more than half of the spare parts purchased by the Pentagon since 1984 were not reasonably priced. This waste and fraud has eroded the quality of our weaponry.

Enough is enough. We can no longer afford to write the Pentagon a blank check as the President has once again proposed. We can have a strong defense and also cut billions from the President's defense budget. But to do so we must require the Pentagon to procure weapons on a competitive basis, and we must eliminate weapons systems that are unnecessary or duplicative.

Second, I reject the administration's claim that this budget is profamily and protects the poor and elderly. The President's budget imposes harsh cuts on vital programs that have already been cut to the bone by his administration. The President's budget would slash domestic spending in fiscal year 1987 by $22 billion. More than 40 programs that are important to the families and the elderly people in my district would be totally eliminated under the President's budget, including low-income weatherization, mass transit assistance, supplemental education opportunity grants, community services block grants, general revenue sharing and housing for the elderly and poor. Funds for infrastructure repair, community development, and health assistance would be severely curtailed.

Mr. Chairman, New York City has been forced to absorb dramatic cuts in Federal assistance over the past 5 years. Since 1981, Federal aid to New York City and its residents has been reduced by $2.4 billion. Under the President's budget for fiscal year 1987, Federal assistance to New York City would be cut by another $1.5 billion. The city will be forced to cut such basic services as police and fire protection, education, and social services for the poor and elderly.

The President's proposals for housing programs clearly illustrate that once again this Administration is attempting to balance the budget on the backs of working families, the poor and the elderly.

First, the President's budget terminates virtually all existing federally assisted housing programs. In New York City, we are faced with a housing crisis of dramatic proportions. Homelessness is on the rise. Many of those who have been fortunate enough to secure housing are paying as much as half of their income for rent. Thousands of families are forced to double up in crowded, unsafe units with the streets being the only alternative. New York and many other cities across the country lack an adequate supply of safe, decent, affordable housing. The President's proposal to wipe out most existing Federal housing programs would make our serious housing problems much, much worse.

Second, the President's proposals to strictly limit eligibility for FHA mortgage insurance, while at the same time more than doubling the amount borrowers would have to pay at closing will kill the dream of homeownership for millions of young families seeking to purchase their first home.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, the administration's budget does not meet the deficit target of $144 billion established under Gramm-Rudman which the President signed into law just 3 months ago. The President overshoots the deficit target by more than $14 billion because the administration understates defense spending. Gramm-Rudman requires the President to submit and the Congress to adopt a budget that meets annual deficit targets established by that measure. The President has failed to live up to his end of the bargain and abdicated his responsibility to submit to Congress a realistic and workable budget that adequately reduces the Federal deficit. In fact, for 6 straight years the President has failed to submit a balanced budget, even though that was a central tenant of his 1980 campaign platform.

Mr. Chairman, President Reagan's budget for fiscal year 1987 is a cruel and heartless proposal that ignores the vital and growing needs of our elderly and our less fortunate. For our Nation's cities, the President's budget is a blueprint for disaster.

I urge my colleagues to join me in voting "no" on President Reagan's fiscal year 1987 budget proposal. I look forward to working with the chairman of the House Budget Committee to develop a reasonable and compassionate deficit reduction plan that brings the bloated Pentagon budget under control and protects vital domestic programs from the outrageous cuts proposed by the Reagan administration.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the administration's fiscal year 1987 budget proposal embodied in House Concurrent Resolution 296. With its defeat we will have disposed of perhaps the greater of the two evils thus far before us in the budget process. We will be left however with the other, Gramm-Rudman round II. We must produce an alternative to avert this catastrophe.

The administration has once again produced a budget which has misplaced priorities and misguided goals. It follows the poor precedent established by Gramm-Rudman by expecting to be able to make major reductions in the deficit simply by slashing spending for certain programs. Many of these programs have already been decimated by earlier budgets prompted by the administration.

Meanwhile almost in total defiance of logic—the administration proposes to increase defense spending by about 12 percent. This while they propose the outright elimination of key programs that help the poor and needy of our Nation such as the Community Service Block Grant Program. In round numbers the story is even more dramatic. The administration budget proposal would increase defense outlays by $27 billion while reducing domestic spending by $18 billion.

Consider some of the more draconian plans in this budget. Consider revenue sharing—not only would this budget eliminate the program in fiscal year 1987 it would through a recission wipe out the fourth quarter payment for this fiscal year as well. Consider the urban mobility block grant—an idea whose time should never come. Here is an idea whereby localities would get increased flexibility on how to distribute their highway and mass transit funding. The only problem with this great idea is they will have this flexibility but the amount that would be available for the mass transit portion of this block grant would be cut by 40 percent. This will affect each and every one of the 733 urbanized areas in the United States who receive mass transit aid. It could lead to the shutdown of more than 15 percent of the systems around the United States. Rejection of this budget is one way to kill this idea. I have also authored House Resolution 271 to disapprove this proposal.

This budget is flawed in many other regards as well. I oppose its imposition of a cap on Medicaid spending. I oppose the budget's phasing out of the section 202 Housing Assistance Program for the Elderly. I oppose the 50-percent cut in this budget for summer youth employment programs. I vigorously oppose the proposed 25-percent cut below fiscal year 1986 levels in spending for student financial aid programs.

This budget has more problems than it does have assets. It should be rejected and I hope it will be expeditiously.

Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, as America looks closely for an answer to the deficit dilemma, I encourage everyone to pay special attention to those deficit figures recorded over the past 5 years. The President's 1987 budget typifies his past budgets, which have set unprecedented levels of debt. The 1987 budget does not address the problems associated with policies that have thus far contributed to driving the deficit up over $2 trillion.

In particular, I refer to the Reagan defense budget. Mr. Chairman, while I believe in a strong defense, recent events have made the Pentagon's request for increased funding seem less than credible.

Whereas defense made up 23 percent of the total spending in fiscal year 1981, the President's budget finds defense programs totalling 28 percent of all spending for 1987. Money spent for defense increased more than $34 billion from last year, or 12 percent over the fiscal year 1986 level after the Gramm-Rudman cuts. Has that increased spending resulted in an improved, battle ready defense? This Member does not believe so.

I believe that when the administration blocks initiatives such as procurement reform, they are blocking one of the items that needs the greatest amount of change. The defense budget is so large that billions of dollars go unspent from year to year. How do you tell that to a Federal retiree who is having his or her small COLA eliminated?

The defense budget rises continually at the expense of America's less fortunate. While every American pays for these buildups, it is the homeless, the teenage mothers, and the young people of this country that are hurt the most.

Mr. Chairman, the President's commitment to a strong national defense has failed because of a military establishment that has abused the system. We pay for weapons that don't work, for toilet seats and coffee makers more suited for Beverly Hills than B-52's and for contractors who bill the Government for the costs associated with public relations and the travel of their pets. Is this the type of strong defense we can be proud of?

While the defense budget is ever increasing, I can run down a whole laundry list of programs to assist our Nation's poor which are not. Every worthwhile social program, every program that promotes the economic development of this section of society has been either cut or reduced.

In this budget, the administration is suffering from a case of misguided priorities. We cannot forget the moral principles that made our country great. America's less fortunate have not benefited from the tax cut of 1981, better known as the trickle down theory. These people are worse off than ever before. We cannot forget or ignore that the poor continue to live in the greatest need. Government must do all it can to help these people break the vicious circle of poverty.

This budget continues a 5-year trend of increasing defense expenditures at the expense of these people. For these reasons, I cannot support the President's budget today. I urge my colleagues to vote down this budget, and call upon my colleagues to consider the plight of America's poor as we look at alternative budgets in the weeks to come.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased that we have an opportunity to vote today on the President's budget.

This budget is an accurate reflection of the values of this President, what he believes in, who he wants to help and who he proposes to cut.

This budget contains few surprises. It continues the massive peacetime buildup of an already bloated defense budget and it continues to cut drastically vital domestic and social programs.

According to the Congressional Budget Office, the President's budget would increase defense outlays by $28 billion while domestic outlays would be slashed by $22 billion.

Look at his priorities.

His budget cuts education funding by $3.2 billion. More than 1.4 million college students would be dropped from financial assistance rolls, while funding for handicapped education would be slashed $119 million and vocational and adult education by $428 million.

Extraordinarily successful programs such as Head Start—which gives disadvantaged students a critical educational foundation—currently serves less than half the eligible population. Yet its funding would be frozen at 1985 levels.

In 1970, child poverty in America was 13.8 percent. Today, 5 years after Ronald Reagan took office, it is 21.3 percent. Thirteen million children in this country live in poverty, yet this President has once again proposed massive cuts in programs for poor families and their children.

Child nutrition programs would be cut by 14 percent. Medicaid would be cut by 6.5 percent. In all, children stand to lose $33 billion over the next 5 years under his budget.

Mr. Chairman, the moving testimony of Marian Wright Edelman before your Budget Committee in Chicago revealed a shocking fact: a black child born in Chicago has a greater chance of dying in his or her first year of life than a child born in Costa Rica or Cuba. Yet the President would cut child immunization programs and biomedical research.

The President's budget is unrealistic, unfair and impractical. It must be defeated.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, we have no further speakers. We are prepared to close out debate if the gentlewoman wants to close.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentlewoman is thrilled to yield back her time.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to close this debate with just a few statements. First of all, this debate has not been about process as so many people have come to the well and talked about the process of whether it should have come to the floor or should it have gone to the committee.

This debate is not about whether the Democrats have an alternative or the Republicans of the House have an alternative. This debate is about one, simple thing, and that is: What does this House feel about the President's budget?

I find it interesting that most of my colleagues who come from the other side have talked about process, they have talked about politics, they have even talked about Gramm-Rudman. Sometimes they have gotten their facts wrong, as my colleague did just a moment ago. He failed to mention that Gramm-Rudman passed with the majority of Democrats voting against it, not for it, and most of the Republicans.

But it is not about Gramm-Rudman; it is about how do we prevent Gramm-Rudman and sequestration taking place. We prevent it by producing a budget that reaches a true 144. The President has given us his budget, he has asked for consideration, and that is what we have been trying to do here today.

Talk about what is in his budget, what does it do to agriculture? What does it do to the FAA? What does it do to education? Not whether it should have gone to the Budget Committee, not whether Gramm-Rudman, not who created the deficit.

In a moment, all of us will get a chance to vote. We will get a chance to vote "yes" or "no" on the President's economic blueprint. I hope that Members will not vote "present." I hope that they will do what people expect them to do when they came here, which is to take a stand for or against that document.

If that document is defeated, and I hope it will be, because I think it is the wrong blueprint for an American future that stands tall. Then I think it is time for us to sit down with our colleagues on the Republican side to draft an alternative. It is time for bipartisan consensus.

However, I would urge the President to read the writing on the wall, and if the budget is defeated that he proposes, come to the table with Democrats and Republicans from both bodies and convene a meeting so that we can try to avoid the grim reaper of Gramm-Rudman known as sequestration and yet sort out our priorities and invest in our security and also in our human capital.

That is what the vote is about. I urge Members to vote and vote "no" against the President's budget.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the concurrent resolution is considered as having been read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

No amendments are in order.

The text of the concurrent resolution is as follows:

H. CON. RES. 296

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress hereby determines and declares that the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1987 is hereby established and the appropriate budgetary levels for fiscal years 1988 and 1989 are hereby set forth:

(a) The following budgetary levels are appropriate for the fiscal years beginning on October 1, 1986, October 1, 1987, and October 1, 1988:

(1) The recommended levels of Federal revenues are as follows:
Fiscal year 1987: $636,100,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $690,400,000,000.
Fiscal year 1989: $732,500,000,000.
and the amounts by which the aggregate levels of Federal revenues should be increased are as follows:
Fiscal year 1987: $6,000,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $5,700,000,000.
Fiscal year 1989: $6,100,000,000.

(2) The appropriate levels of total new budget authority are as follows:
Fiscal year 1987: $887,700,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $923,100,000,000.
Fiscal year 1989: $954,400,000,000.

(3) The appropriate levels of total budget outlays are as follows:
Fiscal year 1987: $795,400,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $817,100,000,000.
Fiscal year 1989: $843,800,000,000.

(4)(A) The amounts of the deficits in the budget which are appropriate in the light of economic conditions and all other relevant factors are as follows:
Fiscal year 1987: $159,300,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $126,700,000,000.
Fiscal year 1989: $111,300,000,000.

(B) For purposes of the maximum deficit amount mandated by the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 and section 301(i) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 only, the appropriate levels of total new budget authority, budget outlays, Federal revenues, and deficits, including receipts and disbursements of the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Trust Fund and the Federal Disability Trust Fund, are as follows:
New budget authority:
Fiscal year 1987: $1,102,000,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $1,165,900,000,000.
Fiscal year 1989: $1,218,000,000,000.
Outlays:
Fiscal year 1987: $994,000,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $1,026,800,000,000.
Fiscal year 1989: $1,063,600,000,000.
Revenues:
Fiscal year 1987: $850,400,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $933,200,000,000.
Fiscal year 1989: $996,100,000,000.
Deficit:

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

□ 1800

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. NATCHER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 296) setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989, pursuant to House Resolution 397, had directed him to report the concurrent resolution back to the House with the recommendation that the concurrent resolution be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the concurrent resolution.

The question was taken; and the speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 12, nays 312, answered "present" 78, not voting 32, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pair.

On this vote:

Mr. Rudd for, with Mr. Frenzel against.

Mr. TORRES changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. DUNCAN and Mr. PASHAYAN changed their votes from "nay" to "present."

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska changed her vote from "present" to "nay."

Mr. PACKARD changed his vote from "yea" to "present."

So the concurrent resolution was not agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material on House Concurrent Resolution 296.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL YEAR OF THANKSGIVING

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from the further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 254), to designate the year of 1987 as the "National Year of Thanksgiving," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object but simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation of objection I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL], who is the chief sponsor of House Joint Resolution 398.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the resolution to designate 1987 as the "National Year of Thanksgiving." I commend the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] for their kind efforts to bring this measure before the full House of Representatives.

I also wish to thank all of my colleagues who joined with me and the other original sponsor, the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEMP], to cosponsor the House version of this legislation, House Joint Resolution 398. I especially thank the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEMP] for his leadership and work on behalf of this resolution.

The resolution before us will proclaim 1987 as the "National Year of Thanksgiving." During 1987, our Nation will celebrate the Bicentennial of the Constitution and the convening of the 100th Congress. Making 1987 the "National Year of Thanksgiving" will foster national expressions of gratitude and thankfulness to God for America's quality of life and the constitutionally guaranteed freedoms which make it possible. Moreover, it will create greater awareness and appreciation among Americans for the unique contribution each race and ethnic group has made to America.

Thanksgiving is a major hallmark of our Nation's history. Presidents Washington and Lincoln made Thanksgiving proclamations during their terms in office, and in 1941, Thanksgiving became a national holiday.

In light of our heritage and the great freedom and prosperity our Nation enjoys, it is fitting to set aside an entire year to give thanks to God for the many blessings we have received. A year of reflection and thanksgiving will serve to inspire our Nation and renew in our citizens the spirit of unity and patriotism.

I wish to call to my colleagues' attention the exciting and tireless work of the National Committee of 1987 the Year of Thanksgiving. In particular, I want to commend and congratulate Brian G. Roquemore, the executive director of the National Committee. He and his coworkers have labored hard to make this resolution possible, and they deserve our special thanks. Once 1987 is officially proclaimed as the "National Year of Thanksgiving," they will be actively involved in implementing the celebrations across the country.

I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of this resolution, so that it can be cleared for the President's signature. I am looking forward to a year in which we focus on the many ways our Nation has been blessed and in which we show greater appreciation and kindness toward one another.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, we have before us a bill to designate 1987 as the "National Year of Thanksgiving." I would like to thank Mr. GARCIA and Mr. FORD for their efforts to bring this bill before the full House today.

I would also like to thank my colleagues, the majority of the House, who joined as cosponsors of this resolution. Most particularly I want to commend the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. TONY HALL, whom I joined as an original sponsor of this bill, for his leadership and his tireless efforts for this cause. And this bill would never have come before the floor if it had not been for Brian Roquemore who has made it his mission to establish this Year of Thanksgiving and to make it a constant presence in the hearts and minds of the American people.

The resolution before us will declare 1987 to be the "National Year of Thanksgiving." Alsc, 1987 is a most appropriate time since it also marks the 200th anniversary of our Constitution and the convening of the 100th Congress.

Least we forget the rich blessings that citizenship in this great Nation has afforded us, the passage of this bill will ensure that we are constantly aware that we, as a people, are truly blessed. We will have the opportunity to think about the freedoms bestowed upon us by our Constitution and the Bill of Rights, and protected for us by our democratic system of government.

The Year of Thanksgiving will be a continuous celebration of that which we usually celebrate once a year. George Washington issued a Thanksgiving proclamation in 1789 "to recommend to the people of the United States a day of public thanksgiving and prayer to be observed by acknowledging with grateful hearts the many single favors of Almighty God especially by affording them an opportunity peacably to establish a form of government for their safety and happiness." Abraham Lincoln in 1863 said "It is the duty of nations to own their independence upon the over-ruling power of God . . . It has seemed to me fit and proper that God should be solemnly, reverently and gratefuly acknowledged, as with one heart and one voice, by the whole American people."

These sentiments are still valid, and form the basis for our success as a nation and as a people. The "Year of Thanksgiving" will foster national appreciation for our quality of life and the constitutionally guaranteed freedoms which make it possible. It will also create greater awareness for the uniqueness and character which each race and ethnic group brings to our land.

This is truly a great opportunity to count our blessings as one Nation under God.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. Res. 254

Whereas the celebration of a Thanksgiving season has been a national tradition observed by the people of the United States from the days of the early settlers to the present time;

Whereas many of the great leaders of the Nation, including Presidents George Washington and Abraham Lincoln, recognized the importance of setting aside a time of Thanksgiving, and Presidential proclamations have established the last Thursday of November as a day of Thanksgiving;

Whereas in 1941, Thanksgiving was established as a permanent national holiday;

Whereas in 1987, the United States will celebrate the bicentennial of the United States Constitution and the opening of the one-hundredth Congress;

Whereas the United States Constitution has adapted to changing times and remains a living document;

Whereas it is appropriate to give thanks for the everyday freedom that the people of the United States so often take for granted;

Whereas the people of the United States should take time to appreciate a land of plenty, a Nation of vast human and natural resources; and

Whereas the people of the United States should better understand the history of the rich American heritage: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the year 1987 is designated as the "National Year of Thanksgiving", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the governors of the several States, the chief officials of local governments, and the people of the United States to observe such year with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL ENERGY EDUCATION DAY

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 205), to designate March 21, 1986, as "National Energy Education Day," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object but simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 205

Whereas a reliable and economical supply of energy is essential to the future well-being of the United States;

Whereas the development and implementation of an enlightened energy policy requires that the public be adequately informed of the issues and alternatives;

Whereas ongoing quality energy education programs in America's schools and communities will continue to play an important role in educating the public regarding energy issues;

Whereas the annual celebration of "National Energy Education Day" (NEED) brings together students, teachers, school officials, and community leaders to focus attention on the need for energy education in our Nation's schools and communities; and

Whereas such a celebration should be conducted in a manner which encourages a deeper understanding of the role education will play in shaping America's energy future: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in order to promote and enhance energy education programs at all grade levels of public and private schools throughout the United States, March 21, 1986, is designated "National Energy Education Day". The President is requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States, and all educational institutions, to observe such a day with appropriate ceremonies and activities, and encourage appropriate Federal agencies to participate in the observance of such a day and to cooperate with persons and institutions conducting such ceremonies and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RECOGNIZING ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE IRELAND FUND AND ITS FOUNDER, DR. ANTHONY J.F. O'REILLY

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 281), recognizing the achievements of the Ireland Fund and its founder, Dr. Anthony J.F. O'Reilly, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be a cosponsor of this legislation. Too often lately we only hear about Ireland because of the troubles in the north. That presents a distorted picture of this lovely island nation.

The Irish have made any number of contributions to the United States and the world. Ireland has given us two Nobel laureates for literature—Samuel Beckett and W.B. Yeats. It has also given us writers such as James Joyce, Sean O'Casey, and the poet Seamus Heaney. All of these distinguished individuals have drawn their inspiration from their heritage.

The United States has traditionally had a warm relationship with Ireland. The Irish make up one of the largest ethnic groups in this Nation. Ireland has given us a number of noteworthy political leaders, including a few Presidents, Senators, and Speakers of the House.

Dr. Anthony J.F. O'Reilly, founder of the Ireland Fund, has done a tremendous job in spreading friendship and good will between the United States and Ireland. The fund has supported a number of worthwhile programs throughout Ireland. Both the fund and Dr. O'Reilly exemplify the spirit of Ireland and the Irish people.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

H. CON. RES. 281

Whereas the Ireland Fund characterizes the friendship between the United States and Ireland and the goodwill which the American and Irish people have for each other;

Whereas the Ireland Fund is a nonpolitical, nonsectarian organization which raises funds in the United States to promote peace, culture, and charity in Ireland;

Whereas the goal of the Ireland Fund is to realize the highest in human potential, regardless of creed or economic background;

Whereas donations to the Ireland Fund reflect the warm feelings of Americans for the people of Ireland and for the unique heritage which has contributed so much to America's growth and diversity;

Whereas the Ireland Fund has provided an opportunity for concerned Americans to support projects aimed at establishing peace and harmony in Ireland, preserving the Irish culture, and fostering charitable giving to the less fortunate;

Whereas over the centuries the Irish have created one of the world's great bodies of literature, poetry, drama, art, and music and the Ireland Fund has fostered Irish culture by supporting libraries, visual arts, drama, dance, opera, classical and choral music programs as well as historic, cultural, and wildlife preservation;

Whereas the Ireland Fund supports economic and social programs in the Catholic and Protestant areas of Northern and Southern Ireland in an effort to develop the economy of both communities through programs for employment, job training, youth sports, and educational opportunities for children;

Whereas the Ireland Fund has supported many hospitals, health care facilities, and programs for the sick, the handicapped, the deaf, the blind, the abused, the homeless, the rural poor, and the elderly; and

Whereas Dr. Anthony J.F. O'Reilly, the founder and chairman of the Ireland Fund, will celebrate his fiftieth birthday on May 7, 1986: Now, therefore, be it Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress recognizes the laudable charitable achievements of the Ireland Fund and further recognizes its founder, Dr. Anthony J.F. O'Reilly, for the humane work he has inspired on behalf of the of the people of Ireland.

The concurrent resolution was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MEETING OF COMMITTEE ON RULES TO CONSIDER RULE ON H.R. 4151, OMNIBUS DIPLOMATIC SECURITY AND ANTI-TERRORISM ACT OF 1986

(Mr. FASCELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to discussions with the majority and minority leadership, I take this opportunity to advise Members that the Committee on Foreign Affairs will request a modified closed rule on H.R. 4151, the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act of 1986. The Committee on Rules will meet on H.R. 4151, as amended, on Monday, March 17 at 11 a.m. floor consideration will take place on Tuesday, March 18.

BOBBY FISCHER AS OFFICIAL WORLD CHESS CHAMPION

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 545) recognizing Bobby Fischer as the official World Chess Champion, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. PASHAYAN], the chief sponsor of the joint resolution.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlemen from New York for presenting House Joint Resolution 545 to this body. I appreciate the support of the chairman of the committee, Mr. FORD, and my other colleagues on the committee.

This bill is a recognition to a brilliant American citizen who is the best human being in history ever to play the game of chess, Bobby Fischer. Bobby Fischer in winning the FIDE world championship title in 1972 by beating the Soviet Union's Boris Spassky in Iceland, became the first American to become the world chess champion since the American, Paul Morphy.

In accomplishing this, Bobby Fischer brought America to the forefront of the world's most universal game and at the same time dealt a blow to the Soviet propagandists who touted the Soviets' superiority in chess as an example of a superior Soviet society.

It is a great shortcoming indeed that our Government has failed in any way whatsoever to recognize this American hero. Actually it was ironic that in 1972 President Nixon honored the Soviet, Olga Korbut, who won first place as a gymnast at the Olympics in 1972, but failed to invite Bobby Fischer to the White House for a similar honor.

The reason, Mr. Speaker, that the world has not heard from Bobby Fischer since 1972 is not that he has not played anybody in chess, but that nobody has played him. What do I mean by this? In 1973, Bobby Fischer offered to defend his title under a set of rules that actually gave the challenger a greater chance to win than the rules gave Bobby Fischer when he was the challenger to Spassky. This enormously fair offer to defend his title was all but unheard of in the modern history of chess, and yet FIDE refused to adopt Fischer's proposed rules. The Soviet Government influenced FIDE to deny Fischer's proposed rules in the hope that Fischer would not play.

Indeed, rather than to play under rules that he thought were unfair, Bobby Fischer as a matter of high principle refused to defend the FIDE title. He informed FIDE by telegram in 1974 that he resigned FIDE's title rather than to play under unfair rules, but in doing so he signed the telegram "Bobby Fischer, The World Chess Champion." In short, Mr. Speaker, Bobby Fischer retained the true world championship title, and remains the world champion today. Nobody has properly challenged him to defend his title, and certainly not the Soviets.

Mr. Speaker, the popularity of chess in the Soviet Union and the Eastern Bloc countries is immense beyond the imagination of many Americans.

Our recognition of Bobby Fischer as the World Chess Champion is too long overdue. Americans everywhere should take national pride that in the game in which the Soviets claim superiority, America's Bobby Fischer is better than them all.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 545

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States Government recognizes Bobby Fischer as the official World Chess Champion.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the several joint resolutions just considered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize Members for 1-minute speeches at this time, and then return to the schedule for the remainder of the day and the remainder of the week.

THE NEW REPUBLIC EDITORIAL SUPPORTING THE PRESIDENT'S REQUEST FOR AID TO THE CONTRAS

(Mr. LAGOMARSINO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, the March 24 edition of the New Republic carries an editorial which makes the case for supporting the President's request for aid for the democratic resistance in Nicaragua.

The editorial examines the various arguments put forth by critics of aid to the Contras and convincingly rebuts each excuse. One of those arguments is that "the Contras will draw the United States into war." But as the New Republic states, "Nothing is more likely to force American military intervention than the consolidation of an aggressive, highly militarized, pro-Soviet regime in the area. The Contras want to do their own fighting. Cut them off, and the only body in the hemisphere able to restrain the Sandinistas will be the U.S. Army."

I am submitting the New Republic editorial for inclusion in today's extensions of remarks. I urge my colleagues to read this thoughtful and thought-provoking commentary.

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE GIRL SCOUTS!

(Mrs. BENTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to congratulate the Girl Scouts of America this morning. In communities across the country, this organization is training and working with our young women, guiding and counseling them about the values of our great country.

It is an inspiring thought that so many of our citizens give of their time and their experience to the Scouting movement. The example of these adults sharing their concern and time with future generations is in the finest tradition of the American experience.

Ours is a nation built on the idea of voluntarism. From the citizen army which stood off the best of the English soldiers in the Revolution, to the volunteer firefighters who still protect our towns and villages as their fathers and grandfathers did—we are an involved people.

These young people are being trained in that tradition by the Girl Scouts. I would like to thank them for their efforts. I want to congratulate them for their success.

We are a better nation for all they have done.

BARBER CONABLE TO HEAD WORLD BANK

(Mr. GIBBONS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I am sure all Members of the House who knew him will be glad to know that our fine former colleague, Barber Conable, is to be the new head of the World Bank.

I cannot think of anybody who is better qualified to attack this job and to bring dignity, skill, and the fine lessons that he has learned in practical work of the world and politics to that job than Barber Conable. A great appointment, and I wish him well.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. LOTT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, we are very anxious to learn the schedule for the balance of the day and tomorrow, if any, and also for next week.

For that purpose, I would be glad to engage in a dialog with the distinguished majority leader. I yield to him at this point.

Mr. WRIGHT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

This concludes the scheduled legislative business for today, and it had been expected that tomorrow would be a pro forma day, if there were any expectation at all of any legislation arising tomorrow, we will have to ask that we go over until Monday.

Mr. LOTT. So the Members could understand clearly about today and tomorrow, we are through for today?

Mr. WRIGHT. That is correct. We are through for today, and since we have told Members that tomorrow would be only a pro forma session, and Members have made their plans not to be present then, a great many of them on both sides of the aisle, then we feel that we have a good faith responsibility to them to assure that there should be no legislation considered tomorrow in their absence.

Mr. LOTT. Does the gentleman intend to ask unanimous consent to go over until Monday?

Mr. WRIGHT. That would be my expectation.

Mr. LOTT. At the close of our dialog, you would intend to do that?

Mr. WRIGHT. I would hope to do that; yes.

Mr. LOTT. So that we would not have a pro forma session tomorrow?

Mr. WRIGHT. That is right, and we would hope that in doing so, we might also get unanimous consent that it would be in order to consider the President's request with regard to Nicaragua on our Wednesday next, which otherwise might have been adversely affected under the rules by tomorrow's not having had a session.

Mr. LOTT. Thank you.

Mr. WRIGHT. Those are the unanimous-consent requests.

Mr. LOTT. Before the gentleman goes to the schedule next week, I think the Members are interested in and aware that what we have been discussing back and forth and waiting on is another opportunity to consider the reconciliation conference report.

The Senate is going to take it up, presumably today at some point; there was some chance, then, that if they had acted earlier today that we might have tried to recede and concur today, or a chance that it will come tomorrow. We do not know exactly when the Senate will complete action; we do not know exactly what the content will be in that reconciliation package, and certainly we would like to see that, but we had told the Members that they would be on a pro forma session tomorrow.

So neither side is interested in causing undue hardships on the Members. However, there is a complicating problem with that in that the tobacco provisions that are in the law at this point will expire at midnight tomorrow night; and so we were particularly hopeful that perhaps there could be action by the Senate and action by the House before that deadline.

It appears, now, if we go over, that that is not possible. Is that correct?

Mr. WRIGHT. If the gentleman will yield, I think that is exactly correct. We had hoped as well that the Senate might have acted at a sufficiently timely moment that we could have considered their response; if they did not want to accept what we had passed earlier in order that this might be considered prior to Saturday, but it now appears uncertain whether the Senate would act tonight or tomorrow, and if so, what it would contain and obviously, the Members are not of a disposition just to sit around and wait and wonder.

So under those circumstances it seems most likely to me that if it is agreeable to the gentleman and the Members on his side of the aisle we would contemplate taking that matter up and considering it perhaps on Tuesday next.

Mr. LOTT. That you would hope that perhaps we consider it on Tuesday next, is that right?

Mr. WRIGHT. Assuming that it is passed by the other body at that time and assuming that there is anything for the House to act upon that we would consider it in an orderly and timely way.

Mr. LOTT. I wonder if the gentleman would consider a unanimous-consent request of extension of the tax under these conditions?

Mr. WRIGHT. I have been informed, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. LOTT. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. WRIGHT. By some of the Members that any unanimous-consent request to lift out of the package of the reconciliation bill and treat separately the extension of the cigarette tax would be objected to.

Mr. LOTT. Well, it would only be for 4 days and it does cause some problems with a few States where the ceiling would be removed and some State laws would kick in and I do not think we could then come back and recover it next week. So some Member that would be interested, from a tobacco State area, may still wish to make that unanimous-consent request. I would appeal in a bipartisan way that for only 4 days that would certainly be considered.

Having said that I would like to urge, even if that is not successful, that we have a vote on reconciliation, a clear vote at the earliest possible opportunity.

Now I realize we want to see what we have. But quoting the gentleman from Texas just last week, he said with regard to reconciliation, "The time for talk really has passed. Now it is time for action. This is an opportunity to save $18 billion off the deficits of the next 3 years." I share those feelings. I voted with him last week. I hope to be able to vote for something next week that the President can sign.

Mr. WRIGHT. I appreciate the gentleman's concern and I would simply add that not only the cigarette tax but a number of other very important provisions on which a great many Americans depend similarly expire on midnight Friday. Such things as the Trade Adjustment Assistance Act and Medicare payments and certain other things on which a great many Americans are reliant.

So there is no disposition whatsoever on any Member on this side of the aisle to delay unnecessarily action on the reconciliation bill. We would like to get it just as soon as we could.

Mr. LOTT. While I am very concerned about quick action on reconciliation, in view of the fact that we are waiting on the other body and need to see what is involved, this side would certainly not at this time plan to object to your motion to go over. We would hope that we would get the same sort of consideration next week and get a clear vote on reconciliation.

Mr. WRIGHT. I appreciate the concern of the gentleman and we will try to work together.

Did the gentleman desire——

Mr. LOTT. I yield further for the schedule for next week.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY, MARCH 17, 1986, AND MAKING IN ORDER A MOTION FOR CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 540 IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today, that it adjourn to meet Monday next and that it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for consideration of House Joint Resolution 540 on Wednesday next although it would not have been on the Union Calendar for 5 legislative days as required by Public Law 99-83.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, responding to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi, on Monday, March 17, we will expect no votes. There will be two suspensions considered. One, to name a post office for the late Honorable Edwin B. Forsythe and another to name a post office for Juanita Craft. Votes on those suspensions, if required to be recorded, will be postponed until Tuesday.

On Tuesday, March 18, we will meet at noon, vote on the suspensions debated on Monday if those votes are required, consider a conference report on H.R. 2453, the Older Americans Act, and act upon H.R. 4351, the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act, subject to the granting of a rule.

I should like to add that if agreement is reached, we would expect to consider also on that day if necessary further action on the reconciliation bill.

On Wednesday the House would meet at 10 a.m. We would take up House Joint Resolution 540, the President's request for assistance for Nicaraguan opposition.

Under that rule 10 hours of debate are allowed. We do not expect that we would conclude action on Wednesday, but would postpone some of that debate, maybe 2 hours, over until the following day Thursday. Now we will ask unanimous consent, however, that we may go in at 11 o'clock on Wednesday rather than at the late hour of 3 o'clock in order to facilitate that important debate.

Mr. LOTT. If the gentleman would yield at that point, my understanding was that we would take up House Joint Resolution 540 on Wednesday and it would be debated for 8 hours and then on Thursday, if we come in at 10, that we would take up the remaining 2 hours.

Mr. WRIGHT. That is exactly what I understand that members of the committees involved would like to do on both sides, Republicans and Democrats as well. And if that is agreeable to the gentleman from Mississippi, it surely is agreeable to Members on this side.

Mr. LOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then after having acted upon the President's request with regard to Nicaraguan opposition, we would take up H.R. 4332, the Federal Firearms Law Reform Act of 1986, subject to a rule being granted.

Mr. LOTT. Do we anticipate a Friday session on next week?

Mr. WRIGHT. Responding to the request of the gentleman, I think we need to anticipate a Friday session. Given the number and the importance of the legislative matters pending to be acted upon before the end of the week, I think we might as well expect that there will be a Friday session.

Mr. LOTT. All right. I think we need to clarify that. We have two bills on Thursday, the President's request for assistance for Nicaraguan opposition, which I presume will take about 2½ to 3 hours, plus the Federal firearms law reform subject to a rule and we do not know exactly how much time will be allowed there, but you are saying that the Members should be on notice for the possibility of a session on Friday with the possibility of votes.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes. I think that is wise. We do not know exactly what rule will obtain with regard to the Firearms Act. Not knowing that, nor how many amendments might be offered——

Mr. LOTT. If I could take it one step further, then: We are scheduled at this time to go out for the Easter recess at the close of business Tuesday, March 25. Is it anticipated that we will be in session on Monday and Tuesday the 24th and 25th?

Mr. WRIGHT. Assuming of course that we were able to complete all of our business by the close of business Thursday, we would not have to be here Friday. But I think it is an unrealistic expectation, and if Members were encouraged to believe that we were not going to be here Friday and made plans, they might find themselves in an awkward position.

Mr. LOTT. If I could propound my other question: Do we still anticipate having a session and votes on Monday and Tuesday the 24th and 25th?

Mr. WRIGHT. I think what I have said should hold true for Monday and Tuesday. If we are able to complete our business by Friday of next week, then we could hold Monday and Tuesday harmless.

Mr. LOTT. I see.

Mr. WRIGHT. But not knowing that we will, I hesitate to suggest to Members that there will be no legislative business on Monday or Tuesday because then they would make their plans to be absent and if we found inadvertently that we had not completed some of this important business, they would feel that we had misled them.

Mr. LOTT. Well, I thank the gentleman for providing this information.

Just one final and most important question: Under the budget laws that we are working with at this time, the House must consider the budget resolution, I believe, by April 15. Do we expect to have an opportunity to vote on the Democratic budget proposal before the Easter recess?

Mr. WRIGHT. The Easter recess comes very early this year, as the gentleman from Mississippi recognizes. It begins in March, the last week in March. I do not believe we have ever voted on a budget resolution that early, and I think it would be unlikely to expect that we would have a budget resolution next week. There is not room for it.

Mr. LOTT. Easter comes very early, and the Democratic budget resolution obviously is going to come very late. But I would remind the leader once again, by April 15, both the House and the other body are supposed to have acted on the budget resolution. We will only have the conference report and we will only have that after we get back from April 9 to April 15, 6 days in which both bodies must act. We have problems.

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman makes a good point. We will get back, however, April 7 and we believe there is a week in which that action can be completed. If it is not, then the situation will be much the same as it has been in past years.

You know, the House on numerous occasions has passed that budget resolution on time and one year, the year before last, the other body did not act on it until late August and then would not meet with us in conference even into September.

So, wholly beyond our power to control, it was delayed for several months. The same thing happened to some lesser degree last year. And when we are at the mercy of the other body to agree with our positions on resolutions of that kind, it is very difficult, as the gentleman points out, to make any clear-cut target.

Mr. LOTT. Well, I might say that we have worked together with the other side to try to have an expedited schedule this year. That is why we have these specified early dates. I would certainly hope that we would make a much better effort in trying to meet those dates because we have a lot of work to do and not much time to do it in.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

HOUR OF MEETING ON WEDNESDAY, MARCH 19, 1986

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Tuesday next, it adjourn to meet at 10 a.m. on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule shall be dispensed with on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE LESTER DIXON

(Mr. THOMAS of Georgia asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. THOMAS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, in the nearly 4 years of my service in the Congress, I have seen this body pause in its deliberations to mark the passing of many noted Americans. Most often they have been famous political leaders or other citizens of national or international acclaim.

I stand before the House today to announce the death of another great American. And though he was not a famous figure in Washington, his life was a living testament to the strengths and values that are the bedrock of our national life.

This great man died yesterday in his native Georgia, and his name was Lester Dixon, known with great reverence as Brother Lester, the dean of the wiregrass preachers.

He was without peer as a preacher and an orator. But his greatest gift was that of a teacher—a teacher of the Christian faith, and a teacher of honor and decency and love for his fellow man. He leaves behind him a life of achievement and honor that will stand for all time as a measure of what makes America great.

Brother Dixon had seen, in his own words, the passing of 97 springs and summers and autumns and winters, and now he has been called home.

I was privileged to be born and raised directly across the street from his home. I saw him countless times over the years, but I remember that even as a small boy, I could sense the consistent theme of his life which flowed through all his years.

He had an unshakable conviction that made his life a testament of the Christian faith, a life that was a living example of its teachings and its principles.

Brother Lester was born Henry Lester Dixon on September 15, 1888. He was the pastor of the Patterson Baptist Church for 25 years until his retirement in September of 1958. He was a native and lifelong resident of Pierce County.

He served for 47 years as a rural letter carrier, a career which began in the horse and buggy days. He was the former president of the Patterson Bank.

He was the founder of Laura Chapel Baptist Church and the Pleasant Hill Baptist Church in Pierce County, and he also served as pastor of the Offerman, Bristol, Merchan, Pine Grove, and Walkerville Baptist Churches.

According to the records of the Patterson Baptist Church, he has performed more than 1,000 weddings and probably as many funerals. His contributions to his community was recognized by his receipt of the Jeoffry Jones Humanitarian Award for outstanding service.

In the passing of his years, Brother Lester's skills as an orator and a preacher grew stronger and stronger. In his own way, he was a poet whose words would make the truth of his teachings ring like a bell in the communities where he came to preach. I often felt when I was with him that I was in the presence of a prophet.

He was among the very last of his generation. He had seen wars and peace and prosperity and depression. He had seen the end of the 19th century and nearly all of the 20th. All of the joy and all of the sorrow of those years were part of his life and character.

We have an annual homecoming at the Patterson Baptist Church in south Georgia, and Brother Lester would come and speak. He taught the word of God, and that word was the foundation of his life.

He would talk about the passage of the years and the changes he had seen. But his theme was not about change—his theme was about the principles of honor and decency and love. He taught us that those things do not change, and that they must always be our guiding star.

Certainly there is no better measurement of a man's greatness than the breadth of his influence on those around him. The lives of those he touched and influenced are beyond estimate. The good that has come and will continue to come through those lives he influenced will be a fitting and never ending tribute.

We have lost a great American with the death of Lester Dixon. We mourn him, and we extend our deepest sympathies to his family. But we celebrate the joy of having had him amongst us for so many years. We celebrate his coming home to the Lord. We thank God that his teaching and his preaching will live in the hearts of others for all time.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY TO HAVE UNTIL MIDNIGHT, FRIDAY, MARCH 14, 1986, TO FILE REPORT ON H.R. 4332, FEDERAL FIREARMS LAW REFORM ACT OF 1986

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may have until midnight, Friday, March 14, 1986, to file its report on the bill, H.R. 4332, the Federal Firearms Law Reform Act of 1986.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I yield to my colleague from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. DINGELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I am trying to find out what the gentleman's request is.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I seek permission to file a report by midnight tomorrow night. It has been cleared. We are trying to get unanimous consent to file our report on the bill, H.R. 4332.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

FAIR TRADE AND ECONOMIC JUSTICE ACT OF 1986

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PEASE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, I just want to advise our colleagues that I and 10 other Members of the House today introduced a bill which would define as an unfair trade practice the denial or repression of internationally recognized labor rights by any of our trading partners.

This approach is pursuant to a conference that was held here in the House 1 week ago today, a conference over in the Rayburn Building, a conference which was addressed by some very distinguished speakers, including Lane Kirkland, the president of the AFL-CIO; Owen Beaver, the president of the United Automobile Workers; and Ray Marshall, a former Secretary of Labor in the Carter administration.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, and to a lot of other people as well, that American workers will find it difficult in the future to compete with foreign imports which are produced by labor that gets paid 35 cents an hour or by labor of teenage girls who are working 14 to 16 hours a day under unsafe working conditions.

We cannot extend and force upon Third World countries the identical standards which we in the United States use for our workers. But it seems to me that it is entirely legitimate for us to ask our trading partners to extend minimum internationally recognized labor rights to their workers. And these rights include freedom of association. Who is going to argue with that? They include the right to organize and to bargain collectively. They include a prohibition on forced labor. Who would complain about that? They include the requirement that a Third World nation have some minimum age below which children cannot work in factories. It includes a requirement that Third World countries have some minimal standards for wages and for health and safety and other considerations.

We are concerned; and one stated object of our trade policy is to benefit everybody in the world. Perhaps the consumers in the United States, but the workers and people of Third World countries. And it does little good for those workers in Third World countries if we allow imports to come into this United States under conditions which deny the workers of those Third World countries the opportunity for a decent standard of living and to improve their standards of living.

Mr. Speaker, I believe, and the 10 persons who cosponsored the legislation I introduced today believe, that it constitutes an unfair trading practice against the United States and against the workers of the United States for us to allow goods to come into this country which are produced by forced labor, which are produced by child labor, which are produced under circumstances where the workers do not even have the right to associate with one another and to organize and bargain collectively.

So this legislation would define as an unfair trade practice the effort of a country to deny to workers those basic fundamental rights.

It seems to me that if we are going to be fair to the workers of the United States, we have to be able to say to them, if we are allowing imports to come into this country, at least we want to assure you that they are being produced by workers who have some rights in their own factories.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we ought to heed the words of the poet, James Russell Lowell, when we talk about what is happening in our country and in other countries, particularly Third World countries.

Mr. Speaker, I ask support and urge support of the legislation that I introduced today.

Mr. Speaker, let me add these further remarks:

If America is to recoup our competitiveness in the world marketplace, the terms of the current trade debate must be altered. First, we need to understand how our competitive position has changed in relation to those of other trading nations. Then we must move beyond pristine theories about free trade to ask critically who is benefiting materially from our rapid integration into the global economy and to what degree? Finally, we need to recall our heritage and work for specific changes in the international trading system that will promote economic justice at home and abroad.

From 1945 to 1965, the American economy was largely self-reliant. Most Americans saw their living standards go up as part of the general prosperity. American industries and manufacturing workers—producing primarily for domestic consumption—were not threatened by imports.

In the last 20 years, our position in the global economy has changed dramatically amidst a tidal wave of imports. America has gone from being the acknowledged economic superpower in the world to being one of a pack of economic powerhouses engaged in very hard-nosed global competition to retain old markets and to open new ones.

All across America, scores of communities, hundreds of factories, and millions of workers have suffered. Coming to grips with the new dynamics of international trade is proving very painful and costly for thousands of Americans whose jobs have been moved overseas and who have been denied means to retrain themselves for new jobs.

What now passes as free trade among nations does not redound equally to everyone's benefit. International corporations get the most from the emergence of the global factory, as the capacity to market finished products from parts manufactured in several different countries is often called. Advances in transportation, communications, and information systems have greatly enhanced the ability of these international corporate giants to take advantage of international wage, productivity, and unit labor cost differential. In this regard, I commend to you the special report in Business Week last week on "The Hollow Corporation."

As capital and technology move around the world with little regard for national boundaries, workers remain stationary and bound by national laws and personal allegiances. These economic facts of life fuel an escalating trend in global production that undercuts the rights of all workers. In particular, they combine to move the rights of American workers toward the lowest common international denominator.

The central questions before us today are these: Is it possible, for example, for American workers to compete with South Koreans working under the thumb of an authoritarian regime and receiving 10 percent of United States manufacturing wages? More importantly, is it right?

We have entered a new era in which America ought to use its far-reaching economic leverage to insist upon changes in the international trading system that will spread the benefits of open trade within nations as well as among them. Currently, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade [GATT] spells out rules in practice with regard to capital subsidies and dumping to promote fair competition, but not for labor practices. Anything goes. The current rules in world trade condone competition at any cost as far as workers are concerned.

But trade is not and should not be viewed as an end in itself. Fair competition in world trade should renounce labor repression. It should be structured in rule and in practice to improve the living standards of workers as well as consumers.

We need not postpone action until completion of a new round of multilateral trade negotiations. Many American industries and unions rightfully protest unfair trade subsidies and the dumping of low-priced foreign goods on our shores. The same outcry should be heard and acted upon in protest of "social dumping"—competitive advantages in international trade derived from the denial of internationally-recognized worker rights. Ten of my colleagues are joining me today in introducing legislation toward that end.

The rights of American workers will be more secure and U.S. competitiveness will be improved by a forward-looking, aggressive, coordinated strategy to extend basic labor rights, such as freedom of association, to workers in all countries. The threat by American-based international corporations to transfer domestic production and jobs to foreign countries in which there are no labor rights becomes an ever more common technique to force American workers to relinquish legitimate rights and material benefits.

As a leader among nations, America should fight just as hard for the right to join a union as the right to vote.

America should stand up for the right to bargain collectively just as we stand up for the right to free speech.

And yes, those Americans who are most outspoken about traditional family values ought to join the rest of us in showing the same measure of concern for children being sold into slavery or forced into factory work without ever having seen the inside of a classroom.

To those who blithely assume and argue that American living standards should decline in order to offset the differences between how American workers are treated in relation to many foreign workers, recall and reflect on the words of the poet, James Russell Lowell:

He's true to God's who's true to man;
whenever wrong is done.
To the humblest and the weakest,
'neath the all-beholding Sun.
That wrong is also done to us,
and they are slaves most base,
Whose love of right is for themselves and not for all the race.

As Americans, shouldn't we really be trying to see to it that all workers have the tools to bring their living and working standards up to some minimum level decency rather than asking American workers to compete with growing numbers of foreign workers who are treated as chattel?

THE STRIKE OF TWA FLIGHT ATTENDANTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, today is the seventh day of the strike by Trans World Airlines flight attendants. Under discussion is not how much money the flight attendants will make, but how little. TWA, the recent subject of a corporate takeover by Carl Icahn, told flight attendants it planned to reduce their wages by 22 percent. The flight attendant's union offered to take a 15-percent cut. TWA refused the offer.

Of even greater concern to both workers and passengers is TWA's insistence on changing the work rules for flight attendants. On domestic flights, attendants are given a minimum of 10 hours of rest between flights. This typically gives a flight attendant 5 or 6 hours of sleep. TWA wants to reduce this by 2 hours, forcing them to operate on 3 to 4 hours sleep. TWA also wants to reduce the number of flight attendants aboard each plane. Extend on-duty time from 12½ to 13 consecutive hours, reduce the minimum rest time on international flights from 24 to 14 hours, cut vacation time 20 percent, and eliminate approximately 1,500 jobs, about 21 percent of the work force.

These demands are not only an affront to the dignity of the flight attendants, they show a shocking disregard for passenger safety. Last year more people died from airline crashes than in any other year in modern aviation history. At a time when we should be working to make airlines safer. TWA's demands would make passenger flights riskier than ever. Flight attendants play a critical role in passenger safety, and are responsible for everything from in-flight medical emergencies to evacuating airplanes during accidents. To force them to operate on only a few hours of sleep, for 13 hours straight, with a smaller staff, is to court disaster.

More troublesome still is the way that TWA is attempting to operate during the strike, hiring inexperienced attendants and rushing them through 18 days of training, instead of the usual 5 weeks. Only last weekend, when a TWA Lockheed 1011 landed in Los Angeles, it was discovered that the flight attendant in charge of passenger deplaning did not even know how to open the airplane door. It was only her second day flying. She was the senior attendant on the plane at the time. If there had been a need for emergency evacuation, the passengers of that flight would have been in dire trouble.

And yet, TWA Chairman Carl Icahn is refusing to negotiate. Yesterday Mr. Icahn did not even bother to go to a scheduled contract negotiation meeting. Perhaps he was preoccupied with announcing TWA's 30 percent discount on all flights, designed to lure passengers back to his troubled airline. Thirty percent may seem like a pretty good discount, but it won't be much comfort if it means flying on an unsafe airplane. This callous approach to contract discussing suggests a contempt not only for the Independent Federation of Flight Attendants, but the safety of thousands of airline passengers as well.

TWA's attitude toward the flight attendants also suggests an undercurrent of sexism. TWA management and noncontract employees were given 14 percent wage cuts. The machinists were given a 15-percent cut, with a "snap-back" clause to restore the cuts when their contract runs out. Yet the flight attendants were told they must accept a 22-percent cut, later changed to a 17-percent cut, with no snap-back clause. Why this disparity? Mr. Icahn refers to the flight attendants as "girls" and promotes the offensive and incorrect notion that they are "not breadwinners," and therefore, they are not entitled to earn the same amount of money that men do. Such prehistoric logic should be left in the caves, and not brought to the negotiating table.

To put the TWA strike in context, we must remember how TWA arrived at its current, precarious position—via the frenzied world of highly-leveraged corporate takeovers. Carl Icahn, a well-known greenmail specialist, spent much of 1985 seeking to take over TWA. His original plan entailed selling off TWA's most valuable asset, the PARS reservation system, and then disposing of the rest of the airline for a quick profit. Instead, he encountered a series of problems that have forced him to try to operate the airline as a legitimate business.

It is not difficult to understand why a corporate raider, who originally sought to dismantle TWA and sell off its parts at a handsome profit, is insensitive to the needs of employees and the safety of the public.

The TWA case illustrates how dangerous the recent frenzy of corporate takeovers has become. Corporate acquisitions occurred at the rate of 11 per day in 1985. Many recent takeovers have been engineered by raiders who are more interested in short-term profit than the long-term health of the corporations they target. Thus, they harm the economy and shatter the lives of communities and workers that are directly involved.

An important factor in the recent rash of acquisitions is the availability of junk bonds, or high-yield securities that have extremely low credit ratings. These bonds are used to finance takeover bids that line the pockets of corporate raiders, but leave previously successful companies close to bankruptcy.

At a time when our industries are facing intense competition from abroad, we cannot afford to have resources diverted to nonproductive takeovers. We should take action now to impose restraints on junk bond financing and other techniques that encourage nonproductive takeovers.

In the meantime, Mr. Icahn should start negotiating with the flight attendants—and begin to think about, the safety of his passengers, and fair dealing with his employees and not just the numbers in his bank account.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEVINE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, had I been present on Thursday, March 6, 1986, I would have voted aye on House Resolution 390 (budget reconciliation, rollcall No. 41). I was away on official business.

FISHING VESSEL INSURANCE LEGISLATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STUDDS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation designed to deal with the crippling shortage of affordable insurance for owners of commercial fishing vessels. I am pleased to have joining me as cosponsors of this legislation the Honorable ROBERT DAVIS, ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Coast Guard and Navigation, and the Honorable CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER, a member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Fishermen throughout the country are faced with the choice of trying to pay for insurance coverage that they cannot afford, or of going to sea without adequate coverage, which they cannot rationally do. Just this week, I have been informed that as many as 1,100 fishing vessels may not have their current insurance policies renewed. Vessel owners have become the pawns of an insurance market over which they are too small to have leverage, but upon which their survival depends. I am well aware that this is not a problem that can be fully resolved by Federal legislative action. The resolution of this crisis will require the cooperation of the insurance industry as well as the imagination of fishermen seeking cheaper coverage through insurance and reinsurance pools and other mechanisms. It will also take time. But I am convinced that there are some legislative steps that can and should be taken to ease the present severity of the problem and to make a long-range solution easier to achieve.

The bill I am introducing today is intended to lend stability and predictability to the insurance market, while treating fairly both the owners of vessels and their crew. The key to the crisis is the vulnerability of the boatowners, and their insurers, to huge settlements involving personal injury. The approach taken by this bill is to restrict the type of damages for which an injured crewmember can sue; thus guaranteeing equitable, but not excessive, compensation for a loss.

Under this bill, vessel owners would be expected to provide medical and hospital expenses—called cure under general maritime law—and maintenance payments of at least $40 per day to compensate injured crew members. Owners who comply with this requirement would then be entitled to limit their additional liability to the full amount of wages lost by a seaman as a result of the injury. A boatowner would not, however, be entitled to a limitation of liability if the injury were caused by his own gross negligence or willful misconduct.

The insurance crisis has spread nationwide, affecting towns, recreational facilities, health care professionals, manufacturers, bars and restaurants, as well as commercial fishermen. Some have argued that we cannot respond to this problem on an industry-by-industry basis. But the fact is that the commercial fishing industry needs immediate help.

One of the reasons that protection and indemnity [P&I] insurance has become increasingly expensive is that court awards to injured fishermen—who are treated as seamen under Federal law—have increased dramatically in recent years. To understand this problem, it is important to note that there exist, under current law, three independent causes of action an injured fisherman can pursue: maintenance and cure, unseaworthiness, and the Jones Act.

MAINTENANCE AND CURE

The maintenance and cure remedy under general maritime law is the legal obligation of the vessel owner to maintain and cure a seaman injured in service to a vessel. Maintenance and cure is only intended to compensate the fisherman for expenses actually incurred as a result of the accident. Under our bill, the vessel owner would be required to pay reasonable costs for maintenance and cure in order to be entitled to a limitation on his liability for other potential costs.

UNSEAWORTHINESS

This remedy allows an injured fisherman to recover against the vessel if his injury was caused by the unseaworthy condition of the vessel, its equipment, or its crew. There is no need to establish negligence on the part of the owners. Our proposed bill would not eliminate unseaworthiness as a cause for action by a crew member against the owner of a vessel.

THE JONES ACT

The Congress provided, in the Jones Act, that "any seaman who shall suffer personal injury in the course of his employment may, at his election, maintain an action for damages at law, with the right of trial by jury." (46 U.S.C. 68ε).

While based upon the negligence of the vessel owner, the Jones Act remedy is very popular in personal injury cases. Unlike the other available remedies which are afforded by admiralty law, a plaintiff in a Jones Act case is entitled to a trial by jury. Since a jury is thought likely to be more sympathetic in the awarding of damages than a judge, the injured seaman will virtually always allege negligence under the Jones Act as well as maintenance and cure and unseaworthiness in his complaint. A jury can then consider the entire complaint.

In recent years, juries have awarded some huge settlements to fishermen under the Jones Act. In one oftcited case, DiMercurio versus DiMercurio Fishing Corporation, the vessel's skipper had his arm broken when a 20-pound block fell from its rigging. The vessel's insurer, New Hampshire Insurance Co., offered a settlement of $20,000. DiMercurio then sued the corporation, of which he was a majority owner, and received a settlement of over $500,000. While this settlement was later reduced by an appeals court, New Hampshire Insurance Co. no longer provides coverage to commercial fishing vessels. Under the proposed bill, crew members would still be entitled to sue under the Jones Act but the liability of a vessel owner who: First, is making maintenance and cure payments and second, is not guilty of gross negligence or willful misconduct, will be limited to the full amount of wages and other compensation lost as a result of the injury.

BACKGROUND

The insurance crisis for fishermen results from the fact that companies concerned by potentially high settlements either cancel policies or rewrite them at much higher premium rates. Since there is virtually no State regulation of maritime insurance, vessel owners do not have the type of protection afforded to many other industries. In Massachusetts, for example, a company providing insurance to a group of approximately 80 vessels canceled the policies, giving the vessel owners 2 weeks notice. A vessel under mortgage cannot go fishing without insurance.

Problems facing the commercial fishing industry must be viewed within the context of the crisis generally facing all those who have to purchase casualty insurance. Insurance profits are derived only in part from premiums. A substantial portion is derived from income generated from investing the premiums. Thus, the recent decline in interest rates, from the high rates of the late 1970's, has caused insurance companies to move away from a number of risky industries since they cannot receive an adequate return on the investment of the premiums to cover the potentially huge settlements they might have to make. In the past, the casualty insurance industry has been cyclical in nature and problems of this type have self-corrected. The present downturn, however, seems to be especially severe.

According to the Wall Street Journal, commercial insurance rates dropped continually during the late 1970's as companies battled for premium dollars to invest during that period of high interest rates. Premiums were driven too low, however, and insurers are currently compensating by raising premiums and getting out of the types of business that have resulted in large claims.

While the problem is clearly national in scope and may require some broader legislative initiatives, there are a number of reasons that the fishing vessel situation is legitimately addressed in a separate bill.

Members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries have been working for over a year to develop a workable solution to the particular difficulties facing the fishing industry, which was one of the first industries to face a serious problem. The committee first held a field hearing on this problem in Boston in October 1984. During the past session of Congress, the Subcommittees on Coast Guard and Navigation and on Fisheries, Wildlife Conservation and the Environment held a series of hearings in Seattle, New Bedford, and San Diego. Since the beginning of this year, committee staff have devoted countless hours to meetings and research.

During these hearings, subcommittee members learned of dramatic increases in the price of P&I insurance, and about shortages of available insurance at any price. As a result, many boats have been forced to stop fishing or are going out with little or no insurance. Further complicating the picture for the fishing industry is the very small percentage that it represents of the insurance written nationwide. For many insurance companies, it is easier to stop writing the insurance for this market than to face the risk of a potentially huge settlement. The small share of the market taken by the fishing industry also limits the willingness of the insurance companies to provide coverage specially tailored to vessels with good safety records, or which operate in relatively safe waters. Accordingly, accidents or sinkings in one region appear to affect the availability and price of insurance throughout the country.

One major goal of our legislation is to limit the potential for the kind of huge settlement that has the tendency to distort the outcome of subsequent litigation, while causing insurance companies to raise premiums or to consider leaving the market altogether.

SAFETY

The shortage of insurance is also related to the very dangerous nature of commercial fishing which, according to the Coast Guard, has become the most dangerous of all U.S. industries. Traditionally, the safety of vessels has been left to owners and operators, while the Federal Government has kept its hands off. It is time for that attitude to change. There is no excuse for a commercial fishing vessel to go to sea today without survival suits, liferafts, emergency signaling gear, and quality communications equipment. This bill would require this equipment on all U.S.-documented seagoing fishing vessels.

INDUSTRY INITIATIVES

The fishing industry has not been sitting idle, awaiting congressional action to solve this problem. Working with a Federal grant provided under the Saltonstall-Kennedy program, which the administration has slated for elimination, the National Council on Fishing Vessel Safety and Insurance conducted a study, run by Prof. Dennis Nixon of the University of Rhode Island, to investigate alternatives to the current compensation schemes available to commercial fishermen. Professor Nixon's report has been an extremely valuable tool for those of us interested in this problem. While the legislation we are proposing today does not directly track Mr. Nixon's recommendations, its development was largely influenced by his report. Like Mr. Nixon, we have attempted to fashion a bill that will make it more attractive to the insurance industry to return to the fishing vessel market, while ensuring that injured fishermen are compensated in a fair and expeditious manner.

The fishing industry has also been making a strong effort to respond, on a voluntary basis, to the safety problem. A series of recommendations on all aspects of vessel construction and operating safety have been developed by the Coast Guard, in cooperation with the industry. The North Pacific Fishing Vessel Owner's Association has been working to develop a safety operations manual that may well be applicable, with modification, to other regions of the country.

CONCLUSION

Limiting the vessel owner's liability to demonstrated lost earnings and medical costs, as proposed in this bill, should result in more readily available insurance, at a more reasonable cost. It must be emphasized, however, that we have no guarantees from the insurance industry that this will in fact take place. While injured seamen could no longer sue for pain and suffering or mental anguish resulting from an injury, they would be fully compensated for any lost income and for medical expenses.

In addition, this bill recognizes the need for improved safety on fishing vessels and sets forth additional safety equipment requirements for documented fishing vessels operating on the high seas. In addition to the requirements already included in chapter 41 of title 46 of the United States Code, these vessels would now be required to carry, as established by regulation, emergency position indicating radio beacons [EPIRB's], visual distress signaling devices, communications equipment, a sufficient number of life rafts and, in certain areas, survival suits for all crewmen aboard the vessel. The addition of these pieces of life saving equipment will help make the vessel a safer place for the seamen to operate.

I think it is obvious that there will be no simple, immediate, or complete solution to the fishing vessel insurance crisis; it is obvious, as well, that events will have to occur outside the arena of Federal legislation to make the provision of insurance to the fishing industry a more attractive proposition. The legislation I have developed is intended as a document for discussion, not a tablet to be consecrated. I encourage other Members of Congress to submit their own proposals, so that we can review a range of options for future action. Despite the limitations on what Federal legislation will be able to accomplish, I am convinced that some measure of relief may be derived from these initiatives, and given the severity of the crisis we face, a failure to be as helpful as possible could not be excused.

NEITHER McCARTHYISM NOR COMMUNISM: HOW CAN WE HAVE A SERIOUS INTELLECTUAL DEBATE ABOUT THE SOVIET EMPIRE, THE THREAT TO FREEDOM AND AMERICA'S ROLE IN THE WORLD?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I want to talk this evening on a very important topic which I am calling "neither McCarthyism nor communism: How can we have a serious intellectual debate about the Soviet empire, the threat to freedom and America's role in the world?"

In recent weeks the debate over Communist Nicaragua and the American effort to help the freedom fighters has grown increasingly bitter. Those who favor the Soviet empire being dealt with in Central America by stopping the Communist Nicaraguan Government and by helping the freedom fighters have, in their passion, used stronger and stronger language to project the consequences of not supporting the freedom fighters and to outline what they see as an intense threat.

Those, on the other hand, who basically focus on the Nicaraguan situation by itself, while minimizing the threat of a Soviet-Cuban colony in North America, have reacted by using equally strong language to warn against the tone and the thrust of the anti-Communist rhetoric.

One side warns of the danger of communism; the other side warns of the danger of McCarthyism. Both have merit. Both are legitimate concerns. On the one hand, there is a real danger from the Soviet empire and communism. On the other hand, we must have a real respect for the right to disagree, to analyze differently, to vigorously advocate different beliefs and propose different courses of action.

While the one side, the right, is motivated by fear of more countries going Communist, of freedom shrinking throughout the world and our own national security being threatened from without, on the other side, the left, there is honest motivation by fear of American involvement in bad causes, by militarism and fearmongering and suppression of the dissent threatening freedom from within.

Both sides are honorable and legitimate. Both sides have legitimate fears. There is a danger to freedom from the Soviet Union. There is a danger to freedom if patriotism becomes a cover for suppressing legitimate dissent.

As a free society, we must learn to argue about the Soviet empire and our own behavior in the world with intellectual rigor and honest passion but without bitterness or attacks on personalities.

Yesterday three of us proposed a course that would move the debate about the Soviet empire and America's role in the world onto a more intellectual plane. We proposed a series of debates. We suggested that there are honest, deep, difficult questions that must be asked about the nature of the Soviet empire, about the competition freedom faces from tyranny around the world, about the history of the last 15 years and our reaction to Soviet, Cuban, and other Communist activities, and about the basic question of actions of the U.S. Congress and of our role in trying to stop the Soviet empire.

We suggested that there is a real point to debating the question of judgment, not patriotism, to debating the question of accountability, not patriotism, to argue about the effectiveness, the intellectual accuracy, the tests in the real world of things we have done as a country over the last few years.

Today I was surprised by several Members of the House who chatted with me about our challenge yesterday as though it was either a personal attack on an individual Member or as though in some way it was too strong, too harsh, as one very bright member of the Foreign Affairs Committee said to me.

So I decided to do this special order tonight to try to outline what I think is a fundamental problem in America today.

It is very difficult to talk about the Soviet empire, Cuba as a colonial police force, using the Cuban army in Angola, Ethiopia, Nicaragua, and elsewhere for the Soviet empire, and the relationship of the United States Congress to that Soviet empire without people getting very nervous and very upset, for several reasons.

One, there is a legitimate cultural memory on the left of Joe McCarthy, of a period in American history which was frightening, of the danger of dissent being suppressed, of witch hunts, of searches for spies that did not exist.

On the other hand, one would have to say there really are spies, there really are dangers. We really have to ask the question: How can we talk about the effect of our behavior without impugning the motives of our behavior?

Let me draw an analogy: If someone said to you that they wanted to become a nutrition expert but you noticed that they were in fact a bartender, if they said to you that their goal was to help people lead healthier lives, but you noticed that over the last 6 months they had convinced 30 people to become alcoholics, if they said to you that their goal was to help people do better, but you noticed that three of their customers in a drunken stupor had driven into a tree and killed themselves, you might be legitimately entitled to ask a question about the effect of their behavior as distinct from the intention of their behavior.

People often intend to do good. That does not necessarily mean that they achieve good.

All of us, to take an example that does not involve the Communist empire, can look at the sincere and decent concerns of President Carter and others for the people of Iran, the desire to improve the Government of Iran from the conditions that it had under the Shah; and yet it is very hard to argue that Iran under Khomeini has a tyranny that has killed thousands of people in religious persecutions, that has been involved in a bitter war with Iraq, that has imposed a police state. It is very hard to argue that the good intentions of those people who meant well have been rewarded by the people of Iran doing better. In fact, I think it is overwhelmingly clear that the people of Iran are worse off today than they were before that.

Two years ago there was a strong argument in this House because a number of us were reading a paper by Frank Gregorsky, entitled, "What's the Matter with Democratic Foreign Policy?" into the record, and there was a feeling that the paper was too strong. And yet, if I can tonight, let me simply suggest that anyone interested in this debate would do very well to get a copy of Mr. Gregorsky's paper and reread it, because the most consistent thing that comes out in his paper, simply by walking through case after case after case, is the fact that people who meant well were wrong about what would happen in South Vietnam. We have quotes in here from honest, sincere, patriotic, well-meaning Americans, who simply were wrong. They said:

> If only we would get out, somehow the North Vietnamese would have a compromise, there wouldn't be a dictatorship, and they would have an agreement politically.

As we all know, South Vietnam today is a Communist dictatorship, the Government is so horrible that over a million people have fled in boats, and in fact the people who said that were just wrong. They misunderstood the nature of the virus of communism; they misanalyzed what was happening.

There are quotes in Mr. Gregorsky's paper of people who said about Cambodia:

> If only we would abandon Lon Nol and get out of Cambodia, then good things would happen. If only we would leave, then peace would come to Cambodia.

As we all know, this Congress voted that we leave. We did leave. And what happened was the worst single atrocity since the Nazi Holocaust. And in fact as a percentage of population, an unbelievable number of Cambodians died because the Communists who took over and systematically butchered innocent decent people.

Then there is the case, to carry it a stage further, of Ethiopia. Can anyone seriously argue that the current Communist government of Ethiopia is better than Haile Selassie, the previous government which was a dictatorship, which was a monarchy, which was in some ways a medieval government?

But can anyone argue that a country, which under Communist leadership, with Cuban troops there today, with Soviet advisers there today, killing, according to the French organization "Doctors Without Borders" over a thousand people a day in forced resettlement camps? Can anyone argue that those people are not worse off, that in fact the Communist government of Ethiopia is terrible?

Or to take another case. This Congress voted for what was called the Clark amendment. This Congress said that faced with the threat and the challenge of the Soviet Union and the Soviet empire moving Cuban troops, serving, as I said earlier, as the colonial army of the Soviet empire, into Angola and Mozambique, this Congress voted, in 1975, to say that we would stay out of the way. It violated Harry Truman's warning when Truman said, and I quote:

> I had a very good picture of what a revival of American isolationism would mean for the world. After World War II, it was clear that without American participation, there was no power capable of meeting Russia as an equal.

Truman was saying that if the Russians were determined to fly Cuban troops into Angola, and the United States did nothing, then communism would win. The United States did nothing, communism has now been in charge of Angola for 11 years, and while Savimbi is in the field, and has been for 18 years against both Portuguese and Cuban and Soviet powers, nonetheless, you cannot argue that freedom has won or that the people of Angola are better off.

Take the case of Cuba. Throughout the sixties and early seventies innocent, well-meaning young Americans, mostly upper middle class flew to Cuba for 30 or 40 days of cutting sugarcane, of showing solidarity with the Cuban revolution. Yet, while they were in the fields feeling good about themselves, we now know without any question, Cuba was a totalitarian prison camp. Poets, writers, dramatists were thrown in jail and thousands of people were being persecuted. The Cuban Army was being trained by the Soviet Union, and the Cuban Secret Police were working with the Soviet KGB to train terrorists around the world. Yet, even today, those innocent young people now grown middle aged look on with nostalgia at Fidel Castro as though he were somehow a hero instead of merely being a militaristic dictator in charge of a Communist colony of the Soviet empire.

Then we come to Grenada. The Grenadian revolution kicked out a dictator, a bad dictator and replaced it with a Communist, Leninist party. We know that it was a Leninist party because they say so. We know it was Leninist because after the liberation of Grenada we captured all of their documents. We know that they said to themselves over and over again. that they were allies of the Soviet Union, they were the allies of Communist Cuba, they were good Communists, they were allies of Libya, that they were against the United States; but, that they would publicly always lie because they had been taught by the Cubans and the Soviets that to tell the truth to the Americans was simply to mobilize the American nation, and that the Americans would believe any lie that sounded good because it allowed Americans to avoid being responsible.

Now we know all that. We have a 1,000-page thick public document of selected Grenadian documents. We have in fact 35,000 pounds of documents on microfiche sitting over at the National Archives available for anyone to read. We know that they lied to U.S. Congressmen; we know that U.S. Congressmen were willing to believe those lies. We know that they were wrong.

Finally, we come to Nicaragua. The Nicaraguan Communist leadership is Marxist-Leninist; it says so in public. The Nicaraguan Communist leadership came from a party founded by a man named Fonseca who himself had written an essay in 1957 entitled, "A Nicaraguan Visits Moscow," in which he said flatly that the Soviet Union had free churches and free newspapers and that the Soviet suppression of the Hungarian Revoluation was an example of Communist self-criticism.

Now, a man who believes that the Soviet Union has free churches and has free press is a man who will believe almost anything. And a man who believes that Soviet tanks crushing brave Hungarian freedom fighters is a sign of self-criticism is a man capable of becoming a true Stalinist and imposing a real Communist dictatorship.

Faced with the fact that we knew that the leaders of the so-called Sandinistas were in fact Communists deliberately using a national term to hide their real beliefs, a number of us began warning that in fact if we were not very careful in the late 1970's we were going to end up with a Communist Nicaragua.

Today, we have a Communist Nicaragua. Now, given just the cases I have outlined, and Mr. Gregorsky goes through most of them step by step by step; given that they were wrong in Vietnam and communism came to the South; given that they were wrong in Cambodia and communism killed over a million people; given that they were wrong in Ethiopia and communism kills today, a thousand people a day, without mass rallies, with no one being arrested in front of the Ethiopan Embassy with no effort by our friends on the left to say much about it; given that they were wrong in Angola and 35,000 Communist Cuban troops today prop up a Communist dicatorship, and given that they were wrong about Grenada, and it was, as we now know from the documents, a Communist tyranny; given that they were wrong about Cuba, and given that they were wrong about Nicaragua, one might ask the question: Why would they think they are right this time?

Let me read what Harry Truman, a Democrat, a hard-line anti-Communist himself said, and I quote:

> Within our own nation I had seen many well-meaning groups who campaign for peace at any price while apologizing for the aggressive acts of the Russians as merely a reflection of Russian reaction to our own tough policy. Many respectable Americans espoused such ideas without realizing the danger to which they were subjecting our national security and the freedoms for which we had fought so hard.

What was President Truman trying to say in the late 1940's? He was saying that there are two deep traditions in American life which are noble and moral but which are destructive in the real world. One is the tradition of pacifism which goes deep in our church structure and which has very strong followings at theology schools and always has, a pacifism which, in the 1930's was opposed to doing anything about Adolf Hitler, and a pacifism which in the 1980's is opposed to doing anything about communism.

Second was a tradition of isolationism, of America being separated from the rest of the world by big oceans and being able to avoid involvement. Those two traditions came together on the left in the Henry Wallace campaign of 1948, in which the Progressive Party ran against Harry Truman on the grounds that Harry Truman was much, much too strong an anti-Communist. That he was unreasonable in his opposition to communism.

The Henry Wallace Progressive Party tradition had as one of the aggressive, younger supporters George McGovern. A young man then, a man who had come out of a good religious background, a man who believes essentially in the pacifistic isolationist tradition of that particular part of the American tradition.

Not an ignoble tradition, not an unnatural tradition, but a tradition which, in a truly dangerous world could be markably destructive.

The question then becomes, and I think it is a deep question and one that one has to look at: How can we discuss and debate this tradition stipulating that it is an argument between patriots, it is an argument between good Americans, it is an argument about the nature of the world, the nature of the Soviet empire, the nature of its threat to our survival and the whole issue of whether or not the United States can be effective in the world at large.

I say this because it is totally wrong for anyone on the right to suggest that our opponents are not committed, patriotic, sincere, dedicated Americans. But it is equally wrong for those on the left to say that to question their judgment, to question their record, to look at the underlying core of values of what happened out in the world.

Not what they meant to do, not what they would have liked to have happen, but what happened is wrong. It seems to me, and I want to quote here from the Washington Post, as quoted by Frank Gregorsky, to show you a sense of how far back this argument goes and why Harry Truman is the right person to bring into the argument.

On January 14, 1984, the Washington Post ran an article about George McGovern and made the point that he was not one of the Democrats radicalized by Vietnam; that in Gregorsky's language, he was a radical 40 years ago. He condemned the Truman doctrine in 1947. This is a quote now from the Washington Post, quoting George McGovern:

> U.S. military aid is flowing into Greece in an effort to prop up a decadent reactionary monarchy, a feudal policy which we inherited from the British at a time when they had already realized its stupidity.

Now, I would simply say to anyone who has visited Greece, was it worth it? Was it worth helping to stop communism? Is it good to have a free country you can visit? Is it good to have a free country that is part of NATO? Is it good to know that millions of decent people at the very home of democracy in Athens are themselves free? Was that a legitimate expenditure of U.S. resources?

When you look back 40 years, are you glad that Harry Truman won and that the Democrats who were committed to stopping communism won, or do you wish that George McGovern had won, that in fact we had not helped Greece, that it had gone Communist, that the eastern Mediterranean had been Communist, in which case today Turkey would probably be Communist. There would be no Israel and, in fact, we would not recognize the world as it is.

But McGovern was consistent. In 1948, he said:

> Under the blinding light of the current red scare we are going all out for nationalism, militarism, suspicion and power politics. Do we realize that we only show our loss of faith in the American dream when we foolishly hope to stop Communism with dollars and bombs?

That was 1948. Was McGovern attacking vicious right wing Ronald Reagan? No; this is in fact on Harry Truman.

And what was Harry Truman trying to do in 1948? He was proposing that we defend Western Europe; you know, those reactionary countries, Germany, Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, France, Italy, Britain.

Think of it, Harry Truman had the gall to say maybe we should do what is necessary so that Germany would be free. Is it not terrible? Harry Truman had the gall to say maybe we should do what is necessary so that Britain is free, so that Norway is free.

Let me repeat the quote from McGovern, because I think if you look at it you will hear almost the same words today from the direct heirs of Henry Wallace and George McGovern on this House floor in the next week:

> Under the blinding light of the current red scare we are going all out for nationalism, militarism, suspicion and power politics. Do we realize that we only show our loss of faith in the American dream when we foolishly hope to stop Communism with dollars and bombs.

Now, notice, 1948 is 3 years after World War II. A man who had lived through and in fact in his case I believe fought in World War II, who had seen Adolf Hitler's Nazi Germany, who could then turn and think that the American dream would survive in a dangerous world without dollars and bombs, who would think that somehow magically the Soviet empire would respect Coca-Cola and therefore we did not need the tanks, that the Soviet empire would understand the importance of the Phil Donahue show so that we do not need the fighter aircraft, that the Soviet empire would be dazzled by watching Dallas on the evening show and therefore we did not need to have any kind of strengths?

This, remember, is right at the point of the Berlin airlift when the Soviet Union in fact blocked all land traffic and it was only the use of the airlift that allowed us to keep Berlin free.

This is just before the North Koreans invaded South Korea. What American dream would have saved South Korea had George McGovern, rather than Harry Truman, been President?

I say this because it is important to understand the degree to which the modern left is the direct heir of George McGovern, that Harry Truman and John F. Kennedy have lost control of their party and that it has been replaced by the Wallace-McGovern wing.

Let me quote one other George McGovern quotation from 1971, a Fortune magazine interview:

> I don't believe the Soviets would even try to test me because I would think they would regard me as a friend and would do everything they could to keep my friendship.

Well, the point is, anyone who thinks of the Soviet empire as friends or is thinking of us as friends does not understand the Soviet empire. It is not a question whether George McGovern is pro-Soviet. I do not think he is. I have debated George. He is a bright guy, very, very intelligent man. I think he honestly and fundamentally misunderstands the nature of the Soviet Union. He does not understand that it is a police state. He does not believe Leninism is real. He does not think they in fact are serious and in a sense, as Charles Krauthammer has pointed out in his book, it is doing them a disservice. These are serious people. The North Vietnamese were serious people. The Cuban Communists are serious people. The Soviet KGB are serious people. They deserve to be taken seriously on their own terms.

There is something almost arrogant in the willingness of the American left to say, "Oh, they really don't mean what they say. They really aren't doing what they are doing. Somehow we know better."

Why do I focus on the McGovern-Wallace tradition in explaining the debate about America's role in Central America and the danger of the Soviet empire and of Communist Cuba imposing a Communist Nicaragua? Well, it is partially, as Gregorsky sites on page 52 of his paper in quoting from a review of the Coercive Utopians in Fortune magazine, the review said, by Michael Levin:

> The book's authors tell us that the New Left is all over the place, older but not particularly wiser. The veterans of those passionate crusades of the sixties today command influence greatly disproportionate to their numbers. Far from having disappeared, they are strategically situated in the churches, the think tanks, the mass media, government bureaucracies and other branches of what the authors call the consciousness industries.

Gregorsky goes on to say, and I quote from Gregorsky:

> They are strategically located in the House, too, though few would think to look for them there.

The point is this. There was a very small stream of people in the late 1940's who honestly believed that turning the other cheek would somehow convince Joseph Stalin not to worry. They believed that if the Russians were being bad, it is because we forced them to. They believed that if the Russians were being aggressive, it was because America is rich and the Russians were jealous; so whatever happened, it was always because the Communists were being forced to by the Americans, because we as the largest country in the world were always the people making them do something, because we were always guilty.

In the late 1940's, in the 1948 election, Henry Wallace and George McGovern and the left wing, what Gregorsky calls the "radical worldview" lost to Harry Truman and from 1948 to 1965 the Harry Truman-John F. Kennedy wing of the Democratic Party dominated the Democratic Party and dominated the American intellectual community.

That was a belief, a group who said, and including Hubert Humphrey as part of it, Henry Jackson, Jean Kirkpatrick, Ronald Reagan was a Democrat for a large part of that period; Ronald Reagan, for example, campaigned for Harry Truman and Hubert Humphrey in 1948 because Reagan was the anti-Communist leader of a labor union in Hollywood and Reagan was an anti-Communist Democrat, and that wing of the Democratic Party dominated the debate and the McGovern wing was very tiny and except for a handful of people had almost no real influence in this country.

Then as the United States got mired down, Lyndon Johnson lost his nerve. The fact that President Kennedy had been assassinated robbed the Democratic Party of its most articulate and I think best visionary leader since FDR and there was no one who had the nerve and the ability, and it took both, to articulate and explain Vietnam in the context of Harry Truman's concern about communism.

So the country split. Essentially three things happened in parallel along with the rise of the baby boom generation. You had an enormous biological upsurge of just lots and lots of young people suddenly getting to be adolescents, so the sheer energy of the younger generation was available, and normally you have, as we saw in the twenties with the flappers, we have seen it again and again in their history, if there are enough young people at any given moment, there will be a natural tendency to try to test the established values. That tendency took three forms in the 1960's.

First of all, it took the form of the civil rights movement in what was a very positive and very good long-term thrust that broke the back of segregation, but in the process legitimized challenging legal authority headon through sit-ins and civil disobedience.

Second, it took the form of the free speech movement, beginning at Berkeley, CA, and the notion that going braless and using dirty words and not having learned grammar were virtues and that somehow this younger generation had discovered new ways of seeing the world.

Third, it took the form of the antiwar protestors and the assault on the American establishment's commitment to stopping communism in Southeast Asia.

Those three streams of behavior came together in a mood of self-righteousness, a mood which legitimized rioting in the streets of Chicago in 1968, a mood which came for the hard left to mean, "We're right and they're wrong and, therefore, we can do whatever we want to."

Watergate came along and frankly fixated that belief. The mood became clear that the American Government really was unacceptable, that it was not legitimate for the American Government to do things, that we were not truly an honorable system.

So the combination of the rise of the baby boom generation and sheer biological energy and the sense of adolescence, the civil rights movement, the free speech movement, the antiwar movement and Watergate meant that by 1974 there was an entire network of activists younger left wing Democrats and a handful of left wing Republicans, but primarily left wing Democrats, who suddenly managed to win elections in seats they would not normally have held and they came to Washington honestly believing that the primary problem in the world was the United States and its inability to restrain itself, that it was the CIA in Washington and not the KGB in Moscow that we had to fear; that the greatest danger to America was the suppression of dissent and that anybody who talked seriously about communism was a kook.

That move became very sincere and very deeply fixed and there are many people in this House today who honestly and sincerely and patriotically believe that.

I emphasize, these are decent, well-meaning, highly misguided Americans, with a remarkably low level of historical information and they are people who now cherish their belief at the expense of data, a psychological process called cognitive dissonance, which says that if you learn something new that threatens what you already believe, you will try to avoid learning it, that it is better to keep remembering what you believe. It is a little bit like a person who likes chocolate ice cream and also wants to lose weight, so they reject the information that there are a lot of calories in chocolate ice cream, because they do not want to think about it.

What we have now is an entire group of people who have been actively unwilling to confront the Soviet empire for in some cases as many as 20 years now, who are relatively important. In the seminaries they are often the theologians who are training the next generation of ministers into this left wing pacifist isolationism, which then goes out and imbues the churches. In many cases they are college professors who teach classes based on the myths they believe, rather than the facts that are available. In many cases they are politicians who believe so deeply in the world as they would like it to be that they do not deal with the world as it is.

Let me emphasize again, it is not a question of patriotism. It is a question of belief systems, of ideologies, of a way of thinking about the world.

Let me quote from Georgie Anne Geyer to give you a sense of where this all comes from. June 6, 1984:

> Almost without people knowing it, the old question of how Fidel Castro became a Communist has among all the scholars and serious analysts that I know virtually been solved and today no one seriously blames it on the United States. The United States did not decide the character of the revolution, Carlo Franki, the Cuban who was Mr. Castro's closest advisor in the early years said recently at a small session in Washington. Fidel himself said that the United States did not change the character of the Cuban revolution, that the Cuban revolution was socialist before. He is the first one in Latin America to discover how to have total power.

Now, I can report to this House that as recently as three weeks ago I debated a leftwing Democratic Member of this House, a very bright man, a very articulate man, who said, "We made Castro become a Communist and if we had been nice to him, he wouldn't have been."

Yet here you have Georgie Anne Geyer outlining and quoting from one of Castro's closest advisers that Castro had always been a Communist.

I can cite Hugh Thomas' book, which is the most authoritative single work, he is a Britisher, not an American. He is not generally considered to be a rightwinger. He is the most authoritative student of the Cuban revolution and he is quite clear that in fact Castro wanted total power and Castro was going to get total power and the only country that would side with Castro as he sought total power was the Soviet Union.

Yet today in this House there are, I would venture to guess, 150 Members who honestly and sincerely believe that if it were not for the United States, Castro would today be a nice man that we could deal with; but the fact is that Castro was a Communist, was determined to impose a dictatorship, and while he was a more opportunistic Communist than Gorbachev, he is a man who has in effect sold his country into being a Soviet plantation which primarily produces two products, sugar and soldiers.

So he has added the country's children to the exports, and today there are 35,000 Cuban soldiers who are busily imposing slavery in Angola in order to earn money from the Soviet empire for Fidel Castro's Communist Cuba.

Let me cite another person about a general problem, Mayor Ed Koch of New York. Mayor Koch said in October to November 1983, Public Opinion, and I quote:

> There are extremists in our party who have never voted for a single defense appropriation or authorization bill because they found some particular defense expenditure objectionable. When I was in Congress, I would often vote against the defense authorization bill because that is where the mischief is done. I would take a stand in opposition to particular expenditures, but I did vote for many of the appropriation bills because I favored a strong defense. If our defense depended upon those people who vote against every defense bill, we would be living under some Soviet commissar.

Notice the explicit statement that there are a group of people in the House who so consistently vote against defense bills that if we depended on them for our defense, and I quote from Mayor Koch, a Democrat from New York, "We would be living under some Soviet commissar." This is not a rightwing statement. Mayor Koch does not work for the Reagan White House. Mayor Koch, in fact, is a Democrat, but he is a Democrat in the Harry Truman, John F. Kennedy tradition.

Where then are we today? Those of us who fear the Soviet empire, those of us who believe the Soviet empire is real have a very great challenge. Somehow we have to reach out to our colleagues in this House, we have to reach out to the intellectual community, we have to reach out to the Nation at large and make the argument that what is at stake is a question of reality, and the way to measure that reality is in the words of Al Smith, the Happy Warrior, the Democratic Presidential nominee of 1928, to look at the record, to challenge every person who several years ago signed the Commandante Ortego letter urging that the Nicaraguan Communist change, to look at them. They have not changed, although it has been almost 3 years since you sent them that letter. To urge every person who has found excuse after excuse to avoid the reality of communism in Central America and say look at it; there is a Soviet Empire.

I have debated at least four times with leftwing Democrats from this House on television who have said how can you be afraid of Nicaragua. And in that question, they make my point about the Wallace-McGovern leftwing radical mindset about the world. If Nicaragua by itself were the question, there is no excuse for the United States to be involved. If Nicaragua and the Communist dictatorship of Nicaragua existed in isolation, there is no reason for us to send money. If a local dictatorship in a local area was all that mattered, it would not be important.

Oh, morally it would be. Morally a Communist dictatorship is always worse than an authoritarian dictatorship. Even Dan Rather said that on December 13, 1983, and I am quoting now Dan Rather of "CBS News":

> Somoza was a dictator. But he never enjoyed the security enjoyed by the Andropovs of the world. Under Somoza Nicaragua had religious freedom, and a degree of freedom of the press that seemed to vary with the government's mood, and some economic freedom if you weren't a peasant.
> Somoza's Nicaragua was not a nice place. But, all in all, his country may have been a freer place than the Soviet Union or any of its satellites. It's not exactly fashionable to think in these terms . . . I think the authoritarian-versus-totalitarian debate is a good one to keep in mind as we think these days about Central America—as we think about Nicaragua, about El Salvador, and other such countries.

That is from Dan Rather's radio commentary on "CBS News." We would hope that all dictatorships would become democracies. We would hope that everywhere that the rule of one man over others exists, that we can work for the rule of all men and women over themselves through self-government.

But if all we were faced with in Nicaragua was a local government and a local problem, then I would argue we have no business being there.

Yet I want to go back to Harry Truman's quote because I think it is the crux of what is wrong with the modern radical world view and the crux of what is wrong with our friends on the left today and their opposition to helping the freedom fighters. Harry Truman said, and I want to quote it again:

> I had a very good picture of what a revival of American isolationism would mean for the world. After World War II, it was clear that without American participation, there was no power capable of meeting Russia as an equal.

Now what do our friends on the left say? They say, well, why don't we negotiate, let us not send any military aid while we negotiate.

One might agree with that after we match the Soviet empire. The Soviet empire currently has an estimated 8,000 advisers in Nicaragua. The Soviet empire has sent $1.4 million in aid to Nicaragua to impose a Communist government.

If their side of the playing field gets $1.4 million in help, gets Hind helicopters, gattling guns and rockets, armored personnel carriers, if their side gets 8,000 advisers, and now we are going to stop, and we are going to talk while they consolidate, we guarantee the establishment of a Communist colony in Nicaragua. That is the first failure of our friends on the left. They want the West to talk while the Communist bloc digs in. Not because they are pro-Communist, but because I think to the best of my understanding they do not seem to understand the concept of Leninism, the concept of a Soviet empire, and the concept of what happens when a Communist tyranny starts to impose itself.

Let me quote, to give you a sense of that tyranny, from Nguyan Van Canh, a former Saigon University law professor, now living in Los Angeles. He is talking about what has happened in South Vietnam in a Communist tyranny imposed by the secret police, and it is exactly the same kind of system established in Nicaragua, and it explains why Nicaraguans who are quoted on radio or television or in the newspaper are very careful. Listen to this description of exactly the kind of block system that the Cubans have imposed in Cuba, that the Soviets use and that the Nicaraguans are learning from the Cubans and the Vietnamese.

> Imagine a society in which you have to keep attending political meetings, usually when you are too tired or have better things to do. Any chance remark that you let fall at one of these meetings could result in your being denounced as a reactionary and sent to a concentration camp . . . Or suppose that you happen to meet two friends at a cafe and strike up a conversation with them. If a security agent or government informer happens to see you, you will all three be invited to visit the ward security office. There you will be separated from each other and required to make declarations as to what you talked about. If there is any discrepancy between the declarations, you can be sent to a concentration camp for the rest of your life. At the least, your name will be placed on a list of suspicious persons. Once your name is on the list, you could be arrested and interned at any time. Even your children may be interned.

I would challenge any of our friends on the left to come in at any time this week, next week or the forthcoming years because tragically the Soviet empire will be around a long time, and challenge that description. The Cubans under Castro developed a Communist neighborhood block system tied into the secret police. The Vietnamese have a Communist neighborhood block system tied into the secret police, and Nicaragua is learning how to establish a Communist neighborhood block system backed by the secret police.

So the longer we are unwilling to help the freedom fighters, the deeper entrenched the secret police and the neighborhood system gets.

Second, our friends on the left say, well, even if Nicaragua is bad, and even if the Soviet empire is terrible, no one in Latin America seems very eager to jump up and down and ask us to come in. There are two reasons for that. In the first place, there is a tradition of the giant of the north of the American colossus; that is, a tradition that sometimes has been good. It saved Central and South America from nazism in 1940 and 1941. It is also a tradition that sometimes in the past was bad, the famous stories of United Fruit Co. and the Marines.

No Latin American politician, particularly in a free society, can jump up and down and call for the North Americans to come without looking like he has betrayed or she has betrayed the essence of historic tradition.

But there is a second reason that I think that Central and South American governments are very cautious. They know that the Cubans and the Soviets are serious, they know that if they shoot their mouths off very much in public the Cuban reaction is to arm more guerrillas, to start a guerrilla war in their country, to have the terrorists start setting off bombs, start killing randomly and they know the best way to keep the guerrillas down for the moment is to say nothing.

If Colombia or Brazil or Mexico were to stand up tomorrow morning and decide they were going to help us take out communism in Nicaragua, the very first thing they know would happen is the Soviet and Cuban terrorist networks in their own countries would go to work the following evening. Their countries would be targets. Furthermore, they know tragically that the United States is a remarkably unreliable ally. This is something every American should think about and in my judgment think about with some sense of shame. If you were in Central America or South America and you had watched this Congress leave Vietnam and let it go Communist, leave Cambodia and let a holocaust take place with a million people dying, leave Laos, do nothing effective about Afghanistan, ignore a thousand dead a day in Ethiopia under the Communists, allow the Cubans to ship 35,000 men into Angola, would you really want to bet on the American side? Would you want to gamble on this Congress if you were a prudent, cautious Central or South American Government?

So ironically the very leftwing radical world view which creates the uncertainty and the insecurity, which voted with glee to leave Vietnam, which voted excitedly to cutoff aid in Angola, which was enthusiastic about accepting the Communist Sandinistas in Nicaragua, that same group having established the instability now turns and points to people who are frightened because they do not trust America and says, "You see, they aren't willing to stand up, so why should we?" yet the fact is, as Harry Truman pointed out, if we do not lead against the Soviets and the Cubans, who is going to? If we have not the courage to contest Soviet helicopters in our own backyard, who is going to? If we are not willing to make it difficult for the Soviet empire to get a colony in our backyard, who is going to? If we are uncertain in this House, can we ask Honduras to be brave? If we are confused in this House, can we ask Costa Rica to stand firm? If we have tolerated now for 28 years a Communist colony in Cuba on our doorstep, should we be surprised that Panama or Bolivia or Brazil would tolerate a Communist Nicaragua? If the largest, most powerful defender of freedom on the planet will not clean up its own neighborhood, does it really expect its weaker, more timid neighbors to do the job for it?

Ah, but the third argument of our friends on the left is that the freedom fighters cannot win, that it is a waste of money, that we should not do it because it will not get us anywhere. I want to quote in that sense from one of the most articulate spokesmen in this House. In a committee meeting last year while successfully arguing for aid to the Cambodian contras, a man who normally stands for a more leftwing analysis, but in this case made, I thought, a beautifully articulate plea. He said, and I quote:

> There is no way the noncommunist resistance is ever going to force Vietnam out. That is clearly impossible. But what is possible is that an increasingly effective resistance by increasing the price Vietnam has to pay for their occupation of Cambodia might induce the Vietnamese to agree to a political settlement.

I would say to our friends on the left, if it makes sense to send money all the way across the world to Cambodia to help Cambodian freedom fighters against communism, why does it not make sense to send a little money in our own neighborhood to help Nicaraguan freedom fighters against communism? If, as this gentleman said, there is no way the non-Communist resistance is ever going to force Vietnam out, that is clearly impossible, what is possible is that an increasingly effective resistance by increasing the price Vietnam has to pay for their occupation of Cambodia might induce the Vietnamese to a political settlement. Then could we not change a few words? Could we not accept the argument of the left and say, to paraphrase, "There is no way the non-Communist resistance is every going to force the Communists out of Managua. That is clearly impossible. but what is possible is that an increasingly effective resistance by increasing the price that Cuba and the Soviet Union have to pay for their occupation of Nicaragua might induce the Nicaraguan Communists to agree to a political settlement." So I would argue that even on the left in Afghanistan and in Cambodia they are willing to accept the argument of supporting the side of freedom even though it is difficult and even though it would be hard because it is the right side, because it is the right thing to do, and because in the long run it is our best hope.

Finally, our friends on the left say, "Ah, but if we start getting involved in Central America and if the freedom fighters do not win, then aren't we going to send American troops? Isn't this the first step toward American boys dying in a distant jungle in a country far from home?"

The question I would ask is simple: Nicaragua is closer than Germany, there were American troops saving freedom; Nicaragua is closer than Korea, but there American troops were saving freedom in the Far East; Nicaragua is in our own backyard. I am against sending American troops to Nicaragua. That is why I want to help freedom fighters help themselves. I am not willing to accept communism. It seems to me there are only three functional choices next Wednesday. You can vote to accept communism not because you are pro-Communist but because in your honest, legitimate judgment communism is less dangerous than the alternatives. You can vote to help the Nicaraguan freedom fighters and hopefully that will stop communism and make a change. Or you can vote, you can hope that nothing will happen, but if it does we are going to send American troops.

My challenge to the friends on the left is simple: If we do not do anything now, if the Nicaraguan Government consolidates itself, what then? Last night on MacNeil-Lehrer, one of the Democrats who articulates brilliantly the radical worldview, began explaining that if things go bad we could send in the Marines. I have to confess I was on the show with him and I was so stunned that I did not ask him the obvious question: "If you think there is any likelihood of sending in our boys to die sometime in the future, isn't it far better to help the freedom fighters now?" I literally sat there amazed and I did not react very quickly because it was so inconceivable to me that he would say it. If Nicaragua destabilizes Honduras, as they promised they would in radio addresses in 1981, if they continue to help the guerrillas in El Salvador now as they have been doing for 8 years, what will we do? On the right we have an answer. It is an answer from Harry Truman, from John F. Kennedy, from Dwight Eisenhower, it is an answer from Hubert Humphrey, it is an answer that says help the forces of freedom because Nicaraguan freedom fighters want to help themselves.

On the left it seems to me there are only two answers. One is to accept communism. Nicaragua is Communist, that is fine, let's not do anything. If Honduras becomes Communist that will be fine, let's not do anything. If Mexico becomes Communist presumably that is fine, let's not do anything. At which point I might point out Pat Buchanan, the President's Communications Director, will be right because if Mexico becomes Communist, there will be Communists on the San Diego County line. And that is the stated goal of the Nicaraguan Communists, and we can produce more than enough citations where they said that over and over again. But if our friends on the radical worldview, those on the Democratic left and the very few who are on the Republican left do not believe we should help the freedom fighters and they do not want to accept communism, my challenge to them before they vote next Wednesday is what is your solution? You promised to negotiate. As early as 1979 we have testimony from leaders of the Democratic Party in this House that they are going down to Nicaragua to make sure it got to be free. We have letters sent as early as 1983 to Daniel Ortega asking him to be free. We have had speech after speech after speech and with every letter we send two new Cuban military advisers arrive, with every mission we send, another $100,000 of Soviet equipment arrives; for every American delegation, there is a Soviet helicopter. How long, I would ask, can our friends on the left kid themselves about what is happening?

And if you have no solution other than to accept communism, then vote "No" and go home or go out to the press and say "Look, I can tell you in my honest judgment as an American patriot that a Communist Nicaragua is less dangerous than the alternative." That is an honest debate. If your solution is to say if they do anything across the borders I will send in American troops and risk American boys dying, then say that. If you do not have a solution other than those two, then I would hope you would vote yes, because at least Ronald Reagan is trying, at least the American President has found a solution that does not accept communism and does not risk American lives. The United States and the Soviets are at a crossroads in Central America. The Soviets already have committed $1.4 billion in aid to help their Communist Nicaraguan allies. The Soviets have sent 200 advisers who will colonize a Communist Nicaragua. Cuba has sent 7,500 advisers. In addition, Bulgaria and East Germany have sent contingents of advisers. The Soviets have made their choice. They intend to stay on the North American continent and build naval ports and military airfields in Nicaragua to add to the bases they already have in Communist Cuba.

Why has the Soviet Union gambled so heavily in Nicaragua? Because the Soviet ally, Colonel Qadhafi of Libya, said recently, Nicaragua is right in America's backyard. At very little cost to themselves the Soviets are hundreds of miles closer to the Panama Canal. For the first time the Soviets have airfields in Nicaragua that would let their spy planes fly down the American west coast.

I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RITTER. I would like to just refer to the Qadhafi statement. Qadhafi's statement, more explicitly, was: Why do we fight with the Sandinistas? We fight with the Sandinistas because they fight the United States on the doorstep of the United States.

Mr. GINGRICH. I appreciate the gentleman putting in the more correct citation, and I would say Colonel Qadhafi understands what he is doing. He is trying to defeat us. Meanwhile our friends on the left are trying to negotiate with the forces who are trying to defeat us. So you have the highly unequal experience of one side sitting down—it is like a football game where one side is trying to negotiate while the other side tries to score touchdowns. And then we wonder why they are gaining. Look at what they are gaining.

For the first time, the Soviets have airfields in Nicaragua to let their spy planes fly down the American west coast just as Cuban airfields let the Soviets spy on our east coast. For the first time, Soviets can launch guerrilla wars into El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala, and Mexico from a land base on the North American continent. That will mean waves of "foot people," refugees coming to America overland through Mexico. For the first time, the Soviets can divert our attention and resources to our southern border, which has been totally peaceful for 70 years.

Yet even with such great gains possible, it's very unusual for the Soviets to take the gamble of confronting us in our backyard. Normally the Soviets are slow, patient chess players moving carefully from calculated risk to the next calculated risk.

The Soviets gambled in Nicaragua because they believe the U.S. Congress ultimately will protect them from risk. Soviets have studied our Congress for a long time. They know how deeply some Congressmen, a few key Democrats in particular, dislike any decisive, firm foreign policy to deal with this threat.

There are now two wings of liberalism in Congress today. One wing denies we should do anything about the Soviet empire in Central America. The other wing admits the Soviet empire in Nicaragua is bad, but they will only support steps they know will be ineffective.

America has three choices. We can accept a Soviets colony in Nicaragua and hope it doesn't spread. That choice only guarantees that the Nicaraguan freedom fighters will collapse. And if that happens communism will gradually spread throughout Central America.

The second choice would be to send American troops into Nicaragua.

The third choice, the best choice, is to help the Nicaraguan freedom fighters liberate their own country. Nicaraguan freedom fighters aren't asking for American troops to come fight their battles for them. Instead, they are asking for American equipment so they can do the fighting.

The choice for America is clear. It's either a little money now to stop the Communists or a lot of money later to take care of the refugees and defend our border.

It's either a little effort now to help liberate Nicaragua or a lot more effort later when the Communists are better organized, more entrenched, and more dangerous.

The Soviets have made their choice. Now we must make ours.

I thank the Speaker.

NICARAGUAN COMMUNISTS SKILLFULLY CONFUSE THE AMERICAN PUBLIC

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the previous speaker for an intelligent exposition of a very confusing issue. The gentleman from Georgia has shown once again that he can put in historical perspective today's events in such a way, truly nonpartisan, truly with an intellectual base, and with an eye toward solving problems rather than exacerbating them.

Last night I spoke on the floor of the House about the problem of the confusion of the American people about the situation in Nicaragua. My feeling, after listening to the gentleman from Georgia, is that if Americans who are confused on this issue could have spent this last hour listening to the exposition of the gentleman from Georgia, all confusion would be gone, but the confusion remains. I would like to play a small part in reducing some of that confusion.

The interesting thing is that the people of Central America are not at all confused.

In a poll reported in La Nacio newspaper in San Jose, Costa Rica, 93 percent of the Costa Ricans view Nicaragua as an agent of Cuba and the Soviet Union. So they are not at all confused.

The opinion in Honduras is similar. Some 93 percent of the population view Nicaragua as an agent of Cuba and the Soviet Union.

What about United States aid to the opposition forces, to the Contras in Nicaragua? There is tremendous confusion here in the United States. In the border countries surrounding Nicaragua, there is no confusion.

In Costa Rica, the oldest democracy in Central and South America, 69 percent of the people support United States aid to the opposition forces in Nicaragua; 24 percent disapprove. In Honduras, the northern border state above Nicaragua, 55 percent of the people support United States aid to the opposition forces, the Contras, in Nicaragua; 25 percent oppose. In Guatemala, a country removed, 54 percent of the people support United States aid to opposition forces, the Contras, in Nicaragua; 22 percent disapprove.

It is quite fascinating that in Central America, the people understand the threat. In the United States it is more difficult.

Last night I read from a report and quoted from a report that was called "Inside the Sandinista Regime, a Special Investigator's Perspective." It is based on the experiences of a high ranking official in the Sandinista version of the KGB. His name is Jose Baldizon. I talked about the kind of show that is put on for visiting church people, academic people, tourists from North America and elsewhere, the kind of potemkin villages that are created, villages with painted facades.

I would like to continue and talk a little bit about the way the Sandinista Party, the FSLN, which is basically the Communist Party of Nicaragua, how their leader, Interior Minister Tomas Borge, has taken on the responsibility for exploiting religion for propaganda purposes.

This is awfully important, because so much of the well-meaning and, I think, misguided opposition to helping the democratic forces in Nicaragua comes from church groups. I quote:

Borge, a hard-line Marxist, has been studying the Bible because, as he explained to Baldizon and other party members, "There is no more effective way to combat the enemy than with his own weapons."

Baldizon reports that Borge prepares himself for visits from foreign Christian religious organizations or speeches to these groups by studying the Bible and extracting appropriate passages for use in his conversations or addresses. When the foreign visitors have departed he scoffs at them in front of his subordinates in the Interior Ministry, bragging about his ability to maniplulate and exploit the "deluded" religious group. Baldizon says that Borge refers to the visiting religious and human rights groups as "temporary allies" and tonts utiles (useful fools).

I think this is an awfully important point for the American people to recognize. That is that there is a conscious policy on the part of the Nicaraguan Communists to deceive well-meaning Americans who come to Nicaragua interested in promoting peace. I quote:

In internal FSLN circles Borge insists he cannot confide in religious persons because they are misguided idealists who have a reactionary nature. Such persons can only be temporary tactical allies of the Revolution. For this reason, Borge said, one must exercise great care with FSLN members who show signs of this type of idealism because such persons are ideologically weak and might one day betray the Revolution.

Yet, countless American groups and religious organizations visit Nicaragua and are taken in by this duplicity.

To impress foreign religious groups that visit Nicaragua, Borge has decorated his Ministry of Interior Office—

By the way, the Ministry of the Interior is pseudonymic in Marxist-Leninist regimes with the secret police bureau—has decorated his Ministry of the Interior office with large pictures of poor children and prominently displayed religious objects such as crucifixes, tapestries with religious motifs, a large wooden statue of Christ carved by local artisans, and a Bible. Borge has another office, his favorite, in the Reparto Bello Horizonte where he conducts most ministerial business and where he also lives. This office contains pictures of Marx, Engels, Lenin, Augusto Cesar Sandino, and Carlos Fonseca and there are no religious objects to be seen. Copies of the Communist Manifesto, Das Kapital, The State and the Law, and various volumes of Marxist/Leninist philosophy are in evidence. Borge uses this office to receive delegations from Socialist countries and for official ministerial functions.

In late May 1985, all personnel from the principal MINT offices were instructed to come to work in civilian clothes the following day and to assemble at the Silvio Mayorga Building (MINT headquarters). There they were told that they were to participate in the closing ceremony of an International Young Baptist Convention of the Baptist Church in Managua, pretending to be Nicaraguan Evangelicals. The ceremony was to be presided over by Borge. At about 6:30 p.m. the ceremony began and, as planned, some 70 percent of those present were military or Ministry of the Interior personnel dressed in civilian clothes. In addition to some 600 military/Interior Ministry personnel, there were delegations from the United States, Puerto Rico, and several Latin American countries. The affair was covered by Sandinista television for showing only outside Nicaragua since the local citizenry would have recognized the many MINT employees among the alleged Nicaraguan Baptists.

Well, I think that says something about why we have such confusion amongst church groups in the United States. It is a direct policy of the Communist government in Nicaragua to deceive these people.

Now, it is also well known that Nicaragua is a closed society and that in a closed society it is difficult to get out the messages.

In the Philippines, the press was active in and out of the Marcos government, and the whole world knew what was happening in the election and in the period following the election. There were institutions in the Philippines, institutions that sowed the seeds of democracy. The Philippines had been in the past democratic. There was the press which was independent, to some large extent; there was the church, which was completely independent; there were universities and business organizations and labor unions and social and fraternal groups.

In a Communist society like Nicaragua, all of these institutions are controlled by the state. So it is very difficult to get information out of the country that reflects accurately on the status of the society.

This is also a very powerful reason why there is so much confusion amongst the American people.

One of the things we have been learning, however, and we have been piecing together information about are Nicaraguan prisons. It is very difficult to find out what is going on inside Nicaragua, as I have said, and far more difficult to find out about people who are incarcerated for political reasons. These issues are kept from the public, and the incarcerations are hidden. But there has been some research recently, and I would like to relate to that research.

A man named Wesley Smith has done a report which was just released. The report was based on 500 interviews with Nicaraguan refugees in Central America. The research that began last August was only completed less than a week ago.

What is interesting about this is that next to Cuba, Nicaragua holds the most political prisoners in the entire Western Hemisphere. No, there are not more political prisoners in Chile or there were not more political prisoners in Haiti or El Salvador. No. The leadership, in incarcerating people for political acts, belongs to Nicaragua.

On an absolute basis, Nicaragua, with its 7,500 political prisoners, as estimated by the Independent Human Rights Commission of Nicaragua, holds more political prisoners than any other Latin nation except Cuba.

Wesley Smith says that there may be 9,000 political prisoners in Nicaragua. Some people estimate as many as 15,000. But let us just take the number 7,500.

Chile, with its population of 11 million, more than four times that of Nicaragua, and a favorite target of liberals in this House, has 5,200 political prisoners. That is too many, to be sure. But that is 2,300 less than the low estimate in Nicaragua with one quarter of the population.

Even more dramatic is the contrast if the number of political prisoners in Nicaragua as compared with those of the Philippines under the regime of former President Marcos. President Corazon Aquino stated that the Marcos regime held 500 political prisoners. The comparison is significant when one considers that Marcos held 500 political prisoners out of a population of 53 million, whereas the Sandinistas in Nicaragua hold 7,500 political prisoners out of a population of only 3 million people.

El Salvador has less than 500 persons in the category of political prisoners. And in contrast to Nicaragua, where many of the prisoners have never been formally charged, the Salvadoran prisoners have been convicted of specific acts of violence or direct participation in guerrilla activities. Thus, the Sandinistas' 7,500 prisoners, on an absolute basis, is higher than all other Latin American countries except Cuba and, if calculated on a relative basis, is absolutely astronomical in relation to the others.

For example, if Chile were to have the same per capita ratio of political prisoners as Nicaragua, the number would be 27,500. In the Philippines, the equivalent number would be 132,500, and in the United States the approximate number would be 200 times 7,500.

The vast majority of Sandinista political prisoners remains hidden from observation. This is another reason behind the confusion in the United States.

Reporters travel to Contra camps. Reporters travel throughout with the Contras, and the press has an open view of the good and the bad that the Contras show. But the press has no access to the entire interior of Nicaragua, only very, very superficial access. Human rights organizations, both foreign and domestic, have not been able to obtain access to the prisons operated by the general director of the state security—that's the DGSE, the secret police; that is your KGB, Nicaraguan style—where these victims of Sandinista oppression are held.

In El Salvador, Cuban rights groups have access to all prisons. Occasionally the Sandinistas permit human rights groups carefully controlled visits to certain inmates in model prisons, but political prisoners in general remain out of reach of the world. There is no wonder that people outside of this country have difficulty understanding the extent of human rights repression conducted by the Sandinista Communists.

As Mateo Guerrero, former executive director of the Sandinista government's human rights commission testified, even the government commission employees were barred from visiting the places where political prisoners were held. It is a deep, dark secret. They intend to keep it that way. But the effect is that groups outside of Nicaragua, such as American church groups and religious organizations and certain human rights groups, are not exposed to the reality of repression under Sandinista rule.

Another dramatic comparison is the number of prisons in Nicaragua. Whereas the Somoza regime had but one prison, the Sandinistas have expanded the number of prisons to at least 10. We can verify this number. However, there are also reports of secret facilities where small numbers of political prisoners are also held. Merely listing the number of detainees or the number of prisons does not tell the whole story, for these numbers do not reflect the citizens who are held for short times under abominable conditions to deter them from future resistance. Many are not formally charged or told why they have been arrested. Such action can lead to stopping all political activity to avoid even a possibility of long-term political imprisonment.

As Lenin said, the purpose of terror is to terrorize. In Nicaragua, political detention, short or long-term, works.

I would like to share with you aerial photographs of the different prisons in Nicaragua.

In this particular aerial photograph, the old Somoza prison is shown surrounded by a red line, and above it is the addition completed in 1983. That is the extent of the prison facilities under the Somoza regime.

So in addition to the addition on the old Somoza prison is a new prison, with a modern design, called Asuncion Prison, near Juigalpa, Nicaragua. Maximum security areas are outlined, detention areas are outlined, administrative areas are outlined, and guard towers are outlined.

And then there is another brand new prison, Chinandega Prison, in Chinandega, Nicaragua. Again the facilities are shown, detention areas, administrative areas, security areas.

Another prison, Esteli Prison, in Esteli, Nicaragua.

And yet a fifth prison, Club Hipico, near Matagalpa, Nicaragua.

And here is another prison, Zona Franca Prison, Sandino Airport, Nicaragua.

And here is yet another prison, La Palmera Prison, near Grenada, Nicaragua.

Some of the latest prisons seems to have a unique design, which is thought to be either a Cuban or Soviet prison structure.

And then there is Waswali Prison, near Matagalpa, Nicaragua.

Yes, the Sandinista regime has 10 times the prisons and at least 10 times the prison capacity of the old Somoza regime. And by incarcerating people, they keep them out of any contact with outsiders, so those who would be active or those who have ever spoken against the regime are put in jail and, therefore, when groups of Americans travel to Nicaragua they do not get to meet people who dare to speak out. Those people are either in prison or fearful of ending up in prison.

Now, next week we must rise above the confusion. We need to consider the importance of our vote.

I have talked to people on both sides of the aisle, and both sides agree that this is one of the most important votes taken in the House of Representatives in years, perhaps decades. Why is it so important that we act now? Why is it that we cannot wait for yet another round of negotiations to take place prior to providing assistance to the democratic forces in Nicaragua?

Let me go back to March 20, 1984, for the beginning of my explanation why it is not appropriate to vote for yet another stage of negotiations at this time but it is more appropriate to vote for the United States to act to help those who would help themselves.

I go back to March 20, 1984, a letter written by a number of Members on the Democratic side of this House to Commandante Daniel Ortega, at that time the coordinator of the Sandinista government. He has since been elected—and I use that term with some reservations—President of Nicaragua. But at that time he was still Commandante Ortega. This letter was addressed to "Dear Commandante," and it said:

We address this letter to you in a spirit of hopefulness and good will.

No one can argue with that.

As members of the U.S. House of Representatives, we regret the fact that better relations do not exist between the United States and your country.

And then they say:

We have been, and remain, opposed to U.S. support for military action directed against the people or Government of Nicaragua.

Now, one has to question whether the term "government" is meaningful at all in this case, whether this government is government as we understand the term, representing the people. But, in any case, it goes on to say:

We want to commend you and the members of your government for taking steps to open up the political process in your country. The Nicaraguan people have not had the opportunity to participate in a genuinely free election for over 50 years. We support your decision to schedule elections this year, to reduce press censorship, and to allow greater freedom of assembly for political parties. Finally, we recognize that you have taken these steps in the midst of ongoing military hostilities on the borders of Nicaragua.

At that time, the Contras still had U.S. assistance and were active.

Those scheduled elections turned out to be a farce. The reduced press censorship has ended up in almost total press censorship with hardly a peep coming out of the only independent voice left in all of Nicaragua, La Prensa. By the way, La Prensa's allocation of paper was recently reduced to two pages a day and Mrs. Tremoro, the editor, said that that most likely would force them to go out of business.

Also it says to allow greater freedom of assembly for political parties. We know what happened to freedom of assembly in the so-called election. It was virtually nonexistent, and that is why key people decided not to participate.

We write with the hope that the initial steps you have taken will be followed by others designed to guarantee a fully open and democratic electoral process. We note that some who have been exiles from Nicaragua have expressed a willingness to return to participate in the elections, if assurances are provided that their security will be protected and their political rights recognized. Among those exiles are some who have taken up arms against your government and who have stated their willingness to lay down those arms to participate in a truly democratic process.

We know what happened; those people, of course, were not let back into the country to participate. There was no fully open and democratic electoral process. It was a farce, and that the exiles who expressed willingness to return never returned because the conditions of the election were so managed as to make any possible real participation futile.

They go on to say, in this "Dear Commandante" letter that:

If this were to occur, the prospects for peace and stability throughout Central America would be dramatically enhanced. Those responsible for supporting violence against your government and for obstructing serious negotiations for broad political participation in El Salvador would have far greater difficulty winning support for their policies than they do today.

Those responsible for supporting violence against your government—

I guess they meant the Contras and supporters of the Contras in the United States. They "would have far greater difficulty winning support for their policies than they do today," if the Sandinista government would somehow come to terms and become democratic.

Yes; that would be true, but the fact remains that they have made no motion toward pluralism, toward freedom of assembly, toward freedom of the press, toward basic human rights, toward democracy; no motion at all. As a matter of fact, it has been motion in the opposite direction.

As of October 15, 1985, virtually all human rights were wiped out in Nicaragua by decree.

They go on to say, in the "Dear Commandante" letter that, "We believe that you can have it in your power to establish an example in Central America that can be of enormous historical importance." They have, indeed, established an example in Central America of enormous historical importance. They have, indeed, established a Soviet-Cuban base on the mainland of Central America. They have established a Communist, totalitarian regime the likes of which we have never known in this hemisphere on the mainland. The likes of which we have only seen in Cuba and in Soviet satellite states.

They continue:

For this to occur, you have only to lend real force and meaning to concepts your leadership has already endorsed concerning the rules by which political parties may compete openly and equitably for political power.

There was never any open and equitable competition for political power. The authors of the "Dear Commandante" letter go on to say:

A decision on your part to provide these reasonable assurances and conduct truly free and open elections would significantly improve the prospect of better relations between our two countries and significantly strengthen the hands of those in our country who desire better relations based upon true equality, self-determination and mutual good will.

We reaffirm to you our continuing respect and friendship for the Nicaraguan people, and pledge our willingness to discuss these or other matters of concern to you or officials of your government at any time.

It is signed by many of the leadership in the Democratic Party, and sent, at that time, March 20, 1984, to "Dear Commandante, Daniel Ortega," who serves as the President of the Marxist-Leninist regime in Nicaragua.

What happened after that letter was sent? I would like to just detail some of the events. In June, this House voted to cut off all assistance to the Contras. The so-called Boland amendment was enacted. What did that mean? That meant that both military and nonmilitary assistance was cut off. Included in that nonmilitary assistance was intelligence assistance; we could not even advise them.

What was their response to that June 1984 cutoff? In September or October of that year the Nicaraguan Communists took delivery of the first MI-21 Hind-D helicopter gunships, the most sophisticated, most potent insurgency battle weapon in the world today. That was one response.

What was our response? I have here a summary of the various acts of negotiation, several pages long that detail U.S. interaction with the Contadora process. Not only working with the Contadora nations, but with the Nicaraguan Government directly in the Manzaneo Talks.

Those months following the cutoff of U.S. assistance to the Contras totaled 16; 1 year and 4 months. In those 16 months, which involved negotiations time and again with the Nicaraguans, with the Contadoras, during those 16 months, the Nicaraguan Communists further secured their totalitarian hold on the Nicaraguan people.

Repression increased, militarization increased. Soviet arms shipments increased precipitously. So what does all that mean to the vote on Wednesday of next week? What that means is that there was a time when negotiations were given a very significant chance to succeed. There was 16 months of negotiations without American support for the democratic forces. What that must mean is that 16 months of negotiations without American support were not effective; that they failed. It is quite probable that they failed precisely because there was no American support. There was nothing backing up those negotiations.

How is it that we can expect the Nicaraguan Communists to enter into negotiations now after this previous experience when we have nothing in our pockets again, and the democractic forces have nothing to negotiate with once again?

Why should it be any different? Why would it be any different? Why would a promise of doing something in the future, something that we are having incredible trouble doing now, why would a promise of taking action in the future have any effect at all? They must at one point come to the realization that the American people are paralyzed, that the American Congress has paralyzed this administration and that there is no need to negotiate anything of substance.

There is another letter that has been sent. This time it is pretty recent and it has been sent to the President of the United States. This letter is signed by 31 I am sure very well-meaning Members of the Democratic Party in the House, 25 of whom I understand voted for humanitarian aid, and as I look at the list I can even see a few here who voted in the past for military assistance. This group of 31 is essentially asking the President to try negotiations once more with the Sandinista Communists in the hope of reaching some agreement on the military situation in Central America, the threat posed by the Soviet-Cuban advisers and the Soviet armaments and the militarization of Nicaragua, talk about that, and to talk about democratic reforms inside the Communist Nicaragua. We would before we did anything to talk about the military situation and the internal situation.

How is it possible to expect that hard-line Marxist-Leninist, self-professed hard-line Marxist-Leninists that make up the core of the Communist Government in Nicaragua, how is it we could possibly expect them to discuss anything of substance in these negotiations, when there is absolutely no pressure on them to do anything different than they are doing today?

The previous "Dear Commandante" letter and 16 months of inactivity on behalf of the democratic forces certainly did not create a climate positive for negotiations. No. What they did was bring in the most effective battle weapon in the world today, the MI-24 Hind-D helicopter from the Soviet Union. That was their response then. What could possibly be their response now?

As a matter of fact, asking for negotiations now without having any kind of pressure to go along with it would simply say to the Communist government in Nicaragua that we give up.

I mean, that is how these hard-line Marxists-Leninists are going to interpret something like this at this time.

Well, this tale of two letters I think is very instructive to the American people because it calls attention to what is becoming the focus of the debate. Do we vote in the House next Wednesday for more negotiations with no pressure, or do we vote for some pressure that could perhaps make negotiations work?

Now, I know there are those who will say that no matter what we do, the Soviet Union and Cuba will do more. I think that is a real copout. That is saying that we are going to leave this Communist regime alone because we cannot possibly do anything about it because the enemy will simply up the ante and do more than he has already done. It is a real copout.

Now, here is the intelligence of estimate of what might happen with assistance to the Contras. Because there are 20,000 to 25,000 of these people willing to fight and die to regain their homeland, because there is such a large number with respect to the population of Nicaragua and because a guerrilla war is fought in a very different way than fielding armies, 25,000 Contras who are well armed can make quite a difference.

As a matter of fact, small amounts of back-packed portable antiaircraft missiles of the Sam-7, of the Red Eye, of the Stinger type could conceivably neutralize the entire helicopter force and the Air Force of the Sandinista Army.

Now, that is impact, that is effect.

What about the fact that the Sandinistas could simply be provided with more arms, more equipment? We have it from intelligence sources that the Sandinista army is already saturated with Soviet weapons, that they cannot draft more people because they will run out of people of age groups that are necessary to run the country and the factories. They cannot draft everybody of draftable age, which is what they would need to put down an insurrection of 20,000 to 25,000 people.

The fact is that 20,000 to 25,000 people in Nicaragua fighting against the Communist government is equivalent to 1.5 million Americans taking up arms and fighting against the Federal Government of the United States.

So it is quite possible that given the proper equipment, the Contras could cause serious changes in the relationship between forces in Nicaragua. It is quite possible that if they had the pressure to bring to bear on the situation, the Communist government could withdraw from its increasing totalitarian tendencies and begin perhaps even to talk with the democratic forces.

The gentleman who spoke before me, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH], pointed out that we do not have that many alternatives, and I want to second that.

There are three basic alternatives that he mentioned and I think it bears repetition. One is to do nothing, which at this point seems to be the will of a vast majority of the Democrats in the House of Representatives. By doing nothing, we insure the continued communization of Nicaragua, the continued consolidation of their Communist revolution. We insure the continued military buildup of a Soviet-Cuban base on the mainland of this hemisphere and the mainland of Central America. That is what doing nothing gives us.

I frankly think it is not a very good alternative. I frankly think that Nicaragua being on the Central American mainland, a lot closer to the Texas border than many points throughout the Northeast and Midwest and Northwest United States are to the Texas border, is really dangerous and that the explosion of the region in revolution would really tie up the United States right here south of our border, conceivably create massive flows of refugees northward and change the world balance between the United States and the Soviets remarkably.

Now, I do not think doing nothing is an alternative at all. I think it is an ostrich alternative, if anything, and it consists of sticking our heads in the sand and leaving our rear ends propped up in the air ready for target shooting.

The second possibility is to send in American troops and clean out the rats' nest there, but I do not support that. I do not believe the American people want to see American blood spilled in Central America.

The third possibility and I believe the only real alternative at this time is to help the Nicaraguan democratic forces regain their country, and the conditions are reasonable for doing that. That to me is the only sane alternative.

I have heard Members on the Democratic side of the aisle say that if things get bad enough, we can always send in the Marines. I think that is waiting too long and that absolutely ensures the loss of American lives and the spilling of American blood unnecessarily.

It does not make any sense to let the situation get so bad that the only alternative left is an American invasion. It seems to me that the situation is so dangerous in Central America because of the Nicaraguans acting as agents for Cuba and the Soviet Union, the situation is so dangerous that we either act now in a way that helps those who would fight for freedom to regain their homeland, or it is very, very conceivable, perhaps even probable, that we will be forced to act later on our own by ourselves against a vastly more entrenched military capability.

So the only alternative, it seems to me, is to vote to help the freedom fighters regain their country, regain Nicaragua, to vote to provide them with the kind of military assistance that will bring some pressure to bear on the Communist government so that perhaps through discussion, perhaps through changes wrought in the system, we can ensure safety for the hemisphere, for ourselves, for the future of Central America and really for the kind of world that we want to see occur.

Without support for these people, we are going to lose the kind of world we would like to see happen right in our own backyard. I think that is unacceptable. I think the American people if they were exposed to all the facts would resoundingly conclude that that is unacceptable.

I would hope that on Wednesday, March 19, 2 years and 1 day after the "Dear Commandante" letter this House also concludes that a Soviet-Cuban base on the Central American mainland poised against its neighbors and us is also unacceptable.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

2999. A letter from the Secretary, Department of Health and Human Services, transmitting the 1984 annual report on the National Health Service Corps [NHSC] and NHSC Scholarship Program [NHSCSP], pursuant to 42 U.S.C. 254b(g); to the Committee on Energy and Commerce.

3000. A letter from the Chairman, Federal Communications Commission, transmitting the Commission's legislative proposal package; to the Committee on Energy and Commerce.

3001. A letter from the Chairman, Securities and Exchange Commission, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 to shorten the period for filing beneficial ownership statements under section 13(d)(1); to the Committee on Energy and Commerce.

3002. A letter from the Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, transmitting notification of the Department of the Navy's proposed lease of defense articles to the Dominican Republic (Transmittal No. 14-86), pursuant to 22 U.S.C. 2796(a); to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

3003. A letter from the Chairman, Federal Communications Commission, transmitting the Commission's calendar year 1985 report of its activities under the Freedom of Information Act, pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 552(d); to the Committee on Government Operations.

3005. Deputy Associate Director for Royalty Management, Department of the Interior, transmitting notification of proposed refunds of excess royalty payments in OCS areas, pursuant to 43 U.S.C. 1339(b); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

3007. A letter from the Deputy Associate Director for Royalty Management, Department of the Interior, transmitting notification of proposed refunds of excess royalty payments in OCS areas, pursuant to 43 U.S.C. 1339(b); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

3008. A letter from the Deputy Associate Director for Royalty Management, Department of the Interior, transmitting notification of proposed refunds of excess royalty payments in OCS areas, pursuant to 43 U.S.C. 1339(b); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

3009. A letter from the Attorney General, Department of Justice, transmitting the first of three annual reports on enforcement activities with respect to robberies and burglaries involving controlled substances, pursuant to Public Law 98-305, section 4; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

3010. A letter from the Secretary, the Foundation of the Federal Bar Association, transmitting the audit report of the Foundation of the Federal Bar Association for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, pursuant to Public Law 88-504, section 3 (36 U.S.C. 1103); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

3011. A letter from the Executive Secretary, Department of Defense, transmitting a report on DOD procurement from small and other business firms for October 1985 through December 1985, pursuant to 15 U.S.C. 639(d); to the Committee on Small Business.

(Legislative day of Monday, March 10, 1986)

The Senate met at 9 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable MARK ANDREWS, a Senator from the State of North Dakota.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Almighty God, our Father in Heaven, who "giveth to all life and breath and all things * * *," we thank you for the gift of life. We praise you for daily blessings, so routine that we are in danger of taking them for granted. Help us never to allow familiarity with constant, continuous benefits to breed in us contempt and ingratitude. Help us who always have more than we need of everything to remember with compassion those who never have enough of anything they need. Deliver us from the indictment of the Apostle Paul, "though they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful * * *" (Romans 1:21). We pray this in the name of Him Who sought in all things to please You. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, March 13, 1986.

TO THE SENATE: Under the provisions of Rule I, Section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable MARK ANDREWS, a Senator from the State of North Dakota, to perform the duties of the Chair.

STROM THURMOND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. ANDREWS thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Presiding Officer.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Under the standing order, the leaders have 10 minutes each, and I will reserve any time I do not use; special orders in favor of the following Senators for not to exceed 5 minutes each. And I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER] will not take his 5 minutes, so I ask unanimous consent that that order be vitiated.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. So it would be Senators PROXMIRE, HAWKINS, SASSER, and HART, for 5 minutes each. Then morning business not to extend beyond 10 a.m., with Senators limited to 5 minutes each, and then we will go back to Senate Joint Resolution 225, a constitutional amendment calling for a balanced budget. There is an amendment that I hope will be offered right at or near 10 o'clock by Senator ARMSTRONG. It is my understanding that they have now satisfied the Senator from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN]; that he may not have an amendment. So hopefully, if the Armstrong amendment is modified, then we can have a vote on that amendment before 11 o'clock, and then hopefully agree to go to third reading, and final action on the constitutional amendment for a balanced budget would be on March 25 at either 2 o'clock or maybe after an hour of debate at 3 o'clock or whatever. We hope we can work that out.

It will be necessary that we take up committee funding resolutions, if not today, on tomorrow, and I would hope that we could dispose of the funding resolutions without a great deal of debate, though I understand the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HUMPHREY] has an amendment and the Senator from Alaska [Mr. STEVENS] has an amendment. There may be others on either side of the aisle, which could take some time. It is also my hope that we can turn to the water resources bill and work on that bill today and tomorrow.

In any event, so my colleagues will be alerted, we can expect a fairly lengthy session today, and again I cannot guarantee how many votes there will be or when they will come, whether it will be one after 6 or before 7 or whatever, but we will try to accommodate Senators on either side if there are special problems. In order to complete some of our business which must be done before the Easter recess begins at the close of business on Thursday, March 27, it is necessary that we spend some time in the evenings.

Mr. President, I thank the Presiding Officer. I reserve the remainder of my time.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Democratic leader is recognized.

THE RECONCILIATION BILL

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, today, I hope that the Senate will take long overdue action on a measure that will cut the deficit now. I speak of the reconciliation bill, which the House passed last week and sent to the Senate.

That measure will reduce spending by about $12 billion over the next 3 years and raise about $6 billion in revenues over the same period, for a total deficit reduction of $18 billion over the fiscal year 1986–88 period.

This measure will result in deficit reduction now. It is not just a promise to balance the budget in the future. Democrats voted to send the House-passed bill to the President last December.

We oppose further delay which endangers the measure. It is my hope that the entire Senate will vote to support the reconciliation bill and send it to the President. It had good support in the House, where it was adopted by a vote of 314 to 86.

I hope for similar support in the Senate.

The reconciliation bill alone will not solve the deficit problems that the Nation faces, but it does show that Congress is capable of taking effective and resolute action to reduce the deficit.

It is important, as we face the prospect of another $200 billion plus deficit this year—and possibly further cuts under Gramm-Rudman—that the Senate pass this bill and send it to the President.

We pass drastic measures around here, like the Gramm-Rudman law, that in the final analysis determines what cuts will be made in each agency, probably by computer. Computers do not have hearts.

So the Senate passes legislation like Gramm-Rudman, that forces unwise funding cuts in vital programs while we ignore an opportunity for significant deficit reduction which is right in front of our noses—namely, the reconciliation bill which has already had action in both Houses.

The reductions are in it and by quick passage, those reductions would go into effect now. We have already crossed the Rubicon on that measure. So why should we not act finally now and get the reconciliation measure down to the White House?

I hope the Senate will be allowed to act on this legislation today and that it may be sent to the President for his signature.

The reconciliation measure is not the end of the road, but it is an important milestone in reducing the deficit. Without it, the road to a balanced budget will be longer and more difficult.

S. 2188—THE ELECTRIC GENERATION AND INDUSTRIAL ENERGY DEVELOPMENT ACT

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, late last year, the Congress enacted my $400 million Clean Coal Technology Program, a program which I have promoted, and in connection with which there has been bipartisan support on both sides of the aisle. It is a program intended to demonstrate the commercial feasibility of new and advanced technologies for using coal in an environmentally acceptable manner. The widespread commercial application of such technologies could yield a number of benefits, such as reductions in emissions of sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxides which have been associated with acid rain. Consequently, there is a consensus in the Congress that it is in the national interest to develop clean coal technologies to use America's abundant coal resources, and to provide energy for future economic growth and development.

A few months ago, a report was issued by Drew Lewis and William Davis, the special envoys appointed by President Reagan and Canadian Prime Minister Mulroney to assess the bilateral aspects of the acid rain issue and make recommendations. In that report, they recognized the potential environmental significance of clean coal technologies, and recommended that the President endorse a $5 billion program to support the commercial demonstration of such technologies. This ambitious proposal is the cornerstone of what is now known in this country as the "Drew Lewis Report."

However, Mr. President, we should recognize that the demonstration of clean coal technologies is only the first step leading to the adoption of such technologies by the private sector. There is more to be done if the Nation is to reap the fruits of the seeds we have sown.

The legislation which I am introducing today is intended as the next step. The basic purpose of my bill, the Electric Generation and Industrial Energy Development Act, is to encourage the administration to develop a policy framework to facilitate the market acceptance of clean coal technologies. The development of such a framework would be particularly timely in light of the enactment of my Clean Coal Technology Program, and the proposal for a much larger $5 billion effort to address the acid rain problem. My bill would help ensure the success of such efforts by directing the administration to identify regulatory and other impediments to the commercial adoption of new and advanced coal technologies, and to define coordinated policy measures to address them.

Specifically, my bill requires the Secretary of Energy, in consultation with the Secretary of the Interior, the Chairman of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, and the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, to consider and recommend administrative, regulatory, and other measures which would encourage electric utilities, and industrial companies, such as steel or aluminum mills, to use clean coal technologies. The bill establishes a temporary Clean Coal Advisory Committee to provide advice and counsel to the Secretary in formulating his recommendations. The Secretary is to submit his recommendations to the President and the Congress within 180 days.

Mr. President, with the enactment of the Clean Coal Technology Program the Congress took a bold step in ensuring the timely development of a range of technological options for the clean use of coal. The availability of such options will be important for the planning and construction of powerplants to provide new electric generating capacity to meet the Nation's future energy needs. Of equal importance, electric utilities considering whether to make capital investments to extend the life of existing generating facilities will have a variety of technologies from which to choose. Finally, for energy intensive industries, such as steel and aluminum, improvements in the production of energy through the use of clean coal technologies can contribute to the enhancement of the competitiveness of such industries in international markets.

Mr. President, the enactment of this legislation will help realize the promise offered by clean coal technologies—most efficient use of the Nation's coal resources, jobs, cleaner air, and adequate supplies of energy in the future to ensure economic growth for generations of Americans to come.

Mr. President, I send the bill to the desk and ask for its appropriate referral.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be received and appropriately referred.

Mr. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2188

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Electric Generation and Industrial Energy Development Act of 1986".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) there will be a need for additional electric generating capacity in the United States before the turn of the century;

(2) current utility construction schedules, and anticipated levels of demand suggest that the United States may face an electric power capacity short fall as early as the mid-1990's;

(3) new clear coal technologies that ensure efficient, cost-effective generation of electric power while also enabling electric utilities to achieve the greatest economic benefit from such units can be used to modernize or retrofit existing powerplants;

(4) clean coal technologies may enable major domestic industries, including steel and aluminum, that are reliant upon coal as a primary energy source, to use coal more efficiently, thereby allowing such industries to achieve greater competitive advantage in world trade;

(5) America has abundant coal resources which can be used to ensure adequate supplies of energy in an environmentally acceptable manner;

(6) Congress has enacted a new $400,000,000 program within the Department of Energy to demonstrate emerging technologies for the clean use of coal;

(7) special envoys from the United States and Canada have recommended a multiyear, $5,000,000,000 clean coal technology program as a means of reducing emissions associated with electric power generation; and

(8) there is a need for coordinated development and application of regulatory, financial, and other incentives, at the Federal and non-Federal level of government, to facilitate the widespread commercial application of clean coal technologies.

(b) The purpose of this Act is to—

(1) direct the Secretary of Energy to consider and recommend the most appropriate means by which the marketplace could be encouraged to use clean coal technologies for generating electric power and providing energy for major industrial uses; and

(2) establish a policy framework to facilitate utilization of clean coal technologies on a broad scale to meet future electrical generating capacity requirements and other energy needs, while also reducing overall emissions from such facilities.

STUDY AND REPORT

SEC. 3. (a) The Secretary of Energy shall, in consultation with the Secretary of the Interior, the Chairman of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, and the Clean Coal Advisory Committee (as established in section 4), consider and recommend actions which would facilitate—

(1) the adoption of clean coal technologies in new electric generating facilities to meet increased electricity demand in the future;

(2) the use of clean coal technologies for retrofit or modernization of existing facilities where such applications can achieve emission reductions in a cost-effective manner; and

(3) the use of cost-effective coal technologies in major domestic basic industries, such as steel and aluminum, consistent with environmental requirements.

(b) The Secretary of Energy shall consider and make recommendations that include proposals for administrative and regulatory actions, including financial assistance, to enhance the prospects for—

(1) the application of clean coal technologies;

(2) generating electric power; and

(3) using coal in major industrial applications in an environmentally acceptable manner.

(c) The Secretary of Energy shall submit the recommendations required pursuant to subsections (a) and (b) to the President and the Congress within 180 days of the date of enactment of this act.

CLEAN COAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE.

SEC. 4. (a) There is established within the Department of Energy a Clean Coal Advisory Committee to be appointed by the Secretary of Energy. The purpose of the committee shall be to provide the Secretary with advice and counsel in formulating recommendations required by this Act.

(b) The membership of the committee shall include—

(1) a representative of the National Academy of Sciences;

(2) an expert in the field of coal use technology;

(3) a representative of the National Acid Precipitation Task Force;

(4) a representative of the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners;

(5) a representative of State government environmental officials;

(6) a representative of the electric utility industry;

(7) an expert on environmental law and regulation; and

(8) a representative of major domestic industrial coal users.

(c) The Secretary shall designate an officer or employee of the Federal Government to serve as the chairman of the committee.

(d) The committee shall be terminated 6 months from the date of the appointment of the members.

ELECTRIC GENERATION AND INDUSTRIAL ENERGY DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1986

I. FINDINGS

A. There will be a need for additional electric generating capacity in the United States before the turn of the century.

B. Current utility construction schedules, and anticipated levels of demand suggest that the United States may face an electric power capacity shortfall as early as the mid-1990's.

C. New clean coal technologies that ensure efficient, cost-effective generation of electric power while also enabling electric utilities to achieve the greatest economic benefit from such units can be used to modernize or retrofit existing powerplants.

D. Clean coal technologies may enable major domestic industries, including steel and aluminum, that are reliant upon coal as a primary energy source, to use coal more efficiently, thereby allowing such industries to achieve greater competitive advantage in world trade.

E. America has abundant coal resources which can be used to ensure adequate supplies of energy in an environmentally acceptable manner.

F. Congress has enacted a new $400 million program within the Department of Energy to demonstrate emerging technologies for the clean use of coal.

G. Special Envoys from the United States and Canada have recommended a multi-year, $5 billion clean coal technology program as a means of reducing emissions associated with electric power generation.

H. There is a need for coordinated development and application of regulatory, financial, and other incentives, at the Federal and non-federal levels of government, to facilitate the widespread commercial application of clean coal technologies.

II. PURPOSE OF THE LEGISLATION

A. To direct the Secretary of Energy to consider and recommend the most appropriate means by which the marketplace could be encouraged to use clean coal technologies for generating electric power and providing energy for major industrial uses.

B. To establish a policy framework to facilitate utilization of clean coal technologies on a broad scale to meet future electrical generating capacity requirements and other energy needs, while also reducing overall emissions from such facilities.

III. MAJOR PROVISIONS

A. Directs the Secretary of Energy, in consultation with the Secretary of the Interior, the Chairman of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, and the Clean Coal Advisory Committee, to consider and recommend actions which would facilitate:

1. Adoption of clean coal technologies in new electric generating facilities to meet increased electricity demand in the future;

2. Use of clean coal technologies for retrofit or modernization of existing facilities where such application can achieve emission reductions in a cost effective manner; and

3. Use of cost-effective coal technologies in major domestic basic industries, such as steel and aluminum, consistent with environmental requirements.

B. Directs the Secretary to make recommendations that include proposals for administrative and regulatory actions, including financial assistance, to enhance the prospects for the application of clean coal technologies for generating electric power, and for using coal in major industrial applications in an environmentally acceptable manner.

C. Directs the Secretary to submit his recommendations to the President and the Congress within 180 days from enactment of this Act.

D. Establishes a Clean Coal Advisory Committee appointed by the Secretary of Energy. The purpose of the Committee is to provide the Secretary with advice and counsel so that he might better fulfill his obligations as set forth in the bill. The life of the Committee will be 6 months from the date of the appointment of the members. The Secretary shall designate an officer or employee of the Federal government to serve as the chairman of the Committee.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield the remainder of my time to the distinguished minority whip, Mr. CRANSTON.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California.

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank the distinguished Senator from West Virginia and our leader on this side of the aisle.

CONTRA AID

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the Senate will face the vitally important Nicaraguan issue in a few days. I believe a majority of the Senate will not and should not approve the administration's request for $100 million of mostly military aid to the Contras who have no hesitation in turning to terrorist tactics in their efforts to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. No Senator has any sympathy for the Marxist Sandinista government of Nicaragua, but a great many Senators, both Democrats and Republicans, believe that the present United States policy strengthens rather than weakens the Sandinista regime and increases their dependency on Cuba and the Soviet Union; $100 million will not overthrow the Sandinistas, so the administration will ask for $200 million and, when that does not do it, they will ask for $300 million.

The danger is that when it is clear that dollars will not do the job and that backing the Contras will not do the job, there will be those who will say, "Only American troops can do the job." That is the way we landed in the tragedy of Vietnam.

Further evidence of how deeply and dangerously we are getting militarily involved in Central America surfaced yesterday at the House Military Construction Appropriations Subcommittee. Top Pentagon officials testified that during 3 years of nearly continuous United States military exercises in Honduras, American troops have built an intricate infrastructure of roads, airstrips, and bases. A 400-man United States Army engineering battalion is right now building an airstrip 15 miles from the Nicaraguan border, and next year, the subcommittee was told, the Pentagon will seek $5 million to build facilities for a United States intelligence unit in Honduras.

I ask this question: Are United States military forces digging in and building up for a long stay in Honduras on the Nicaraguan border? "No," says Mr. Sanchez, who is Deputy Assistant Defense Secretary for Inter-American Affairs. "Our activities in Honduras," Mr. Sanchez assured the subcommittee, "are of an indefinite nature, temporary and indefinite."

Think about that. Our 3-year military presence and the expenditure of all this United States taxpayers' money in Honduras is "temporary and indefinite."

The ancient Greeks gave us a word for this kind of ludicrous doubletalk—oxymoron. It comes from a word base meaning self-contradictory, stupid, foolish. In a word, the administration's policy in Central America is "oxymoronic." I hope the Senate is not about to support that policy. I do not believe the Senate will support that policy.

U.S. BALANCE OF TRADE

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I would like to speak for one moment on another issue that is important to California and the Nation relating to our severe trade imbalance and all the problems that brings in terms of unemployment and lost profit opportunities in our country.

The Commerce Department has just found the Japanese guilty of dumping chips in the United States. That is an unfair trade practice.

It seems to me that the time has come now for a test for the Reagan administration of whether or not it really has a trade policy. Will it negotiate effectively and firmly with Japan to bring an end to this unfair trade practice, or will it fail to do so? There is a sort of deadline looming. Prime Minister Nakasone of Japan is coming to our country next month. Either before he arrives or when he is here, this matter should be worked out.

I hope that the administration, at long last, will take a firm position on this matter and end this unfair trade practice against the United States. If it does not happen, then we will have to take some action on our own.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Chair.

STAR WARS: A WAY OF GOING IT ALONE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, back in Wisconsin, thoughtful people ask: Why is there a growing popular support for the administration's proposed star wars, or SDI? Why did a Congress facing the biggest Federal budget deficits in American history agree to increase the 1986 budget for star wars by 100 percent to $2.8 billion? Do the people supporting star wars understand that the cost will certainly be in the hundreds of billions and probably in excess of a trillion dollars? And don't Wisconsin people understand that not one penny of the $2.8 billion the Federal Government will spend on star wars in 1986 will come back to Wisconsin? Do they realize that Wisconsin's share of the cost of star wars for this year alone will be about $56 million. Have Wisconsin's people thought about the virtually certain increase in the danger of nuclear war caused by star wars?

Do they understand that if both superpowers should some day deploy a star wars defense, there would be a greatly increased incentive for one of the superpowers to initiate a preemptive nuclear strike? Here is why: The only way SDI or star wars has even an outside chance of working would require one power to strike big and strike first, in the hope that it could knock out enough of the adversary's nuclear arsenal that the star wars missile defense could provide protection against the adversary's sharply diminished nuclear forces.

Mr. President, many Wisconsin people fully understand some or all of these reasons why star wars seems to be a supreme folly. Why, then, do they support it? On January 2, an article by Townsend Hoopes in the New York Times provides a persuasive analysis of why star wars has such a strong appeal to so many Americans. Hoopes is no dove or dreamy idealist. In fact, he is a former Under Secretary of the Air Force. Hoopes explains the appeal of star wars in terms of our long American history of relying not on agreements or cooperation with others but on ourselves. Unlike any other country on Earth, America has succeeded in maintaining its freedom and security by relying on its own economic and technological strength and the blessed geography that separates our country from other world power centers by two vast oceans. Nuclear weapons have changed that. The terrible prospect of nuclear war has created an entirely new world. It can never again be the same.

With the advent of the nuclear age, the colossal destructive power of nuclear weapons and the concentration of vast nuclear arsenals in the United States and the Soviet Union, both the United States and the Soviet Union are totally and permanently vulnerable. We either live in a world with the U.S.S.R. or we die. The Soviet Union is not going to vanish. It is a fact of life. It is a grim fact of life. We loathe the Soviet Communist system. Many of us consider the Soviet Union a vast prison camp. The last thing we want is to have to rely on an agreement, a treaty—any kind of cooperation—with the Soviet Union.

So, why should we? Here is why: First, is there an alternative? The powerful appeal of star wars is that with the vigorous support of the President of the United States and with our faith in our marvelous technology, we hope and dream that if we spend enough money, we can buy invulnerability. Can't we someday, somehow hope to build a giant astrodome over the country—like star wars—to repel any Soviet nuclear attack? The answer is almost certainly that we cannot. Our most competent scientists say we cannot. The National Academy of Science has estimated that if only 1 percent of the U.S.S.R.'s 10,000 strategic nuclear warheads should penetrate SDI defenses, the attack could instantly kill between 35 and 55 million Americans and leave the United States in a shambles. No expert has ever claimed that star wars at its best could stop 99 percent of the Soviet missiles from reaching the American targets.

Second, the alternative to star wars makes sense. Mutually assured survival does not depend on building a massive missile defense. It does not depend on trusting the Soviet Union. It does not depend on a miracle. What does it depend on? It depends on the same mutual deterrence that has kept the nuclear peace for the 40 years of the nuclear age. That is, the understanding by the Soviets and the United States that a nuclear war would utterly destroy both sides.

Third, a mutual, comprehensive, verifiable nuclear arms agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union to stop the arms race would prevent the dangerous instability of nuclear weapons competition and save hundreds of billions of dollars. That agreement must be solidly based on mutual restraint, on vigorous verification of compliance, and on prompt action to prevent cheating. The general success of arms control treaties with the U.S.S.R. over the past 22 years promises a far more realistic path toward peace than the reliance on the creation of a technological miracle in star wars.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I referred, in the January 2, New York Times entitled, "'Star Wars'—a Way of Going It Alone" by Townsend Hoopes, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"STAR WARS"—A WAY OF GOING IT ALONE

(By Townsend Hoopes)

WASHINGTON.—Of all the issues that we as a nation will face in the coming year, no single decision is likely to be as significant as what we do about "Star Wars."

The first step to take in making that decision is to face the fundamental existential condition of our age—that neither superpower can significantly alter the present stalemate, no matter how great its military and technological exertions. The fact is that we and the Russians will live together or perish together. We share a common security problem—our mutual vulnerability.

Unfortunately, the Reagan Administration is divided on the idea of mutual vulnerability. The rational part of the Administration sees a need for agreements to reduce the threat of war. But other key Reaganites see acknowledgement of our vulnerability as an inadmissible loss of nerve, and they resist agreement with the "focus of evil." They are also the ones who are pushing Star Wars—another effort to escape our inherent and inescapable vulnerability.

The American public's continued tolerance for this kind of dangerously unreal thinking suggests a deep ambivalence in the American psyche. By instinct and heritage, we are a nation of "can-do" unilateralists.

American historical experience has made it difficult for us to accept the idea of interdependence, and even more difficult to cooperate with nations whose political philosophy we despise and whose power we fear. Historically, we have preferred either to avoid them or destroy them. The trouble is that an attempt to destroy them now would very probably bring about our destruction as well.

Ever since our forefathers came to America, to escape what they regarded as intrigue, corruption and alien ideologies, we have felt that we are both different and better. We are aloof and given to moral censure of others, impatient with deep-seated disputes between and within older nations—disputes that must in reality be lived with because they can never be clearly resolved. Every other nation accepts interdependence as an inescapable condition, but Americans continue to resist any limits on our freedom of action—even though the reality of interdependence now applies fully to us.

The Star Wars program is the latest, and possibly the most dangerous, manifestation of our national penchant for acting alone. The President is telling the American people that we can achieve a nice, clean, technologically sound, once-and-for-all solution to the threat of nuclear destruction. He also suggests we can achieve it without Soviet cooperation.

The scientific community is divided on the question of whether strategic defense is technically feasible. It is, however, virtually unanimous in believing that a wide range of countermeasures would be available to the Soviet Union—measures that would be less expensive and less technically demanding than the defenses themselves. Zealous cheerleaders for Star Wars chastise critics by reminding them of the naysayers who said we could not get to the moon. But that is a false analogy: The effort to get to the moon was not complicated by the presence of an adversary.

There is no way today to protect people and cities against the nuclear threat. Mutual vulnerability is an irremovable condition of life: It will not be changed by spending $26 billion on Star Wars in the next five years—or hundreds of billions of dollars thereafter. It would probably take as little as 100 warheads to destroy either superpower. That is only 1 percent of the 10,000 strategic warheads available on each side—and no conceivable defense could prevent "leakage" of 1 percent. Thus, even if Star Wars defenses were fully deployed by both superpowers, both societies would remain vulnerable to total destruction.

Wisdom lies not in pursuing a trillion dollar mirage but in facing the fact that our national security cannot be secured by acting alone. Mutual assured survival depends on stabilizing and strengthening our relations with the Soviet Union and entering into a series of arms reductions carried out incrementally over a period of years. This may be a hard road to travel, but it is the only one that leads away from nuclear war.

MYTH OF THE DAY: MEDICARE PHYSICIAN PAYMENT IS FAIR OR EQUITABLE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the myth of the day is that Medicare's payments to physicians are either fair or equitable. For many physicians, they are neither.

The variations in Medicare payment across the country go far beyond a mere reflection of differences in practice costs in urban and rural areas. The variation in payment is so extreme that it is perverse and, in many cases, contrary to national policy.

By design, Medicare attempted to impose the smallest amount of disruption on physician payment patterns when the program was established. Therefore, a national fee schedule was not established. Instead, local carriers, Medicare's payment agents, established local payment areas that corresponded to their then-existing business. While there has been some consolidation in recent years, this means that Medicare has 240 different payment schedules for the same services, reflecting the 240 different localities, established by the carriers.

Because Medicare's payment calculations are triggered by a physician's actual charges in a prior year, this design resulted in high fee schedules being locked in for some localities.

And just look at the results.

HCFA data for 1980 show that the highest prevailing charge for a brief followup visit by a physician to a hospitalized patient exceeded the lowest prevailing charge by a whopping 373 percent.

For extraction of a lens, the difference was 159 percent.

A single-view chest x-ray resulted in reimbursement difference that were an incredible 536 percent.

Four, five, sixfold variations in prevailing charges are not unusual. They are the norm, according to a recent report on physician payment by the Office of Technology Assessment.

Even after adjusting for differences in cost-of-living, malpractice premiums, quality of care, or relative physician shortages, a study, cited by OTA's report, still found threefold variations.

And these differences do not only exist between different parts of the country but within States as well. OTA's report noted that variations between localities within the same State are often as high as 50 percent. A 1976 study of Medicare payment levels found that urban payments exceeded those to physicians in rural areas by 23 percent. Yet OTA also cites a study which demonstrated that average reported professional expenses have been highest in nonmetropolitan areas, where reimbursement is significantly lower.

This means that payments not only do not fairly reflect practice costs but they also work against national policy. It is more likely that Medicare beneficiaries will be faced with more access problems in rural areas and the policy undercuts our efforts to encourage physicians to move into more underserved, rural areas.

Mr. President, it is time to revamp Medicare's payment system for physician services. The inequities I have pointed out are only the tip of the iceberg. I have not touched on the differences between payments to physicians just beginning their practice and those in practice for some time, the incentives provided to technical procedures rather than cognitive services, the whimsical differences in actual coverage policy by different carriers. The list goes on and on.

Some problems faced by physicians—the impact of the freeze and the delay in updating fees from year to year—are inherently unresolvable in light of the financial crisis we face. There is little chance for addressing those issues.

But within the resources we do have available, it is essential that we try to make our reimbursement system both understandable and equitable. Currently, it is neither. And we need to address both problems.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR HAWKINS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Florida is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

UEBERROTH POPS UP TO END THE INNING AGAINST DRUGS IN BASEBALL

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, three cheers for Carl Rowan's open letter to Baseball Commissioner Ueberroth, chastising him for his disappointing, lenient treatment of drug pushers and users in professional baseball. As chairman of the U.S. Senate Caucus on International Narcotics Control, chairman of the Subcommittee on Drug Abuse, and a Senator from the State of Florida, where Mr. Rowan got his inspiration for this letter, I welcome the plain-spoken wisdom and honesty of Mr. Rowan's letter. I hope that Mr. Ueberroth and other kingpins in professional sports and the media give Rowan's letter the close attention that it deserves.

Mr. Ueberroth did lose an important opportunity to deliver a much needed, stronger message against drug use to the millions of baseball fans, including our youth, who idolize the stars of our national pastime. After the demoralizing revelations of widespread drug use and trafficking in professional baseball that emerged from the trial in Pittsburgh last year, we expected and deserved a more responsible display of leadership by the commissioner. There was a crying need to dispense justice to the guilty with an eye to the welfare of the public, the larger and more important victim of those millionaire baseball players who plead for leniency and one more chance, while continuing to show contempt for the public welfare, biting the very hand that feeds them.

To see how spineless our sports systems have become, contrast the actions of Commissioner Kenesaw Mountain Landis, during the Black Sox scandal of 1919, to the actions of Commissioner Ueberroth today. In 1919, Commissioner Landis expelled eight players from the game for life, despite their formal acquittal in court, for fixing World Series games. In 1986, Ueberroth merely threatened to suspend, for 1 year, seven major league baseball players who, the commissioner admits, both used and facilitated distribution of illicit drugs in and around baseball in the last several years. And no suspension at all will occur if they agree to donate 10 percent of their 1986 salaries to drug use prevention and treatment charities, accept random drug-testing, and spend 200 hours in community service work related to the drug problem.

Other professional sports, without the direct impetus of the Pittsburgh trial drug use in baseball, have taken much sterner action against their addicts and users. Several months ago, the Men's International Professional Tennis Council approved mandatory drug testing for the men's professional tennis tour in 1986. Last week, we saw the National Basketball Association ban from further league play its first active player, Michael Ray Richardson, and totally voided his 4-year, $3 million contract. Mr. Ueberroth followed up with what can only be called a pop-fly in foul territory down the left field line to end this rally in professional sports toward responsible supervision of its own criminal element.

Our professional sports organizations are a major focus of attention by the young, and not so young, in this country. Their prominence in the public eye and the extent to which they are idolized as role models by our youth make them a key ingredient in any realistic effort to swing public attitudes against drug use in this country.

A country suffering as much as we are from illicit drug use simply cannot tolerate drug use by its famous or infamous professional athletes. To do so is to sit idly by, as good civil libertarians, while our society self-destructs. Those of us who do not share this death wish must act decisively against illicit drug use. As Mr. Rowan so eloquently illustrated, the freedom to indulge oneself without restraint or detection in illegal activity, regardless of the consequences to one's society, is not what civil liberty is about.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Rowan's open letter, which appeared in the Washington Post on March 5, 1986, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN OPEN LETTER TO COMMISSIONER UEBERROTH

BOCA RATON, FLA., March 5, 1986.

To Mr. Peter Ueberroth, Commissioner of Baseball, New York, NY.

DEAR MR. COMMISSIONER: There is a touch of tragedy in the fact that I read of your crackdown on illicit drug users and peddlers in baseball while in South Florida, trying to determine whether the United States has lost the war against drug abuse—or what steps might yet be taken to wipe out this curse. I applauded at the initial TV news announcement that you had suspended 11 drug-using players, some of them superstars . . . and then I heard that the "suspensions" were not really suspensions.

I thought you were saying that there is absolutely no place in the Great American Pastime for cocaine junkies or pushers of marijuana, heroin, morphine, PCP and other destructive controlled substances. I hoped you were saying to millions of youngsters, "Hit the drug trail, and it will lead you to a lot of places, most of them prisons, hospitals, cemeteries, but it will never lead you to a World Series."

I realized, quickly and unhappily, that you really were saying: "Get caught pushing and using drugs, and I'm going to sock it to you. Instead of making a million bucks a year, I'll only let you have $900,000; and you'll have to undergo drug tests, then go out and tell kids what a bad boy you've been."

I know the pressures to sing to Keith Hernandez, Dale Berra, Dave Parker, Joaquin Andujar and others that old pre-drug-era lyric, "Just One More Chance." I know that you don't want to be lynched by the owners, coaches and fans of the teams that count on the likes of Lonnie Smith, Enos Cabell and Jeff Leonard. But I suggest that you ask yourself again whether your punishment of these "role models" is sufficient to free baseball (and football, basketball, television, the movies and Wall Street) of an affliction that makes the United States more bedeviled by illicit drug abuse than any country on earth.

I write you from South Florida, where baseball spring training is in full swing. Just prior to reading of your "crackdown" I read an editorial in the Boca Raton News saying that "one of five high school students (in Palm Beach County) tried cocaine before graduating by the end of 1985. By the end of this year 19 percent of the high school students will be regular users."

I ask you, Mr. Ueberroth, whether you think the "punishment" that you have meted out to these millionaire baseball superstars is sufficient to convince high school kids that drug abuse does not pay?

The history of drug abuse suggests that a terrible rate of recidivism exists, and that whether your "random drug tests" work or not, a lot of the players getting second and third chances are going to be devoured by "The Lady," cocaine, or by other mind-bending and destructive drugs.

The objective must not be the "fairness" of "second chances" for those already hopelessly hooked, but a ruthlessly unbending message to kids like those in high school here that when they say yes to cocaine or heroin, they have said no to baseball.

Would you think again about whether your punishments deter or encourage teenagers, gladiators, cheerleaders and school band members to experiment with drugs that eventually will devour them?

An admirer, CARL T. ROWAN.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes as if in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BALANCED BUDGET CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, in consideration of the proposed constitutional amendment, the proposed constitutional amendment is the so-called balanced budget amendment. It is an amendment that I have been supporting for several years and now I hope that it can pass.

However, the amendment to the amendment that is pending by the Senators from Utah and Colorado, Senator HATCH and Senator ARMSTRONG, is an amendment that causes me a great deal of concern.

It would add this phrase:

Nor shall borrowing on the credit of the United States be authorized to finance an excess of outlays over receipts for any fiscal year, . . .

That ties into the proposed constitutional amendment, continuing—unless three-fifths of the whole number of both Houses of Congress shall provide for a specific excess of outlays over receipts.

Mr. President, boiled down, this amendment would require that there be the supermajority of three-fifths of both Houses of Congress if we were to exceed outlays over receipts for any fiscal year. That is in fitting with the purpose of the amendment up to a point.

The point that concerns me is what happens in regard to the Commodity Credit Corporation if at the end of the fiscal year or near the end of the fiscal year we find that CCC requires an appropriation of a certain amount in order for it to be able to continue to function for the coming months.

If that case arises—and it could easily arise, because the appropriations for the Commodity Credit Corporation are made periodically whenever the corporation is faced with the limitation on its ability to continue to act for lack of funds—we would be required to have a supermajority in both Houses of Congress, 60 percent, if it were to exceed the budget for that particular year.

This is distressing because the funding of the CCC has historically been that way and will continue that way. We cannot predict exactly when it will need reimbursement, and it might be difficult from time to time, particularly at the end of a fiscal year, to get a supermajority of 60 percent of both Houses of Congress to vote affirmatively if it were necessary to reimburse the CCC so they would have adequate funding and if it were in excess of the budget for that particular fiscal year.

I think that uncertainty makes the amendment offered by our colleagues from Colorado and Utah, Senator HATCH and Senator ARMSTRONG, a very lamentable amendment.

I hope it is defeated. I do not think it has been properly addressed in the consideration of this proposed constitutional amendment. It certainly is not covered in the report that accompanies the constitutional amendment.

I doubt, judging from the colloquy and the debate that we had here last evening, that it has been thoroughly explored or thoroughly contemplated by the authors of the amendment.

I think in all fairness if we want this constitutional amendment to receive two-thirds vote in this body we should defeat this amendment because I think it would greatly endanger the passage of the constitutional amendment if the Hatch-Armstrong amendment is adopted.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR SASSER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Tennessee is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

HUNGER IN AMERICA

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, as many of my colleagues know, recent studies suggest that as many as 20 million adults and children here in this country go to bed hungry for days out of each month. In light of the substantial Federal dollars we have invested in nutrition programs—over $20 billion last year alone—I was deeply troubled by these reports of hunger on the rise in our land. In the midst of a period of economic growth, with massive Federal expenditures on nutrition programs, the question I ask myself is, How can hunger be increasing? In our land of plenty just how real of a problem does hunger pose?

To answer these questions, I held an extensive field hearing in my home State of Tennessee last month. To be quite frank, I was astonished to find that many Tennessee families and senior citizens are truly facing hunger and malnutrition. I heard from rural Appalachian mothers who aid that even though they spend their food stamps wisely, their stamps run out well before the end of each month. For as long as 2 weeks each month, some of these families exist solely on rations of potatoes and biscuits. One mother told of rationing the few eggs and milk she received from the Women, Infants, and Children Feeding Program among her family of eight children.

Another witness at the hearing—an 85-year-old urban woman—told me that she eats only one meal per day. She relies on the weekday lunches she receives from the Senior Feeding Program at a neighborhood senior citizens center and $37 a month in food stamps which she must spread over a whole month. She stated that on weekends, "I'm just used to not eating." When I asked these individuals if they or their children went hungry, their response was an unequivocal "yes."

Hunger seems to be focused primarily on the very young and the very old.

These witnesses do not represent isolated cases. I heard from individuals who work in Federal, State, and private food distribution programs that cases of hunger and malnutrition are increasing at an alarming rate. Moreover, physicians and nutrition experts informed me that the patients they see, both rural and urban, are increasingly showing signs and symptoms of hunger and malnutrition. These symptoms include anemia, vitamin deficiencies, mothers birthing of small, sick babies, and higher incidence of disease. The doctors made it clear that, where there is hunger, there is also increased health care costs.

The up-shot of this chilling testimony was crystal clear. Federal nutrition programs are functioning, but are simply not meeting the urgent need that exists in our cities and rural communities. Furthermore, this shortcoming has been exacerbated by the fact that, in 1981, States were prohibited from using Federal money to fund outreach programs designed to inform potential recipients of the availability of nutrition assistance.

Although we have seen an increase in nominal dollars spent for Federal nutrition programs over the past 5 years, inflation has eaten these increases, and, in fact, decreased the real purchasing power of these food dollars. As a result, program recipients are losing ground to inflation. If we are indeed serious about combating hunger, it is time to reconsider the value of Federal nutrition programs and find ways to make them more effective and more available to those who are truly in need. Existing programs have laid a foundation for providing food for persons who, through no fault of their own, find themselves unemployed and hungry. But this is a foundation which we must build on to tackle the devastating consequences of hunger. With domestic hunger and malnutrition rising, it is imperative that we begin this process.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, the administration's proposed budget for fiscal year 1987 moves in just the opposite direction. The administration has proposed reductions in several of our most effective food programs—programs with demonstrated results in assisting the individuals most vulnerable to extreme health consequences from hunger and malnourishment.

In light of the vivid pictures of hunger in America which I brought back from my hearing, I find such proposals ill-advised and untimely. And I am writing a letter to the President indicating my opposition to these proposed cuts in nutrition programs at a time when constructive steps are called for. I would urge my colleagues to join me in this endeavor.

In addition, I intend to sponsor a resolution calling for an end to domestic hunger by the end of this decade. The evidence shows that domestic hunger is real, but that it can be prevented. We must rekindle national interest in ending this growing tragedy. The resolution I will introduce is but a first step in this process.

Finally, as we debate the budget for the up-coming year and examine nutrition programs, we must keep in mind the plight of the hungry. We must stand ready to make budget and statutory changes to address this travesty.

For, quite simply, Mr. President, recent reports on hunger and its consequences should serve to direct our attention to a very serious and growing need that is not being met by the private sector or the Federal or State governments. We have nutrition programs, but they are failing to meet the challenge for which they were implemented: To prevent hunger and malnutrition right here in the United States.

One indicator of a country's greatness is how it treats its least advantaged and its most vulnerable. I urge my colleagues to join my efforts on this very important issue to help eliminate hunger in America.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to extend beyond the hour of 10 a.m. with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be recinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATOR DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN: FAMILY AND NATION

Mr. HART. Mr. President, this weekend, I had the pleasure of reading an extraordinary book by an extraordinary colleague—a volume called "Family and Nation" by Senator DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN.

There is, I think, a paradox in America today. We live in a society which literally worships youth. Yet, our budgets and politics confine the impact of Government policy on children and the families which surround them, to be periphery; after-thought.

Consequently, there is virtually no incentive for a policymaker of PAT MOYNIHAN's eminence to wander outside the political spotlight, to spend time with America's children and their families, to ask "how they're doing," and "why?" There is not typically much media attention; there are few rewards, even fewer votes. But our colleague, PAT MOYNIHAN, has been doing it—pursuing these questions for three decades.

But he has been doing it for three decades. He has been doing it well, and with some effect. And he persists in doing it even when there has been considerable personal cost in pursuing some very controversial issues. Twice, in the last 20 years, his labors have been interrupted by ugly attacks on his professionalism—for raising the right questions more than slightly ahead of their time—and yet he persists still. This record speaks volumes about his love for the subject, and his love for the subject speaks volumes about him.

Mr. President, how is it that the issues our colleague has raised—like poverty and the relative status of children—have been pushed to centerstage? The answer, not unlike the subjects themselves, is complex, variegated.

In part, these concerns have penetrated the public debate because the administration has underestimated our view of patriotism and community. Americans understand that patriotism demands more than a celebration of how well our Nation did in the past or is doing now. It demands that we ask how America can do better. America's conscience does not forget that the ultimate goal of citizenship is not doing well; it is doing good. And, as well as many of us have done these past 5 years, many of us could be doing better. And many too many of our fellow Americans are not doing well at all.

And, as public attention has turned to the least among us, and the burdens of deprivation they carry, the debate has been quickened by the emergence of scholarly conservative works which challenge the very basis of our social welfare structure.

But most important, this debate became focused when Senator MOYNIHAN returned to Harvard University as Godkin lecturer for 1984–85 and gave a series of talks on "Family and Nation." He had all that he needed: an elegant voice, a steady pen, decades of experience, the right data, and core values. With these tools, he restored this Nation's vision of community, conscience and caring.

To those in our society who want us to do more, Senator MOYNIHAN's book offers concrete evidence of what we can do well, where we have failed, and how we can do better. He reminds us that the New Deal and the Great Society were not abject failures, as some have tried to make them.

He cites, for example, our progress with respect to the elderly. The growth of the elderly population in America during the 1970's exceeded that of the entire population of India. But we find that poverty rates among the aged have virtually vanished. We can thank Medicare and Social Security for that, and ought to. From 1965–80, infant mortality was cut in half—and we can attribute that success in part to WIC, Medicaid, and other programs. Some poor children are performing better in school, and we can point to the success of Head Start. Job training does benefit women who benefit from AFDC—it is a fact, welfare dependence is reduced and occupational opportunities enhanced.

Senator MOYNIHAN is frank to say our job is not done. The poverty rate for children is seven times that as great for the aged. Teenage pregnancies are proliferating at rates which claw our impoverished communities. Drugs are destroying men, women and babies, and Government seems powerless to stop the epidemic. And the 14-percent rate of poverty seems resistant to change regardless of the growth of the economy.

But "Family and Nation" reminds us that our efforts do, at times, bear fruit. Certainly enough to continue to try. Government cannot do it all, and Senator MOYNIHAN does not suggest otherwise. Family structure matters, it matters a lot. Individual initiative, local control, strong values and economic opportunity matter as well. But we would be hasty, and we would be wrong, to abandon wholesale a range of education, job training and welfare initiative which help dependent people do better.

The question, Senator MOYNIHAN reminds us, is not whether Government will have a policy for children and families, but what kind. He says:

> (N)o government, however firm might be its wish, can avoid having policies that profoundly influence family relationships. This is not to be avoided. The only option is whether these will be purposeful, intended policies or whether they will be residual, derivative, in a sense, concealed ones.

Senator MOYNIHAN has helped form a purposeful and humane family policy in four successive administrations, in numerous scholarly books and articles, and in years of distinguished service on the Senate Budget and Finance Committees. The publication of "Family and Nation" reminds us how dedicated he has been, and how he has been a persuasive force for good.

PAT MOYNIHAN was interviewed recently on "Face the Nation" by Lesley Stahl of CBS. Ms. Stahl closed the interview asking PAT whether it was realistic to hope—in this budget environment—that improvements in Federal policy regarding poverty were likely. Here is his reply:

> From Washington? In this century, what's left of it? No, but it is realistic that people will begin to care, that people will put some of their own time, some of the local resources, and that when in the next century, which is my judgment, Washington starts thinking about the condition of people in this country again, maybe we can do something for our children.

Of course, it must happen. With or without PATRICK's help, it may not. Without his help, it probably will not. With his help, it probably will.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COCHRAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATFIELD). The Senator from Mississippi.

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senate to a report from the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Last week, I met with Dr. Hans Blix, Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency [IAEA], during his visit to Washington. It was a pleasure to talk with him and to receive a report on the excellent progress of the IAEA in contributing to the international effort to discourage the spread of nuclear weapons.

United States participation in the IAEA will be among the topics discussed when the Subcommittee on Energy, Nuclear Proliferation, and Government Processes holds a hearing on March 20 at which time Mr. Richard T. Kennedy, Ambassador at Large and Special Adviser to the Secretary of State on Non-Proliferation Policy and Nuclear Energy Affairs, will review the nonproliferation activities of our Government during 1985.

Mr. President, I hope my colleagues will join me in strong support for the work of IAEA in the international nonproliferation effort. I ask unanimous consent that a recent report on IAEA safeguards for 1980–85, be printed in the RECORD following my statement.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, many observers view nuclear proliferation—the spread of nuclear weapons—as the main security problem confronting the world today. There is continuing fear that any increase in the number of nations possessing nuclear weapons would increase the likelihood of nuclear conflict. This anxiety has motivated world leaders to search for international means to retard proliferation. Over the past four decades, a whole array of national and multinational policies has been designed to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons to nations not already possessing them. An international nuclear nonproliferation regime has been built which has brought most nations together in the attempt to devise ways to discourage the spread of nuclear weapons.

This is a difficult issue, since the spread of the nuclear fuel and technology needed for civilian nuclear power in effect provides more and more countries with the means to build nuclear military capability. Just as it is possible to turn nuclear swords into plowshares, it is increasingly feasible to turn nuclear plowshares into swords.

The danger sign is that by the turn of the century numerous industrial nations will be able to refine and process uranium ore into material for use in nuclear weapons. The countervailing hopeful sign, however, is that many countries which already have this ability have chosen not to use it. It is the purpose of the international nonproliferation regime to encourage other nations to follow this example and to adhere to nonproliferation standards developed by the international community.

Efforts to restrain the spread of nuclear weapons to additional countries have been remarkably successful. At the beginning of the 1960's, President Kennedy feared that 15 to 20 or 25 countries might develop atomic weapons. We can be thankful that this has not happened and that the number of nuclear-weapon states has remained limited to five nations: the United States, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, France, and China.

Most nations which have decided to develop civilian nuclear power have gradually come to accept the desirability of controls to inhibit proliferation. These restraints are contained in a collection of treaties, agreements, and voluntary commitments to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons. A system has grown up in which recordkeeping, audits, inspections, and technical controls assure countries that their neighbors are not misusing atomic energy. These safeguards have become the heart of the international nonproliferation regime. They have evolved principally through the work of the International Atomic Energy Agency [IAEA], created in 1957 to control as well as to promote nuclear power.

The safeguards operations of the IAEA are unique. They mark the first instance in history of sovereign nations inviting an impartial international organization to audit their accounts and conduct inspections on their own territory. Countries agree to the application of IAEA safeguards as a matter of self-interest so as to give their neighbors and the rest of the world complete assurance that their nuclear energy activities are being exclusively applied for peaceful purposes. In their awareness of the special nature of nuclear energy, they justly believe that, in order to build confidence among nations and so create the most favorable conditions for broad nuclear commerce, they must adhere to principles of nuclear exchange based on the nonproliferation regime.

An overwhelming majority of nations of the world—131 at latest count—have joined the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons [NPT], unquestionably the most important international agreement underlying the nonproliferation regime. The nonweapons states that have signed the NPT have agreed to accept IAEA inspection on all of their nuclear activities. The result is that some 95 percent of all nuclear installations in countries not possessing nuclear weapons are now under safeguards. While the 5 percent not open to inspection continue to give us cause for concern, the growing coverage of safeguards is encouraging.

In a few decades, the safeguards system has evolved from a small operation in an entirely new field to a professional verification system. The costs for IAEA safeguards in 1985 came to about $30 million. For value received, this would seem a very reasonable sum indeed, especially when we remember that police departments in many American cities have budgets which far exceed that amount.

Mr. President, it is encouraging to note that nonproliferation and the IAEA are subjects on which the interests of the United States and the Soviet Union have converged for more than 20 years. Since the early 1960's the two superpowers have been on the same side of most issues coming before the IAEA. They worked in harmony in negotiating the Non-Proliferation Treaty in 1968, and since 1982 the two countries have had continuing nonproliferation discussions. After a wide-ranging examination of world problems at the recent Geneva summit, the two sides pledged:

To continue to promote the strengthening of the International Atomic Energy Agency and to support the activities of the Agency in implementing safeguards as well as in promoting the peaceful uses of nuclear energy.

The improving safeguards system has broad significance as a confidence-building mechanism whereby nations can increasingly rely upon international verification in the implementation of arms reduction agreements. In this regard, we should take heart from the willingness of all countries already having nuclear weapons to accept safeguards on selected civilian nuclear facilities. Four of the nuclear-weapon nations—the United States, the United Kingdom, France, and the Soviet Union—have concluded agreements for that purpose, and while China has not negotiated such an agreement with the IAEA, she has indicated a willingness to do so.

The importance of these inspections lies not so much in the field of nonproliferation, since these countries already possess nuclear weapons. Their greater significance lies in the precedent that they give to the world for verification that peaceful nuclear activities in countries possessing nuclear arsenals are kept separate from military uses. Such experience is extremely valuable to the international community in gaining experience of impartial inspection in these countries through the IAEA. Since the question of verification is usually a major stumbling block in arms talks, the IAEA safeguards system may serve as a prototype for an international inspection system, offering hope of dependable verification of future nuclear arms reduction agreements.

Continued strong American support for the IAEA is vital to the international nonproliferation regime. We in Congress need to understand the crucial importance of that regime to our Nation's foreign policy and to our national security and to give continuing attention and support to the vital work of the IAEA.

With constant international watchfulness, we may confidently hope that time is on the side of the international effort to halt the spread of nuclear weapons. Every year we see a strengthening of public attitudes, agreements, safeguards, and technical requirements which discourage proliferation. And sustaining the growing effectiveness of the International Atomic Energy Agency will undergird our effort to prevent nuclear war, the most important challenge that our generation faces.

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY—IAEA SAFEGUARDS 1980-85

This paper covers the main developments in IAEA safeguards between 1980-1985.

GROWTH AND PRESENT STATUS OF IAEA SAFEGUARDS

By September 1985 IAEA safeguards covered more than 95% of the nuclear plant and materials outside the five nuclear-weapon countries (China, France, UK, USA, and USSR). In fact only five non-nuclear-weapon countries (Argentina, India, Israel, Pakistan, South Africa) were known to be operating unsafeguarded plants. Four of the five nuclear weapon countries had opened all (US, UK) or some (France, USSR) of their civilian nuclear plants to IAEA safeguards inspection.[1] When IAEA safeguards also cover Chinese plants, as a result of China's recently announced intention to negotiate an agreement, every country in the world that has a nuclear reactor, will have accepted safeguards on all or at least some of its nuclear plants.

The following statistics show the growth in the safeguards operation 1980–85.

Coverage by State:
Number of countries with safeguards agreements.	84	96 (end 1985).
NPT or Tlatelolco	67	80 (end 1985).
Non-NPT or non-Tlatelolco	14	12 (end 1985).
NWS	3	4 (end 1985).
Number of agreements in force	134	163 (end 1985).
Agreements with weapon countries	1	4 (end 1985).
Parties to NPT	113	131 (end 1985).
Facilities and material under safeguards (including nuclear weapon states):
Facilities	393	460.
Separated plutonium	7 tons	7.7 tons.
Plutonium in spent fuel	68 tons	129.5 tons.
Highly enriched uranium	11.4 tons	11.8 tons.
Low-enriched uranium	11,700 tons.	22,784 tons.
Source material (natural uranium, etc.)	15,400 tons.	31,724 tons.
Resources and effort:
Safeguards expenditure	$18m (1980).	$30m (1985).
Inspectors (in Operations)	94	186.
Inspections	1,000 (1980).	1,820 (1984).
Countries [2] carrying out safeguards support programmes.	5	10.

[2] Including EURATOM.

The number of non-nuclear-weapon countries outside the NPT and having significant nuclear activity declined from twelve to nine (Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Cuba, India, Israel, Pakistan, Spain, South Africa) as the Democratic People's Republic of Korea[2], Egypt and Turkey adhered to the NPT. Spain placed its entire nuclear programme under safeguards[3]. Certain other countries which have not adhered to NPT have all their present facilities subject to safeguards.

The Third NPT Review Conference in its consensus final declaration, stated: ". . . the conviction that IAEA safeguards provide assurance that States are complying with their undertakings and assist States in demonstrating this compliance. They thereby promote further confidence among States and help to strengthen their collective security . . . [playing] a key role in preventing proliferation . . . Unsafeguarded nuclear activities in non-nuclear-weapon States pose serious proliferation dangers".

The conference thus affirmed the key role of IAEA safeguards and its own confidence in them. It also expressed the view that the real and pressing danger of proliferation begins where IAEA safeguards end.

[1] Limited resources have so far permitted the IAEA to select for inspection only a few "eligible" plants in nuclear weapon countries.

[2] Adherence of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to NPT deposited on 12 December 1985.

[3] But Argentina, India and Pakistan began operating unsafeguarded plants. By 1985 most governments of the world had thus come to rely on IAEA safeguards to give assurance to other nations that they were abiding by their own non-proliferation or other safeguards undertakings; to have continuing confidence that other nations were doing the same; and to provide the essential framework for peaceful international commerce in nuclear plant and materials.

This affirmation is important since the discussions which followed the Israeli OSIRAQ attack in June 1981 had affected confidence in IAEA safeguards, especially in the United States. Partly, perhaps, because many had not realized that the IAEA operates under some unavoidable constraints. But also partly because the incident revealed certain weaknesses in the operation, due chiefly to its rapid expansion between 1975 and 1980 in the non-nuclear weapon states of EURATOM and in Japan and to the fact that it was totally a new and pioneering undertaking in international verification.

What are these weaknesses and contraints and what has the IAEA done to remove or alleviate them?

POLITICAL PARAMETERS

Safeguards seek to build confidence, but cannot physically prevent breach of agreement

Safeguards—"international verification" would be a better term—are a confidence building measure. If a country decides that its interests are best served by foregoing the option of nuclear weapons, one way of creating international confidence in the decision is to enter a treaty through which the stand taken becomes an internationally binding obligation. It can create still more confidence by opening any nuclear activities on its territory international inspection, verifying and certifying compliance with the non-proliferation engagement that it has entered.

It should go without saying—but is regrettably not always understood—that international verification cannot physically prevent a nation from violating its commitment. It is an alarm bell, not a police operation. Neither the US nor the eleven main authors of the IAEA Statute (1953–1956) considered it necessary or politically feasible to give the Agency the authority or means forcibly to intervene against violations of their commitments. This is not to say that deterrents do not exist against possible inclinations in a State to violate the commitments entered. Reports on non-compliance may lead to suspension or termination of various Agency services and rights and privileges. After transmission to the United Nations such reports may result in measures by the Security Council or the General Assembly. Any reports on non-compliance with obligations can also be expected to trigger political and diplomatic reactions by individual governments. Beyond the verification system there are thus legal and political mechanisms which are likely to operate in case non-compliance is reported. Indeed, some reactions are likely to be triggered if there were to be reports that a country is not co-operative in the verification.

While verification of fulfillment of non-proliferation commitments is the purpose of safeguards and a positive result of the verification is the rule, the technical aim of safeguards is stated to be ". . . the timely detection of diversion of significant quantities of nuclear material. . ." (underlining supplied). To provide some quantitative yardstick of achievement of this technical aid, IAEA safeguards work on the basis of preset quantitative detection and inspection goals. These are dealt with in detail on pages 15/16.

Has the IAEA fostered the confidence it seeks to create? The positive judgment of the Third NPT Review Conference has already been noted. That judgment has regularly been given specific confirmation by the annual statements of the IAEA's Board of Governors that during the preceding year the IAEA had detected no anomaly indicating diversion of a significant quantity of material and that "it is reasonable to conclude" that safeguarded material was peacefully used or otherwise accounted for.

There have been three exceptions, each signalled by the Director General to the IAEA Board. Between 1981 and early 1983 the IAEA was not able to give independent verification that there was no diversion at two plants in two countries not parties to NPT, although the Director General made it clear at the time that there was no suggestion of a violation of the relevant safeguards agreements or of any diversion. With the Board's support the Director General was able to renegotiate the safeguards arrangements for these plants and upgrade them satisfactorily. And in 1984 an NPT country failed to send the due notification requested by the safeguards agreement of the export of nearly 50 tonnes of depleted uranium under safeguards. Later the importing country declared that the material had been imported for non-nuclear, non-explosive purposes and most of the unused material was shown to the IAEA.

These incidents—all brought before the IAEA Board of Governors by the Director General—give confidence that the IAEA will sound an alarm if it is unable to certify peaceful use or if it detects a serious anomaly.

The coverage of safeguards—freedom of movement of inspectors

No country will permit foreign inspectors to roam freely around its territory in search of unreported plants or material, nor do the safeguards agreements concluded and approved by the Board include such a provision. Does this mean that facilities or material which should be subject to safeguards may be constructed or used clandestinely?

The IAEA has fully monitored, through its safeguards, the evolution of the nuclear programmes of most NPT countries since the programmes were first launched. In Western Europe EURATOM did the same for its original five non-nuclear weapons member states (Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands) and has now merged its data with those of the IAEA. The only significant cases where IAEA safeguards started to be applied after the beginning of the nuclear programme of the non-nuclear weapon state concerned were Canada, Sweden and those countries in Eastern Europe which had nuclear programmes before safeguards pursuant to NPT started.

Moreover, since the IAEA began applying safeguards in 1959 no case has come to light of a government failing to report a nuclear plant which should have been reported under a safeguards agreement.

A related question is that of IAEA access to facilities in NPT countries, which are not yet in use and do not have to be reported to the IAEA, since NPT safeguards agreements apply safeguards to nuclear material only. However, these agreements make provision for the Agency to verify the design of facilities before any nuclear material is introduced, and of any subsequent modifications.

The IAEA also has the right formally to request special inspections, with access to information and locations in addition to those open to routine inspections, if it believes that the information it is getting from the government concerned ". . . is not adequate for the Agency to fulfill its responsibilities . . ." So far the information that governments have provided has been considered adequate and the IAEA has not found it necessary to make use of this right.

Several developments since 1980 have helped to increase confidence that the IAEA is able to inspect all that it should inspect under safeguards agreements. IAEA coverage of the international fuel cycle and its access to information has increased as more countries joined the NPT; as more countries not party to NPT agreed to require application of safeguards to their exports (as Argentina, China and South Africa have recently announced); as more nuclear-weapon states placed facilities under safeguards; as more countries accept the IAEA's recommendations to standardize and make comparable the notifications to the IAEA of exports and imports of nuclear materials, etc.

Since 1980 the IAEA has also greatly expanded and improved its inspector training programme (see below). One result is that inspectors have a clearer understanding of their rights and are better able to insist upon them if necessary. The IAEA has also taken further steps to monitor systematically and as fully as possible the nuclear programmes of all countries both parties and non-parties to NPT, in which it carries out inspections. Comprehensive computerized data are available on the nuclear programmes of most states.[4]

Every nation insists on the right to refuse admission of particular foreign nationals, be they diplomats, national officials or international inspectors. All safeguards agreements require the Director General to consult the government of the country concerned about the names of officials he plans to designate as inspectors of its nuclear plants. This does not mean that the government decides which IAEA officials will inspect its plants. That decision rests solely with the Director General and his staff. And if a government repeatedly rejects the Director General's proposals, the relevant safeguards document and agreement explicitly indicate that he can raise the matter with the Board.

In this connection it should be noted that the Agency never uses a national of a country in which there are safeguarded facilities, to inspect those facilities.

In practice it is rare for a government to reject a particular inspector and the Director General has not so far had to go to the Board because of persistent rejections. However, some countries have indicated in advance that, for instance, they will not be willing to accept inspectors if the countries of which they are nationals do not themselves accept inspection; inspectors of a particular nationality; inspectors if the country of which they are nationals refuses to accept inspectors who are nationals of the country being consulted ("reciprocity"); more than a limited total number of inspectors; inspectors who are not sufficiently familiar with the language of the country being inspected (if the language is one of the Agency's official languages).

In addition some countries are very tardy in responding to proposals for designation of inspectors, with delays extending well beyond a reasonable or prescribed period for response.

The removal of these restrictions and delays, which make more difficult the use of inspection manpower in an optimal and flexible way, clearly lies chiefly in the hands of governments rather than with the IAEA. However, the increasing size of the Inspectorate has enabled the IAEA to make more flexible use of the staff available and to ensure that the right qualifications are matched to the right task. It has also been possible to double the number of inspectors accepted by countries. In 1980 about 750 designations had been agreed to by 51 countries; by 1985 the figure had risen to 1,500 designations and 56 countries. The annual Safeguards Implementation Reports that the Director General submits to the Board have also devoted a special section analysing designation problems and the progress that the Secretariat has been able to make.

Even if an inspector has been by a particular country for designation, he may still require a visa. In certain circumstances this can make it difficult to arrange "surprise" (unannounced) inspections. Visa requirements vary from none at all except for citizens of prescribed countries (most of Western Europe); nearly every foreign entrant (the USA and most of the New World); very stringent (most of Eastern Europe).

The IAEA has taken a number of steps to solve this visa problem. As noted, it hardly presents a barrier to unannounced inspections in Western Europe. By establishing resident inspectors in Japan and Canada the visa problem has been eliminated in two other countries with large nuclear fuel cycles. For countries that are more restrictive, the IAEA now requests multiple-entry visas.

Even if he does not need a visa (or has one) an inspector may have difficulty in obtaining access to plants because of physical security or other controls. Nevertheless, the IAEA was able to carry out the first unnannounced inspections in certain Western European countries and Japan in 1983–85.

The utility of an unannounced inspection differs widely from one type of plant to another. For instance, in the Light Water Reactor, every 12–18 months the reactor is opened, spent fuel is taken and fresh fuel is put in. The plant operator and the IAEA must make arrangements well in advance for inspecting this operation which usually lasts several days. When the reactor resumes operation, all significant movement in the plant are recorded by surveillance cameras or video tape recorders. In the case of this type of plant unannounced inspections would therefore serve little purpose.

On the other hand, for certain types of plant (gas centrifuge enrichment) unannounced inspections are a major element of the safeguards regime. In the case of a few bulk handling facilities the IAEA has implemented a practically continuous inspection safeguards regime.

Transparency and confidence

The public and legislatures must have sufficient information to be reasonably sure that the safeguards are effective and worth the money they cost. On the other hand, non-nuclear-weapon countries with large competing nuclear industries feel disadvantaged vis-a-vis the lightly safeguarded nuclear weapon states. They seek to ensure that the IAEA protects and keep confidential any operationally and commercially sensitive information that IAEA safeguards collect. IAEA inspectors, too, would feel inhibited if the government whose plants they inspect had access to their confidential reports.

The Board has therefore adopted strict rules to protect information and has recently again decided that the distribution of the detailed annual report on safeguards should be limited. However, the IAEA's published annual report and a summary of the safeguards report now give much more detailed information about the safeguards operations, its problems and achievements.

TECHNICAL AND OPERATIONAL PROGRESS

Reactors

There is no longer any significant problem in safeguarding the Light Water Reactor. It accounts for about 80% of the power reactors under safeguards. The small research reactor likewise presents no problem. About 80% of the safeguarded reactors in this category have a fuel inventory smaller than a single "significant quantity" (i.e. roughly the amount needed for a nuclear explosive).

The reactors that have presented more significant safeguarding problems are large research reactors (including critical assemblies) and heavy water power reactors. Fifteen large research reactors and critical assemblies are now under safeguards. Since 1980 the IAEA has refined the diversion scenarios for such reactors and has upgraded the safeguards it applies to them (including increasing the inspection effort and frequency). These measures give greater assurance that unreported production of plutonium would be promptly detected.

The IAEA is safeguarding 26 heavy water power reactors of the CANDU type (21 in Canada and the others in Argentina, India, Pakistan and the Republic of Korea).[5] These reactors, which are continuously refuelled, have presented special safeguards problems in the past. In arrangements with the IAEA, the Canadian Government has developed a very sophisticated installation for monitoring and counting the fuel removed for this type of reactor. It has now been installed in several reactors and is being rigorously tested and monitored. The IAEA is also studying or testing equipment and safeguards approaches for advanced reactors such as the high temperature reactor and the fast breeder.

Fuel fabrication plants

Natural and low enriched fuel fabrication plants do not present significant safeguarding problems. Satisfactory arrangements have been made for safeguarding the 5 plutonium/uranium mixed oxide and highly enriched uranium fuel fabrication plants operating in Western Europe and Japan.

Enrichment plants

So far the only type of enrichment plant to come under safeguards is the gas centrifuge (in the Netherlands, Japan, the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany). After several years of studies and discussions the IAEA, Australia, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, the United States and EURATOM reached agreement in 1983 on the safeguards regime to be followed in such plants which up until then had been inspected on an ad hoc basis. This regime has been incorporated in the detailed safeguards arrangements (facility attachments) for these plants. The regime includes a limited number of unannounced inspections. The first inspections inside the sensitive cascade areas have been carried out.

The IAEA is negotiating with South Africa on a safeguards regime and agreement for the South African "helicon" type, semi-commercial, enrichment plant.

[5] All figures as of 1 January 1985 and include plants under advanced construction.

There have been no indications that any nation will place a gaseous diffusion enrichment plant under safeguards. It is well-known that laser enrichment may present difficult safeguarding problems. The IAEA has noted the United States announcement that it intends commercially to develop AVLIS laser enrichment (in place of gas centrifuge enrichment). Certain other countries might follow suit. It is expected that the safeguards regime needed for effectively safeguarding this type of plant will be studied simultaneously.

Reprocessing plants—"The Plutonium Economy"

In the late 1970's there was concern that the widespread use of the fast breeder reactor would create a world-wide "plutonium economy" with large-scale production of plutonium and large quantities of separated plutonium moving from country to country. It was feared that the likelihood of diversion or of hijacking or other form of terrorims would rise steeply.

So far these fears have proved unfounded. Fast breeder reactors are confined to 3 weapon nations (France, USSR, UK), and to the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan and India. In the West, only France is operating an industry-size plant. There is little prospect of any large-scale commercial use of the fast breeder reactor before the second decade of the next century. Such fast breeder reactors as are built before then will probably be in those countries that already operate prototypes.

In the meantime large reprocessing plants in France and United Kingdom (and possibly, the USSR) and somewhat smaller ones in Japan and India are producing ton quantities of plutonium. The Federal Republic of Germany and Japan also plan to build large new reprocessing plants. At such plants there are problems in verifying (through materials accountancy alone) whether such significant quantities of plutonium as may be unaccounted for, represent measurement uncertainties or cloak a possible diversion.

Safeguarded plants of this kind are not likely to operate before the mid-1990's. To deal with them in advance a number of countries, including the Federal Republic of Germany and Japan are co-operating with the IAEA to develop concepts and new procedures for safeguarding effectively their future Reprocessing plants. The concepts include "near-real-time accounting" [6] accounting which is especially important in view of the short time needed to convert separated plutonium into weapon components.

In the IAEA Board of Governors there have also been extensive discussions of an international plutonium storage system (IPS). So far there has been no agreement on any particular scheme, but alternative models have been defined and the subject remains for further discussion within the IAEA.

Spent fuel

The amount of spent fuel in storage throughout the world is steadily increasing. This is not only because of the new arisings from existing or new reactors, but also because of delays in the construction of reprocessing plants. As already noted in the table in page 2 the plutonium contained in spent fuel under IAEA safeguards nearly doubled form 68 tons in 1979 to 124.5 tons in 1984.

However, most [55%] of the Western world's contained plutonium in nuclear power plant spent fuel through 1990 is in the nuclear weapon countries (US, UK, France) and most [73%] of it is in spent fuel from light water reactors. Most [90%] of the plutonium in spent fuel of LWRs in NNWS is in Western Europe and Japan, the remainder (22.6 t) is in Brazil (1.4 t), India (1.4 t), South Korea (6.3 t), Mexico (0.8 t), Philippines (0.5 t), South Africa (1.9 t) Taiwan (9.3t) and Yugoslavia (1 t).[7]

Given the potential military utility of all spent fuel and especially the fact that the longer it is stored the easier it is to reprocess it the IAEA, in addition to applying its safeguards to spent fuel in short-term storages, is developing effective safeguards concepts and procedures for long-term away-from-reactor spent fuel storage. The aim is timely detection of any unreported removal of spent fuel from such a storage.

Heavy water production

Since 1980, a heavy water production plant has come under an IAEA safeguards agreement. The IAEA is developing a safeguards approach for this facility which is due to begin operating within the next two years. Heavy water in facilities in States party to the NPT is not subject to safeguards, in accordance with the terms of safeguards agreements based on INFCIRC/153. Until recently heavy water in States not party to NPT was likewise not subject to IAEA safeguards, but there are now safeguards agreements with certain States not party to NPT which cover heavy water.

More effective and more cost-effective safeguards

Since 1980 the IAEA has undertaken a number of other steps to increase the overall effectiveness of the safeguards operation.

Note has already been taken of the definition of new diversion scenarios and safeguards concepts for larger research reactors and of the consequent upgrading of safeguards at such plants, of the steps taken to carry out unannounced inspections and to incorporate unannounced inspections as a regular feature of the safeguards regime for gas centrifuge enrichment plants.

Other steps include:

In 1981 the IAEA introduced a newly-developed safeguards information system for the eventual computerization of all safeguards data. This has enabled the IAEA to improve greatly and automatize the system of recording and evaluating reports received from States on nuclear material in their facilities or in transit and for standardizing and computerizing to the extent possible, the results of inspections. It has also permitted the Department of Safeguards to introduce strict security procedures for the protection of information and to prevent access by unauthorized individuals.

The IAEA has begun simultaneous inspection of all facilities in a particular country handling the same kind of nuclear materials. This procedure is designed to deal with a diversion scenario in which nuclear material is "borrowed" from a facility not being inspected to make up a short fall in a facility about to be inspected.

As regards safeguards equipment, the following improvements have been achieved mainly through the support of several Member States in the framework of formalized support programmes:

There has been a marked improvement in the reliability and performance of film cameras for surveillance of nuclear facilities. Their failure rate is now about one third of that of 1980 and is mainly due to human error rather than equipment failure.

The IAEA is also testing advanced closed-circuit television systems. The IAEA has also improved and standardized the techniques for evaluating surveillance films and tapes.

To meet increasingly stringent licensing requirements the US has developed for the IAEA a new special container to transport safeguards samples by air. Procedures for the shipment of samples have been improved.

Better and more tamper-resistant seals are now being used. The IAEA has introduced procedures to control and ensure that they are effectively used.

There have also been significant improvements in the accuracy and reliability and ease-of-use of instruments for measuring the composition of nuclear material.

The organization and resources of the Department of Safeguards have also been strengthened since 1980 e.g.:

The newly-established training section has enabled the IAEA to pay special attention to improving the training of inspectors. The section has developed training manuals and has carried out an intensive training programme. This includes exercises at nuclear plants in Member States for all new inspectors. It also includes advanced courses in inspection procedures and in use of the computer data base, including computerized inspection reports. Refresher courses are offered at regular intervals to experienced inspectors, and language training for fluency in the local language.

With the creation of two new supporting divisions a major effort is being made to improve the evaluation of the results achieved in applying safeguards and to standardize the procedures used. Conceptual work has been done to define inspection goals and other basic concepts used for planning inspections.

Simultaneously, several improvements have been introduced in the annual Safeguards Implementation Reports so as to ensure that the Board of Governors and Member States may more easily assess the effectiveness of the safeguards operation.

The increase in the manpower available for inspection and the more effective use that is now made of it has led to a number of improvements in the number of inspection man-days spent in the field. These increased from 3300 in 1979 to 6600 in 1984. The creation of safeguards offices in Japan and Canada, already mentioned, has played some part in this improvement.

Achievement of inspection goals

The IAEA's inspection goals referred to on p. 4 are formulated on the following basis: to detect diversion with a probability of 90 to 95%; to preset the minimum quantities of nuclear material which safeguards accounting should detect, if the material were diverted; and to preset the maximum times which should elapse before a diversion is detected.

These times reflect the time it would take to turn the nuclear material into a nuclear explosive device or weapon.

The IAEA has developed criteria for inspection goals attainment by which it describes the capability of the inspectorate to detect the diversion of significant quantities of nuclear material in case such a diversion would occur. These criteria are based on technically relevant diversion scenarios—including some very remote and difficult of achievement—for categories of facilities. The criteria take account of legal and technical factors and of the inherent limitation of the safeguards system referred to on page 4. A failure fully to meet an inspection goal does not mean that a diversion has occurred without being detected. It does however give a signal to the Agency and to the Member States concerned that further improvements or developments may be called for and/or an increase in resources required.

[6] "Near-real-time accounting" requires frequent measurements at short intervals and enables the IAEA to verify the operation within a very short time after a change occurs, e.g. to verify the amount of plutonium very soon after it is separated.

[7] Library of Congress Report, August 1985.

The IAEA aims in the first place at fully attaining its inspection goals with respect to direct weapon-usable materials (plutonium and highly-enriched uranium), placing less emphasis on the safeguards activities related to other nuclear materials.

The progress described earlier in this paper has led to a significant improvement in achieving fully the IAEA inspection goals at individual facilities from 60% in 1979 to 71% in 1984 as far as direct weapon-usable materials are concerned and from 27% in 1979 to 53% in 1984 with respect to all nuclear materials.

THE FUTURE

Further improvements

The IAEA now has the capability and techniques to fulfill its current safeguards responsibilities, although an increase in manpower resources would be highly desirable to improve still further inspection goal achievement. For the future, the IAEA must focus on increased professionalism (rigorous recruitment criteria, advanced training) and develop the capacity to deal with emerging technologies. More specifically, what is needed is:

Onus on IAEA (in co-operation with certain Member States):

(a) Further improvement of the effectiveness and efficiency of the safeguards system e.g. by increased use of electronic information treatment.

(b) More extensive advanced training of inspectors, including fuller use by inspectors of advanced measuring and analytical techniques and instruments.

(c) Further development of safeguards procedures for advanced fuel-cycle technologies (e.g. laser enrichment) and for the safeguarding of MOX fuel fabrication, large-scale reprocessing and enrichment plants.

Onus on IAEA (in co-operation with operators):

(d) More comprehensive, and accurate verification of the inventories of nuclear material at major plants. This requires better co-operation by plant operators.

(e) Removal of restriction on the use of newly-developed safeguards instrumentation.

Onus on States:

(f) More prompt, accurate and complete reports by governments on the nuclear material flow at plants in their countries.

(g) Alleviation of restrictions that governments impose on the Director General's authority to designate inspectors, and speedier responses to designation proposals.

(h) Easier comparability in reports submitted by governments about their exports or imports of nuclear material.

For several years now, member governments have applied the "zero-growth" rule to the IAEA's budget. Thanks to gains in efficiency it has nevertheless been possible to increase the allocations for safeguard and for promotion of the peaceful uses of nuclear energy. The safeguards operation will continue to need larger resources to meet its commitments in the non-nuclear-weapon countries and to make further use of the voluntary offer safeguards agreements with nuclear weapon states. Also, to meet the concerns of certain countries (especially in Western Europe, Japan) that safeguards may impact unfairly on their industry, and to take account of the final declaration of the Third NPT Review Conference, the Agency is giving consideration to the economic and practical possibility of extending application of safeguards to additional civil facilities in the nuclear weapon states.

Concluding comments

The Third NPT Review Conference ". . . noted with satisfaction the improvement of IAEA Safeguards which has enabled it to continue to apply safeguards effectively during a period of rapid growth in the number of safeguarded facilities. It also noted that IAEA safeguards approaches are capable of adequately dealing with facilities under safeguards. . ." The IAEA has been able to report each year that there has been no indication that a significant quantity of nuclear material subject to safeguards have been diverted.

In addition, the Conference also underlined the need for the IAEA "to be provided with the necessary financial and human resources to ensure that the Agency is able to continue to meet effectively its safeguards responsibilities".

The November 1985 Summit Meeting in Geneva between President Reagan and General Secretary Gorbachev recorded in its concluding statement that the two sides (US and USSR) planned "to continue to promote the strengthening of the International Atomic Energy Agency, to support the activities of the Agency in implementing safeguards, as well as in promoting the peaceful uses of nuclear energy".

The number of plants coming under IAEA safeguards has grown much more slowly in recent years as IAEA safeguards coverage has become more than 95% complete in the non-nuclear-weapon countries and as the expansion of nuclear power has slowed down. This trend seems to be likely to continue for a number of years. The IAEA will however continue to need considerable additional financial and manpower resources to achieve all its safeguards goals and to finance the cost of increasingly complex equipment and R and D. The period ahead therefore offers an opportunity to the Member States of the IAEA to provide such resources as will enable the IAEA fully to meet its responsibilities for effective international safeguards, "as well as in promoting the peaceful uses of nuclear energy" in the words of the Summit Meeting. The performance of the IAEA in discharging its increasing safeguards responsibilities during 1980-1985 (outlined in this paper) shows that the IAEA has made substantial progress in effectively carrying out its tasks and in overcoming the difficulties encountered.

A TRIBUTE TO DANIEL L. LAMBERT

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to one of the greatest advocates for the rights of veterans our Nation has known, Daniel L. Lambert, who died February 15, 1986.

Dan Lambert embodied the finest of all American values. He was a brave soldier who was wounded four times in World War II and who was awarded numerous medals for his valor. He was a leader of veterans who fought to protect the rights of those who had sacrificed for their country. He was a proud citizen who never grew tired of defending the American way of life.

Dan Lambert has had an extraordinary impact on the lives of thousands of citizens in Maine and throughout the country. He was recognized as a man who held fast to his values, never bowing to the winds of change, and he encouraged others to join him in extolling the many virtues of this country.

Dan will long be remembered for his sense of duty to our country and to those who served in our armed forces. For over 40 years, he fought for Maine veterans who needed assistance. He founded the Maine Veterans Coordinating Committee and worked tirelessly for the establishment of the Maine Veterans Memorial Cemetery and the Maine State Veterans Home.

Over the years, he became known as "Mr. American Legion." He was editor of the Maine Legionnaire, which was recognized last year as the top newspaper serving veterans in the country, and he held numerous high offices within the Legion. He was known for always taking the time to listen to the individual concerns of those who sought his assistance.

His words and deeds have touched us all, and it is with great respect and admiration that I call attention to the many outstanding accomplishments of Daniel L. Lambert.

A TRIBUTE TO LEE V. BENSON

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I would like to take a moment of the Senate's time to acknowledge the outstanding work and journalistic accomplishments of Mr. Lee V. Benson, a native Utahn and sports columnist for Salt Lake City's Deseret News.

The year 1985 marks the 10th time in a row Mr. Benson has been named Utah's Sportswriter of the Year by the National Sportscasters and Sportswriters Association. The award is a prestigious one. All sports journalists in the State are eligible. The voters are the sportswriters themselves. An honor bestowed by one's peers is especially satisfying and noteworthy.

The fact that Mr. Benson has dominated his field for such a long time impresses me. It is difficult enough just to get to the top of a profession. To stay there for a decade in the competitive and creative climate of sports journalism is extraordinary.

I am also impressed by the way Mr. Benson has gone about developing and mastering his skills. From all accounts, his efforts from the beginning have been dedicated and tireless. The son of a farmer and mechanic, Mr. Benson had no head start or special benefits of any kind in his chosen field; just a desire to write and have someone publish his work.

The story of the way Mr. Benson obtained his first job is illustrative of his dedication. It was 1972 and he was a senior at Brigham Young University in Provo, UT. He heard of an opening at the Deseret News, one of Utah's major daily newspapers in Salt Lake City. He immediately applied for the job and an interview with the newspaper's sports editor was arranged. The sports editor was not encouraging, pointing out that Mr. Benson did not have any real experience, aside from the college newspaper, and that he had not yet obtained a college degree.

The night before the interview, northern Utah was hit with a major winter storm. Over 18 inches of snow fell. Visibility was almost zero. All roads were nearly impassable and Lee Benson found himself in Provo, 50 miles from Salt Lake City, with nothing but a 1968 Volkswagen to get him there. He got up 3 hours early and left anyway.

When the Utah Highway Patrol closed I-15 between Salt Lake City and Provo, Mr. Benson doubled back and found an alternate route through Heber City and Park City and down Parleys Canyon to Salt Lake City. There were times he didn't know if his car was still on the highway. But he kept going, finally arriving. He was on time. The sports editor was late.

Later in the day, Mr. Benson got his interview, and still later in the day, he got the job. His first beat was a do-it-right-or-there's-the-door assignment covering prep sports by winter and women's golf in the summer. He got right to it, attacking high school sports with roughly the same vengeance as he had the back roads to Salt Lake City. Four years later, having acquired a working knowledge of the location of every high school gymnasium in every corner of the State of Utah, he moved on to cover college and professional sports. Along the way he began developing as a writer, capturing America's obsession with sports in an entertaining blend of humor, wit and commentary.

In 1979, at only 31 years of age, Mr. Benson became the Deseret News' Sports Editor and daily columnist, a position he continues to hold. In addition to his decade-long lock on the annual sportswriter-of-the-year award, he has received many regional and national writing awards, and has served in a number of important organizations, including most recently a term as president of the College Basketball Writers of America. In 1984, he was ranked among the top 10 sports columnists in the Nation by Associated Press sports editors. Every day he brings us the world of sports, from the Olympic Games to the World Series to University of Utah basketball. We're proud of him in Utah. We think he has sliced off a piece of the American dream. He is doing what he does best and his fellow journalists have once again given him their praise. I join them in doing so, and I thank the chair for allowing me this opportunity to bring to the attention of my Senate colleagues such an outstanding journalist.

A column Mr. Benson filed a few years ago from Super Bowl XV in New Orleans which coincided with the final hours of the Iranian hostage crisis typifies his style. Mr. President, I ask that the column be printed in the Record.

The column follows:

WISH YOU'D BEEN THERE

(By Lee Benson)

NEW ORLEANS.—There were no more hostages to worry about, or presidential races either. What it came down to was whether six-foot-tall Lester Hayes could honestly stay with six-foot-eight Harold Carmichael (he could) and whether a part-Indian reconstructed quarterback could outthrow a Polish strongarm on the other side of the field (he could). Pleasant problems for a change, ones the nation could enjoy. Ones it did.

Sure it was just a football game here on Sunday, the 15th annual Super Bowl to decide the NFL's world champion, which is rather an arbitrary title since nobody else in the world plays American football. But that's the way it is with freedom. Football games can command 100 million TV viewers, assume arbitrary sovereignty, charge $550,000 for one minute of commercial time, and even turn a people city like Noo Awlins into shoulder to shoulder congestion, and I'm not talking about Hayes vs. Carmichael.

America had a celebration here Sunday.

Maybe the entire country didn't attend, but a pretty good cross-section did. Lots of fans from California out West and Philadelphia out East, and politicans and celebrities and media types from every state in the union. No consensus of opinion on who should or would win. No made-by-the-state teams. Good old American hatred between the people wearing green T-shirts and those who drove all the way from Sacramento in five-to-the-gallon Winnebagos with "Go Raiders" scribbled on the white sidewalls.

It was one beautiful sight Sunday—not the game, the people. Seventy thousand visitors in New Orleans, booking every single one of the 22,000 hotel rooms, eating in every single one of the 2,500 restaurants (although Pascal Mansle's got more than its fair share and they say it was worth the wait) and using a football game for an excuse to have a good time while pumping something like 350 million into a grateful New Orleans economy.

I saw America the Beautiful Sunday in New Orleans, and America the Free and America the Spirited. I walked the French Quarter before going to the game in the Superdome at 5 p.m. I wish you'd been there. For some reason, nature saw fit to bestow a windless 72 degree day for ex-hostage Sunday. The aforementioned 70,000 visitors all were outdoors.

There were smiles everywhere—if it is only imaginary that these smiles reflected a relief the Iran captives are back home then tolerate the fact—and Philadelphians clearly outnumbered all others, including, I should think, Louisianans, Philadelphians in green, spelling out E-A-G-L-E-S as they walked in bunches, wearing "Raider Haters" on their hats.

In front of the Old Absinthe House—Where Mark Twain and Jefferson Davis relaxed once upon a time while traveling between books or wars—was a group of high school cheerleaders from Illinois leading cheers for either side, upon request. Further down was a black kid doing a tap dance routine putting anything Shirley Temple ever did to absolute shame. As a capitalist, he was in sharp contrast to the scalper on the corner, waving four tickets to the approaching game and asking $74 apiece. All the while, the dancer kept tapping, and his hat on the pavement kept collecting dollars. In no time, he had enough to get into the game.

In the crowds they all rubbed elbows, blacks and whites and browns and an Arab wearing a ghoutra, and on the street were white Cadillac limos in front of the Montelone Hotel waiting to take VIPs to the game, the cars all decked out with yellow ribbons knotted around their hood ornaments, welcoming 62 Americans back to the land of the free.

In Jackson Square artists were doing portraits in chalk for $20 and on the promenade overlooking the Mississippi a bugler was playing "I Left My Heart in San Francisco" for the Californians, "Philadelphia Freedom" for the Pennsylvanians and "Cryin' the Blues" for those who would lose.

Then, at the Superdome, an 80-foot yellow bow tie on the front and 30,000 yellow bows passed out to the spactators—all this giving way to a noisy, cheering crowd that rose with Helen O'Connell to sing the national anthem and—wait for this—most of them singing with her.

A party and a day for America and Americans, all going their different directions, all free to choose which way they'd cheer, or if they'd cheer at all; or if they'd do like a lot of writers did here earlier in the week—decry the Super Bowl as overrated, as an event that doesn't deserve such national adoration and status, as a sign of the times that America's values are out of touch when so much is made of 22 grown men dressing up in padding and attempting to stop each other from delivering an oblong ball across a goal line.

But for the life of me I could see nothing wrong with the fuss. Getting excited about a couple of free enterprise teams that made it to the top isn't such a bad kind of adoration.

Sure, the Super Bowl is just a game. And there are poverty problems to worry about, and inflation, and worries about oil and rising crime rates and not having enough wilderness area in the Sierra Nevadas. But nobody's forced to go, and forced to enjoy himself, either. It is a game that once a year draws—pardon me—super attention to our free way of life.

Especially this year.

TOM VALLELY—A FIGHTER FOR MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, yesterday, one of my closest friends, Massachusetts State Representative Tom Vallely, gave up his quest to become the next Congressman from the Eighth District in Massachusetts, the seat now held by the Speaker of the House.

There are many other fine candidates left in the race, and I have no doubt the Eighth District will be well-represented by one of them. But with Tom's withdrawal from the race, Massachusetts has, for at least the time being, lost a great candidate for Congress.

Tom Vallely and I go back a long way. Both of us fought in Vietnam, where Tom won a Silver Star for courage. Both of us came back from the war and fought to end it. Tom and I fought for veterans' rights together. We've been through many campaigns together. And for many many years now, Tom has been one of my best friends, through good times and bad.

I have seen Tom's loyalty and courage on so many occasions, and it would have been wonderful for the people who live in the Eighth to have Tom down in Washington fighting for the things he believes in. Tom is tough. He has compassion. He is a fighter. He gets things done. And he sets his own agenda.

It was no accident that Tom Vallely got a gay rights bill through the Massachusetts House and secured enactment of agent orange legislation to find out more about what happened to men exposed to dioxin in Vietnam. Tom turned commitment into legislation throughout his career in the State house, and he will do it again in the future.

Yesterday, Tom recognized that he didn't have the name recognition to compete in the Eighth Congressional District, and he has withdrawn from the race, characteristically, because as the Boston Globe put it, "he didn't feel comfortable asking supporters and potential supporters for so much when the odds were so long."

I have no doubt that Tom will find an important place in the government of our State and our Nation in any case. Tom Vallely may never be on the cover of People magazine—he may never get 100 percent on any lobbyist's list of who voted right on their particular special interest. What Tom has instead is both commonsense and an extraordinary amount of personal and political courage, and those are traits that will continue to serve Tom and Massachusetts well.

In today's Boston Globe, columnist Robert L. Turner wrote a column that captured a lot of Tom Vallely's strengths, called "Bowing Out With Candor." I ask unanimous consent that this column appear in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the column was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOWING OUT WITH CANDOR

Candor has always been Tom Vallely's hallmark.

It is not a quality overflowing from most politicians, and Vallely enjoys surprising people with it—to a fault, sometimes.

When he announced for Congress on Jan. 16, he refused to make hairbreadth distinctions between the way he had divested investments in companies doing business in South Africa and the way Joe Kennedy had. "It's about the same," he said.

Vallely ended his candidacy yesterday with the same candor with which he had begun it.

He said he felt he couldn't win—that his low visibility in a large field prevented him from becoming a contender. And "I'm a little out of step," he said. "I have an inability to take things that are very complicated and make them simple."

This is vintage Vallely. He was a liberal in a liberal district, but he refused again and again to recite the liberal creed.

He was for cutting the Pentagon budget, but not with mindless, across-the-board slashes. He opposed most of the new weapons systems sought by President Reagan, but he said certain systems would improve deterrence and help prevent war. He backed organized labor 90 percent of the time, but not the 100 percent frequently demanded by liberal litmus tests.

He was forever making distinctions that he thought were important, that went to the heart of real policy questions, but that got lost in the hubbub from a dozen candidates.

This doesn't mean that Vallely was always right. His was not the quickest mind in the field—that probably belongs to Sen. George Bachrach—or his philosophy the most coherent—that is probably Rep. Tom Gallagher's.

But Vallely has a restless, inquisitive manner that is skeptical of the accepted wisdom, that is always pushing wider and deeper, looking for the real causes of problems and for real solutions, not for slogans.

Taped over the desk of press aide Carter Wilkie in Vallely's Somerville headquarters yesterday was a picture of Mark Twain with the quotation: "Loyalty to petrified opinion never yet broke a chain or freed a human soul."

That quality will be badly missed in this campaign.

Does Vallely's departure mean that Kennedy's election is inevitable? Not necessarily. Any reduction in the size of the field creates a better chance that someone will be able to engage Kennedy head-on.

But some people felt that Vallely, with his independent thinking, his background as a Vietnam veteran, his money, his expert support and his energy, stood the best chance of beating Kennedy if he could only become a contender.

No one suggested that Vallely's action yesterday was a failure of courage. This has never been a question. Not when he was a Marine in Vietnam, not when he was an antiwar veteran in Washington and not in his six years in the Massachusetts House.

Vallely didn't think twice about opposing organized labor on the prevailing-wage law or the antinuclear purists on nuclear strategy. He was virtually the only white elected official in Boston to support Mel King versus Ray Flynn in the 1983 mayoral election.

When Albert O'Niel, the blunt instrument of this congressional campaign, questioned him on busing recently, Vallely was eloquent in its defense.

And the enormous heart Vallely showed in support of his friend John Kerry in the final two weeks of Kerry's successful campaign for the Senate two years ago was only what would be expected from him.

Indeed, one of the chief reasons for Vallely's departure was his reluctance to ask of his supporters what he was only too willing to give himself.

He felt his candidacy stood for something, especially for a Vietnam legacy he cared about deeply, and he didn't want to see that embarrassed by the poor showing he felt his candidacy was almost inevitably headed toward.

He didn't feel comfortable asking supporters and potential supporters for so much when the odds were so long.

In the end, he was candid with himself. "And I couldn't lie to them," he said.

THE SIX AMERICAN HOSTAGES IN BEIRUT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, this Sunday, March 16, has been declared "Terry Anderson Day" by the New York State Assembly. Terry Anderson is one of the six American hostages being held in Beirut. To commemorate this day, as well as the first anniversary of Terry Anderson's kidnapping and the second anniversary of William Buckley's disappearance, families of the hostages plan to gather before the White House this Sunday. I support this effort, and am pleased to bring it to the attention of my colleagues.

I do not think it necessary to remind my colleagues that six Americans continue to be held hostage in Beirut. Yet I would like to let the families of the hostages, and perhaps the hostages themselves, know that their fate has not been lost in the smoke of more recent terrorist actions. Their names: William Buckley, political officer at the U.S. Embassy in Beirut, kidnaped on March 16, 1984; Peter Kilburn, a librarian at the American University, believed to have been kidnaped on December 3, 1984; the Reverend Lawrence Jenco, the head of Catholic Relief Services in Lebanon when he was kidnaped on January 8, 1985; Terry A. Anderson, chief Middle East correspondent for the Associated Press, abducted March 16, 1985; David P. Jacobsen, director of the American University Hospital, kidnaped on May 28, 1985; and Thomas M. Sutherland, dean of the agriculture department at the American University in Beirut when he was kidnaped on June 9, 1985.

I cannot excape two observations. first, these are honorable men, who were following honorable pursuits when they were kidnaped. Second, these men have been held for a long time, in William Buckley's case as long as 24 months.

The Department of State is in contact with certain governments in the area, including the Syrians, as well as various factions in Beirut. Vice President BUSH and other members of the administration have also met with Special Envoy Terry Waite, a representative of the Archibishop of Canterbury and an experienced hostage negotiator who has already made two trips to Lebanon. Mr. Waite has been in touch with the faction which is said to hold the hostages, although he has not yet been able to meet with any of them. The State Department operates on the assumption that all six hostages are still alive. And well they should. My colleague across the aisle can tell you a bit about how long the human spirit can survive in captivity.

Secretary Shultz knows well the urgency of this matter. But to the hostages, I say "You are not forgotten." When I was U.S. Representative to the United Nations, the United States introduced a resolution calling for a world-wide amnesty for political prisoners. This resolution was greeted with considerable skepticism, and in any event, was soon amended beyond recognition such that we withdrew it from consideration. But I have not forgotten the comments of a young German reporter at the time: "Word of this resolution will be in every jail cell in Eastern Europe tonight," he said. "I know. Because I was in one of those cells."

Mr. President, our American hostages in Beirut, and their families who wait, are not forgotten. I hope they know this.

DEPUTY DIRECTOR OF CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE JOHN N. McMAHON

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to salute a public servant. On March 4 the President accepted the resignation of John N. McMahon as Deputy Director of Central Intelligence. His resignation is effective March 29.

Mr. McMahon joined the Central Intelligence Agency in September 1951, and for the next 34 years rose in the ranks until he became principal deputy to the Director of Central Intelligence. Previous to that he served successful tours as Executive Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, Deputy Director for National Foreign Assessment—now Directorate of Intelligence, and Deputy Director of the CIA for Operations. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. McMahon's distinguished biography be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the biography was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BIOGRAPHY OF JOHN N. MCMAHON

John N. McMahon was sworn in as Deputy Director of Central Intelligence on June 10, 1982. In this position he is principal deputy to the Director, who heads the Intelligence Community (all of the foreign intelligence agencies of the United States) and directs the Central Intelligence Agency. A career CIA employee, Mr. McMahon has served in senior positions in all of the Agency's four Directorates.

Mr. McMahon graduated from Holy Cross in 1951; in September he joined the Central Intelligence Agency and was assigned overseas in June 1952. He returned in 1957 for basic training with the U.S. Army. In 1959 Mr. McMahon was assigned to the U-2 program. In 1965 he was appointed Deputy Director for CIA's reconnaissance R&D. In July 1971 he was named Director, Office of Electronic Intelligence and later, Director of the Office of Technical Service. On August 3, 1974 Mr. McMahon was appointed Associate Deputy Director of CIA for Administration, and on May 10, 1976 was named Associate Deputy to the DCI for the Intelligence Community. He was appointed Deputy Director of CIA for Operations in January 1978 and served in that capacity until April 12, 1981 when he was named Deputy Director for National Foreign Assessment (now Directorate of Intelligence), responsible for directing analysis and production of intelligence. On January 4, 1982 Mr. McMahon was appointed as the Agency's Executive Director, responsible for the day-to-day management of CIA; he remained in this position until his appointment as the Deputy Director of Central Intelligence.

Mr. McMahon holds a Certificate of Distinction awarded by CIA, the Intelligence Medal of Merit, and two Distinguished Intelligence Medals and the Intelligence Distinguished Service Medal.

Mr. McMahon was born on July 3, 1929 in East Norwalk, Connecticut. He and his wife Margaret have four children.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I was a member of the Select Committee on Intelligence for an 8-year term, March 1977 until January 1985. For the last 4 years of that period I served as vice chairman. As vice chairman I strongly supported Mr. McMahon's appointment in June 1982 as Deputy Director of Central Intelligence, and I know something of John McMahon's unique contribution to responsible intelligence gathering and the security of this Nation. I am sorry to see him depart the intelligence community.

To borrow from the British military historian, Michael Howard, the trouble with praising those in this community is of course that when honor is really due, few among us knows anything about it, or I might add, should know anything about it. Such is the case with John McMahon. But I will tell you this. John McMahon is a man of exceptional integrity and loyalty. He has been called the conscience of the Central Intelligence Agency. This penchant for the truth allowed us on the Committee on Intelligence to ensure effective oversight of the intelligence community without compromising the Nation's secrets. And he did this, as well, without violating his loyalty to the Agency he served with devotion and distinction.

CONCLUSION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, has morning business expired?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is now closed.

BALANCED BUDGET CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. DOLE. The pending business is what?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now resume consideration of the unfinished business, Senate Joint Resolution 225, which the clerk will now report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S.J. Res. 225) proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to a Federal balanced budget.

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution.

Pending:

(1) Thurmond Amendment No. 1652, in the nature of a substitute.

(2) Hatch Amendment No. 1665 (to Amendment No. 1652), to prohibit borrowing on the credit of the United States unless three-fifths of both Houses of Congress approve a waiver.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I would hope that we could complete action on the amendment that will be offered by the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG], and then satisfy the concerns raised by my distinguished colleague from Alabama, Senator HEFLIN, and do all that and then agree that we will go to third reading and have the final vote on the constitutional balanced budget amendment on March 25. And then we hope to move either to the committee funding resolutions or the water resources bill in an effort to complete action on those two matters before midafternoon tomorrow.

I note the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI] is here ready on his side, and I understand the distinguished chairman of the committee, Senator THURMOND, is available. Now we need the Senator from Colorado to offer the amendment.

I know that sometime this morning the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator THURMOND, will ask unanimous consent that his committee may be permitted to meet this afternoon because they were scheduled to meet at 10 a.m. this morning and because of the pending business were unable to do so. But the Senator from South Carolina will make that request. I know we had indicated last evening to the minority leader that that would be forthcoming.

Mr. President, again I would urge those who have amendments to come to the floor. We do want to complete action on this matter this morning. I would indicate that yesterday during the entire day we only had about 7 minutes of quorum calls. This is the second day of live radio coverage and we do not want to have any more than 7 minutes today.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. DOLE. I would be happy to yield the floor.

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I have now been handed a proposed new amendment. The heading on it is "New Armstrong Language." I do not know who is going to offer this amendment, but I am going to read it into the RECORD because I think that it is a serious proposition to be amending the Constitution of the United States. I do not believe we ought to be doing it off the top of our head or by somebody strolling on the floor and casually laying down a new amendment. But I will read how section 1 of the proposed constitutional amendment would read if this language were accepted. First of all, it would strike out whatever was offered last night. It does not say so here, but obviously it would have to strike out what was offered last night by Senator ARMSTRONG and Senator HATCH, and section 1, if this new language were adopted, would read as follows:

Total outlays of the United States for any fiscal year shall not exceed total receipts to the United States for that year unless three-fifths of the whole number of both Houses of Congress shall provide by law for a specific excess of outlays over receipts. The public debt of the United States shall not be increased to fund any excess of outlays over receipts for any fiscal year unless three-fifths of the whole number of both Houses of Congress shall provide by law for such an increase.

The language offered by the two Senators last night, notably Mr. HATCH and Mr. ARMSTRONG, has been stricken and the phrase "by law" is added in the first sentence of this section. The second sentence of the section that I just read, beginning with "the public debt of the United States," et cetera, is entirely new language.

Now, I would say that, if this becomes what we vote on, the Armstrong-Hatch amendment, it is in much better form than it was last night because it does narrow it down in the new language to clearly identify that what is being proposed here for a supermajority vote in both Houses of Congress is the public debt itself. And that was not very clear.

I do not think it could have been interpreted from the language earlier submitted that they were just referring to the public debt. I find it in better form now than it was last night. I would encourage Senators to review it very carefully before we have a vote on it. There may be more bugs in it than what I have perceived.

Mr. DECONCINI. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MELCHER. Yes; I will be delighted to yield to my friend from Arizona.

Mr. DECONCINI. I just wanted to inform the Senator that the consideration in this language that was worked out somewhat last night was to take into consideration the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Alabama and others who were concerned about the credit of the United States. And I do not think there is any great authorship pride here, but it was the feeling that this really went to the point that the Senator from Montana raised last night, or at least questioned.

He advised us I think that he would have to vote against this amendment because of the uncertainty that it might relate to some of the agriculture programs and this was the best judgment that we could come up with last night.

I welcome some changes on it, but I wonder if it does not really go to some, to the deep concerns that the Senator from Montana expressed last evening.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank my friend from Arizona. That is correct, it does go to some of the uncertainty that was presented by the language last night. The second sentence, "The public debt of the United States shall not be increased," is easily understood and is clear. It does not get embroiled in whether or not the Commodity Credit Corporation is involved or, on the other hand, what other Senators were talking about, whether guaranteed loans were being involved.

Mr. MELCHER. To be specific, it says "public debt of the United States."

While it may have been the primary intention of the authors of last night's amendment, I think they went far beyond that scope, in a far-ranging way that is as yet unplumbed and really not charted. I do not know whether we knew how far we were reaching last night. I think this clearly does express the concern of those who have interest in requiring a three-fifths vote of both Houses of Congress on increasing the public debt. It goes directly to that point.

Mr. DECONCINI. I thank the Senator. I thank the Senator also for bringing it up.

As was expressed last evening, it was not the intent to jeopardize the guaranteed programs as such. I hope this puts to rest some of the concern the Senator from Montana has.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, while Senator MELCHER is on the floor, and because I was involved in this matter last night, I should like to comment on the point he raised.

The new language is intended to clarify that it is subject to the debt limit and not individual obligations. However, the concerns he raised are still very real, and I want to explain why the concerns that he and others raised last night go to the basic heart of this amendment.

The amendment is fundamentally flawed in part because it may reach indirectly those very crop loans he was talking about last night and the guaranteed loans for students, which the Government guarantees. They are still within the reach of this new language.

This amendment has not been cured; it has been clarified. It is still fatefully flawed. It cannot be cured by further amendment. It can only be cured now by being defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please be in order. The Senator from Michigan cannot be heard.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may proceed.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, the issue is this: Do we wish to make it harder to pay the legal obligations, the bills, of the U.S. Government, whether those obligations are CCC loans or deficiency payments or obligations to banks that have lent their money to students based on the Government's promise to pay in the event of default? Do we wish to make it harder to pay our legal obligations? They may be obligations to people who mail our Social Security checks, who work for the Government. Indeed, these obligations may be bills for goods that the Government has purchased.

The issue we are going to vote on in this new language is whether to make it more difficult for the United States to honor its obligations. The issue is whether the full faith and credit of the United States shall have a question mark after it instead of an exclamation point.

It is an altogether different thing to make it harder to incur obligations. That is an important goal, and reasonable people can differ on whether the advantages of putting constitutional limits on that outweigh the dangers of doing so. But it is fundamentally different and simply wrong to make it harder to pay our legal obligations, and that is what this amendment more clearly does, and that is why it should be defeated. Those obligations, I emphasize, could be those CCC loans. They could be loans to students which have been guaranteed by the Government. They could be any number of things.

The language makes it clearer that we are no longer focusing on those, so the language is clearer, but those obligations of the Government, very clearly, can still be caught by this language.

Mr. President, the new language makes it clearer that Government guaranteed loans and farmers' crop loans are not treated differently from other obligations of the United States. It is clearer now that they are all in the same leaky boat.

It is clearer now that it is not intended that the bills for those loans or obligations be treated differently from other incurred obligations. They will all be placed in doubt, in the event the debt limit might have to be raised. It could take only 41 of us instead of a majority to stop those bills from being paid, if those are the bills that the Secretary of the Treasury puts at the bottom of the pile.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. LEVIN. I yield.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I want to express to my friend from Michigan that I thoroughly agree with his analysis of the proposed new language. I think his analysis is entirely correct.

I also want to express to my friend from Michigan that I agree with his premise and his logic of voting against this amendment. I still will oppose the amendment. I think the new language will verify what the amendment seeks to do, but I believe it is a threshold that we do not want to raise by constitutional law.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank my friend. I appreciate that comment very much.

Since I was involved in this discussion last night, I thought it was important to emphasize here that this amendment is clearly and fundamentally wrong, even though it is clearer. The language was being revised to meet this concern which the Senator from Montana had raised, but I am still very much opposed to this amendment.

Mr. President, it is going to be argued that the only other way to enforce the rest of this constitutional provision is with this new language. That is not even accurate, because the sponsors of this provision, in their committee report, said that the spirit of the constitutional amendment would not be violated by a de minimis excess of outlays over receipts even to the extent of a $10 billion excess. Let us say that the outlays are $5 billion over receipts for 1 year and there is an effort to raise the debt limit to accommodate it. Again, we are talking about legal obligations already incurred, not future spending. The issue is obligations which this Government has already incurred.

The sponsors of this amendment said that that $5 billion de minimis excess is within the spirit of the constitutional amendment, that there is no violation of the spirit of the amendment; yet, under this amendment, the revised language or the old language, 41 Members could stop the debt ceiling from being increased to pay for those obligations that were incurred by the U.S. Government.

So, Mr. President, the language change clarifies the intent, and it is now easier to see why it is so clearly wrong in its approach. While I am glad that intent has been clarified—as I understand, it is going to be—and I thank the sponsors of the amendment for doing that, I will not be offering my amendment, because my amendment cannot cure this amendment. This amendment can be cured now only by being defeated.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I assure my colleagues that we are trying to accommodate all of them.

I ask unanimous consent that the amendment (No. 1665) be withdrawn.

AMENDMENT NO. 1668

(Purpose: To prohibit borrowing on the credit of the United States unless three-fifths of both Houses of Congress approve a waiver)

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH] for Mr. THURMOND and himself, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. SIMON, Mr. ARMSTRONG, Mr. BOREN, Mr. GRAMM, and Mr. WILSON, proposes an amendment numbered 1668.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. DECONCINI. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 12, insert after "receipts." the following:

"The public debt of the United States shall not be increased to fund any excess of outlays over receipts for any fiscal year, unless three-fifths of both Houses of Congress shall provide, by law, for such an increase.".

Mr. HATCH. It should be "three-fifths of the whole number of both Houses of Congress shall provide, by law * * *."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment. The amendment is so modified.

The modified amendment reads as follows:

On page 1, line 12, insert after "receipts." the following:

"The public debt of the United States shall not be increased to fund any excess of outlays over receipts for any fiscal year, unless three-fifths of the whole number of both houses of Congress shall provide, by law, for such an increase.".

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not understand the modification that was sent to the desk.

Mr. HATCH. The clerk misread what was sent to the desk. The language added will be:

"The public debt of the United States shall not be increased to fund any excess of outlays over receipts for any fiscal year, unless three-fifths of the whole number of both houses of Congress shall provide, by law, for such an increase.".

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, if I could just for a moment, if the Senator from Utah will yield——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Just a moment, please. The Senator from Alabama was asking a question. Has the Senator finished his question?

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to clarify. Section 1 of this amendment will now read as follows:

Total outlays of the United States for any fiscal year shall not exceed total receipts to the United States for that year, unless three-fifths of the whole number of both Houses of Congress shall provide for a specific excess of outlays over receipts.

"The public debt of the United States shall not be increased to fund any excess of outlays over receipts for any fiscal year, unless three-fifths of the whole number of both houses of Congress shall provide, by law, for such an increase.".

That is the way section 1 will read, is that right?

Mr. HATCH. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. HEFLIN. This makes a distinction between the three-fifths vote pertaining to the specific excess of outlays over receipts and the public debt increase. The public debt increase, while requiring three-fifths of the whole number of both Houses of Congress to approve it, by law, and the words "by law" being added thereto, as I understand it, means presentment to the President, where the President has the right to veto or has the right to sign. If the President vetoes the bill it will be returned to Congress for action to possibly override the veto.

As I understand it, regarding the specific excess of outlays over receipts in the first sentence, there is no requirement that Congress by three-fifths vote do this "by law." Therefore, I interpret this to mean that the first sentence which has the requirement of the three-fifths vote to provide for a specific excess of outlays over receipts does not include presentment to the President and, therefore, the issue of whether the President signs or vetoes will not arise.

I just want everyone to understand. Is this interpretation correct? If it is incorrect, I would like to have it corrected. I am seeking to have uniformity of interpretation concerning the three-fifths vote and presentment to the President. And there have been some differences of opinion.

Mr. HATCH. I think my friend raises an important issue.

Article I, section 7, of the Constitution requires all bills to be presented to the President for his action, as the distinguished Senator has pointed out. It has been the intent of the authors of Senate Joint Resolution 225 to require presentment of any bill authorizing raising the debt under our "safety valve" provision. This is accomplished by the addition of the words "by law" to the three-fifths clauses in section 1. These words "by law" are not incorporated in the first sentence of section 1 to permit Congress to decide whether a bill or resolution shall be approved by three-fifths to authorize in excess of outlays over receipts. Even if Congress uses a resolution, a subsequent appropriations bill will usually, and I think in all cases, be required to authorize the outlays excess. That, of course, would involve the President.

So in the ultimate conclusion of this, the President would be involved and would have the right to sign or veto, and we would have the right to override any particular veto.

I think the Senator has done a service to this body and to this discussion by raising this issue and I think making it clear just where we are going in this matter.

I yield to the distinguished Senator from Illinois for the purpose of making a comment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Let me reply to the distinguished Senator from Utah before the Senator from Illinois begins.

The appropriation process which will follow, as the distinguished Senator from Utah said, would not involve a three-fifths vote regarding appropriating that excess of the outlays over receipts but it would involve a majority of those present and voting and would involve the presentment of the President and his right to sign or veto.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator is absolutely correct.

I think that is an important point to make and he has made it and made it eloquently.

Mr. HEFLIN. But in increasing the public debt of the United States, since the world "by law" was used the President would be involved, there would be presentment to the President, the President would either sign or veto.

Mr. HATCH. That is correct. These things will happen simultaneously and the Senator is correct, and I think the record is well made.

Mr. SIMON. If I can just add, and I thank my colleague for yielding, that is the four of us, THURMOND, DECONCINI, HATCH, and I, have been discussing that this morning, as the Senator from Alabama knows, with him. That is our unanimous interpretation. It is clear, that is our intent, and I think the Senator from Alabama has helped to make crystal clear what we want to do in this regard.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the distinguished Senator from South Carolina agree with that?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I commend the able Senator from Alabama for raising these points and expressing himself on them and clarifying the subject for the RECORD.

I do agree with what the distinguished Senator from Alabama said and with the interpretation that he has placed upon it.

Mr. HATCH. I personally thank the distinguished Senator from Alabama as well. I think this has been a fruitful discussion, and certainly I hope the work all of us have done into the evening last night and not finishing until probably after 11 o'clock—I did not leave until 11:15—has been fruitful.

Mr. HEFLIN. I see the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG] present. I want to be sure that he understands that and has no objection to this modification since it is really his amendment.

The amendment as it is would require the public debt to have a three-fifths of the whole number of each House by law, but the deficit statement or wherever the approval of the specific excess of outlays over receipts requires a three-fifths vote, but no presentment to the President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Alabama so the Senator from Alabama may pose a question to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HATCH. I yield, without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I thank the Senator from Utah.

If the Senator from Alabama will yield, I will be glad to respond. First, I would like to say publicly something that I said privately to the Senator from Alabama. I really think the contribution which the Senator from Alabama made to this discussion yesterday was enormously valuable because he brought into focus this presentment question which had never really been understood by most Senators.

I will have to admit it had never crossed my mind at any stage of the game that the question of the President's signature was in doubt. I think he has done us a very valuable service.

My own preference, let me say to the Senator from Alabama, is that the President be required to sign any of the documents that are referred to herein; in other words, I would rather that the whole thing was subject to presentment.

It is my understanding that in sifting this through and trying to sort of find the golden mean, what is the most satisfactory to the largest number of Senators, the resolution under the leadership of the Senator from Utah, it is that the first part, that is the three-fifths vote to establish an excess of outlays over receipts, would not necessarily require presentment, but that an increase in the debt limit would be by law, and, therefore, by definition would require presentment.

I personally would be more comfortable if the whole thing went to the White House, but I believe there is a point at which we have to arrive at an accommodation. While it is not entirely to my liking, I think it is serviceable.

In fact, Mr. President, while I am on my feet, let me just say this: This has been referred to a few times as the Armstrong amendment. It really is not the Armstrong amendment. Senator BOREN and I raised a question about the debt limit and about the need to have a three-fifths majority and it was a concern of ours, but the Senator from Utah, the Senator from South Carolina, the Senator from Illinois, the Senator from Arizona, the Senator from Alabama, and others, have been just as interested, and the final formulation of it was worked out last night by a number of Senators and members of their staffs.

While this is not exactly the way I would have written it, I think it is serviceable. I think it will serve its intended purpose and I think it is good, and I say let us go with it.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Colorado. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks of the Senator from Colorado. I agree with him, I would prefer presentment, but I am not going to stand in the way. I think we need the constitutional amendment.

I might say this: After the public debt reaches a point and that you have an excess in the future, and you only have an increase whenever there is an excess of outlays over receipts, you will then have two steps: one step, an authorization of a specific sum to have an excess of outlays over receipts, and then you will have the second step of raising of the public debt. So, in effect, they are both tied together and, in effect, the presentment to the President will occur when raising the public debt and the President would participate.

I assume that the orderly fashion of doing this might be a resolution providing for the specific excess of outlays over receipts and raising the debt limit at the same time, and sent to the President. It probably will be done separately, but it could be done jointly. One would be superfluous because the President would be required to sign it.

But I think, from a practical viewpoint, we are quibbling over something that, in the long run, the difference will not be important.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Alabama for his comments on this.

Let me just take a few moments to comment on the amendment itself. This is an amendment by Thurmond, Hatch, DeConcini, Simon, Armstrong, Boren, and Gramm. I personally wish to express my appreciation to the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee for the fight he has waged for this balanced-budget amendment every single year of his tenure in the Senate. Without him, it would not even be on the floor. I just want everybody to know that.

I also want everybody to know who are listening on the radio that this is probably the last time a balanced-budget constitutional amendment will be brought to the Senate within the next number of years. So this is the time to enact it if we are going to do so. I suspect that, as all constitutional amendments are, it is very difficult to enact because it takes a two-thirds vote in both Houses of Congress. This is a very hard-fought matter and I hope our citizens out there will bring this to the attention of their Senators, whichever side they are on. If you want a balanced-budget amendment, then you had better start talking to your Senators now because there are a number who are not going to vote for this, even though they feel we should balance the budget, many of them. If you are against it, then talk to your Senators about that. But I hope that the citizens of this country would play a significant role, because there will be a 2-week delay here and that vote will be a very, very important vote.

This amendment might be adequately described as the "safety valve" amendment. Section 1 of Senate Joint Resolution 225 already states outright that "total outlays . . . shall not exceed total receipts" Without the three-fifths authorization of a specific excess of outlays over receipts. This means Congress and the President would be obligated to ensure that no deficit ever occur in the absence of a three-fifths authorization. Since the third branch would have no ability to order the legislative and executive to meet this obligation, this provision is intended to serve as a safety valve. It will require a three-fifths vote to increase the public debt to fund a deficit. This additional provision will increase the pressure to comply with the mandate of this proposed constitutional amendment, and this puts more teeth into this constitutional amendment.

Last evening, a version of this amendment was perceived to have created some ambiguities about loans and borrowing under the FHA, CCC, student loan, and other Federal lending and financing programs. This change in language is intended to clarify our intent to limit the effect of this amendment to increases in the public debt necessary to fund a deficit for any fiscal year. It does not cover borrowing within our during a fiscal year by FHA, CCC, or any other entity of the Federal Government or the Treasury itself. These entities are not restricted by this language at all. As with current law, these entities would only be affected if Congress elected to make alterations in those programs. If these entities needed to borrow or seek further appropriations to fund their obligations, those borrowing or appropriation activities would be counted as outlays under the aggregates of this amendment. But the effect of these agencies on the budget aggregates is accounted just as any other program's effect on the aggregates. No single program would ever be responsible for creating a deficit. Accordingly, the actions of this amendment will not affect any single program. Congress will determine what is necessary to comply with this amendment in the event that there is any need to make alterations in Federal programs or taxes to comply with the balanced budget norm.

In other words, Congress may, from time to time, have to choose among competing priorities, but at least Congress has that right to choose and no particular program is in danger.

To repeat, this new language is intended to clarify that increases in the public debt are only subject to three-fifths approval if those increases are funding an excess of outlays over receipts in budget aggregates.

This language is also meant to clarify that borrowing during or within a fiscal year to deal with fluctations in the rate receipts are collected or outlays are disbursed. This only clarifies that if the public debt must ever be increased—most likely by increasing the statutory public debt limit—to accommodate a budget deficit for a fiscal year, that increase must occur by a three-fifths margin in a bill that is submitted to the President.

This will provide a safety valve in the form of a second three-fifths vote in the event that Congress and the President are ever in danger of creating an excess of outlays over receipts. It will thus ensure that public debt limits act to make the norm of a balanced budget work.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, first of all, I wish to commend Senator HATCH and all those who had anything to do with drafting this revision which clearly gets us out of some problems that were called to our attention by the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Montana and others. I think this is better language.

I do want to comment just briefly on the comments of my good friend from Michigan, for whom I have the greatest respect, on the guarantees of this Government. When we guarantee a loan, that guarantee is still going to be good. What this constitutional amendment means is we are going to be a little more careful in starting to move into guaranteeing things. And that caution is, frankly, needed.

There is no question, if this amendment is adopted, that the guarantees of the Federal Government are just as good, just as strong and, in fact, perhaps a little better than they were before because we are going to be in better fiscal shape. Those guarantees mean a little more from an institution that is in sounder shape.

And let me tell you, without an amendment like this or something along this line, we are headed for real trouble.

So I again commend my colleague. I hope that the Senate will adopt this amendment at this point, and come March 25, we will move decisively in support of the constitutional amendment.

Mr. LEVIN. Will my friend from Illinois yield?

Mr. SIMON. I yield to my colleague from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank my friend from Illinois for his comments.

I could not agree with him more—that we need caution in incurring obligations. I happened to have voted for the Gramm-Rudman amendment, by the way, because I think we should show some restraint. I think it is long overdue in this country, and in this Government. There can be a good faith difference, I believe, in the value of this constitutional amendment in terms of trying to give us some restraint in terms of incurring future obligations.

Reasonable people can differ on this. I happen to oppose the amendment because I think it is dangerous in many ways. I think the advantages of the restraint are outweighed by the danger when you give to the minority for instance in the Congress the right to determine whether or not we are going to go into deficit financing to get out of a recession. Reasonable people can differ on that. My friend from Illinois and I differ on that. I would like to think we are both reasonable people.

The point on this amendment however is whether we pay the bills we have incurred. That is the issue—whether we are going to make it tougher to pay our bill, not whether we are going to make it tougher to pass programs. That should be tougher. I am all in favor of that. I am in favor of restraint in terms of what new obligations you incur. That is long overdue—that restraint.

But the issue on this amendment is whether we make it harder to pay the bills we have already incurred with people who have provided services to the U.S. Government, or people who have relied on the full faith and credit of the U.S. Government. That is the issue here.

The issue is not the future. The issue is the obligations we have already incurred, and whether we will then make it tougher to raise the debt limit to carry out those obligations.

That to me is a moral issue. I want to reduce this deficit as much as anybody but not this way—not by telling banks or farmers, or whoever, who have provided services or who have worked for the Government, that it will be tougher to raise the debt limit if we had to pay our obligations that we are legally obligated for.

Mr. SIMON. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. LEVIN. I yield for a question. I would be happy to.

Mr. SIMON. I thank him.

My experience in this Congress is that while there is reluctance in moving forward to meet obligations and increase that indebtedness, we do it. I am confident that we will continue. I have never voted against a single measure to increase the debt limit in my 11 years in the Congress.

Mr. LEVIN. Is the Senator saying that we do or we should?

Mr. SIMON. I say that we have been doing it, and we will do it.

Mr. LEVIN. Should we do it?

Mr. SIMON. We should do it.

Mr. LEVIN. If we should do it, why should we make it harder to do it? This amendment makes it harder to do it because it says now it is going to take 61 of us instead of 51 of us to pay our bills. Why does the Senator want to make it harder to do what we should do?

Mr. SIMON. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. LEVIN. I would be happy to yield for a question.

Mr. SIMON. I think we have to make it harder to incur that indebtedness so we are going to be more cautious, and that the Senator wants. I think we are talking about current obligations which we are going to meet. There is no question in my mind about that. If there were any questions, I would not be voting for this, and we are going to be a little more cautious in the future.

Mr. LEVIN. Most of the time we have not gotten three-fifths of the votes to pay our bills.

Mr. SIMON. That is correct.

Mr. LEVIN. Most of the time we have not gotten three-fifths of the votes to pay our bills, folks. It is easy to vote against an increase in the debt ceiling if people can make political points by voting against it. By the way, I have never voted against increasing the debt ceiling either, because I think we ought to pay the bills of this Government. We should not make it harder to pay the bills. We ought to make it harder to incur the debt to begin with. That is the purpose of this constitutional amendment.

May I say while reasonable people can differ over whether the risk of doing it outweighs the advantages of doing it, I do not think we ought to make it harder to pay bills that have been incurred. These are legal obligations of the U.S. Government; legal obligations of the U.S. Government. These could be banks that have lent money to students. It could be crop loans to farmers. We do not know what it will be that will be at the bottom of the pile on the desk of the Treasurer of the United States. But sooner or later we may be in the situation even without violating the other provisions of this constitutional provision——

Mr. DECONCINI. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEVIN. Let me finish. Just 1 moment, and then I would be happy to yield.

We will or may be in the position where we have to vote to increase the debt limit even though we have not violated the spirit of this constitutional amendment. I quote from the committee report:

> The spirit of the amendment would not be violated if, at the close of the fiscal year, a de minimis balance was determined to have occurred. What is de minimis is subject to some interpretation but given present day monitoring abilities and the size of the Federal budget it would be fair to say that a $10 billion imbalance, or roughly 1 percent of the Federal outlays, would not reflect an intent to avoid the purpose of this amendment.

OK, the spirit of the amendment is not violated if we go up to $10 billion over. But we still have to raise the debt limit. We might have to, unless we can get a tax increase voted around here. We might have to vote on it. As a matter of fact, this amendment assumes we might have to vote on a debt limit increase.

Mr. DECONCINI. If the Senator will yield on that point——

Mr. LEVIN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. DECONCINI. On the point made a moment ago, I wonder if the Senator says we have all these obligations here, and we are making it impossible for us perhaps——

Mr. LEVIN. Not impossible, but harder.

Mr. DECONCINI [continuing]. Making it harder for us to pay that bill. But I wonder if the Senator knows that—I do not know, but I know it is very low, but maybe the Senator knows it. How many of these guarantees become defaulted in a year? I will bet it is less than 5 percent of the dollar. It may be down to 1 or 2 percent. So no prudent lender requires that you set aside anticipated losses at 100 percent. You just do not do that. So the Senator is saying that we have to do that because we are going to make it harder to pay those losses if they come about.

Mr. LEVIN. No. I do not think that is my point.

Mr. DECONCINI. A small loss may come about, and we continue, even though it will come about, but assuming there is a small loss, how many——

Mr. LEVIN. I may be misunderstanding my friend. That is not my point. My point is what we are talking about in this pending amendment are the legal obligations of the United States.

Mr. DECONCINI. Guaranteed.

Mr. LEVIN. Could be guaranteed, could be crop loans, could be anything—could be any bill that happens to come across the desk of the Treasurer when there is inadequate funds in the Treasury to pay. He is going to have to pick which bills we will pay with the funds and which ones we will not, unless the debt ceiling is increased. These are legal obligations. They could be student loans from banks; they could be CCC loans. We do not know what they are.

Mr. DECONCINI. Are they not likely to be guaranteed loans? Is that not how we got into this discussion last night?

Mr. LEVIN. Could be.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mostly guaranteed loans, student loans, or CCC loans?

Mr. LEVIN. Could be wages to folks who send out Social Security checks.

Mr. DECONCINI. But to me, if the Senator from Michigan will just pause for a moment, it seems there is a lot of difference whether it is a guaranteed loan that is secured by some value, made to some individual first who has the first call to pay for it, and the Government is the final guarantor, then it is that the Government stands up and makes the loan itself, or the Government makes the cash payment or has agreed on a certain date such as issuing checks that have to be paid to the Federal retirees.

To me there is a big difference here, and the Senator from Michigan with the greatest respect that I have for him, it seems to me is trying to lump them all here, and saying the cash disbursements for retirees is the same as the guarantee on a CCC loan.

I submit to the Senator from Michigan that there is a great difference both as to the default and the ultimate obligation by the U.S. Treasury.

Mr. LEVIN. In both cases they are legal obligations of the United States.

One has the full faith and credit of the United States behind it, but in both instances I think my friend would agree we are talking about the legal obligation of the U.S. Treasury. The U.S. Treasury does not pay anything except the legal obligations of the United States, at least I hope not. I hope the Treasurer is not paying out things we are not obligated to pay.

When my friend from Illinois, who is the prime sponsor of this amendment, says in his usual candid, honest way we should if necessary increase the debt limit to pay our bills, then why in the name of Heaven do we want to make it harder for ourselves to do what we should do?

Maybe we ought to raise taxes to do it. By the way, I have voted at least against tax cuts in this body. So I have been one who has been willing to take the medicine on that issue. Maybe we should do that. We made it a little harder to do that in this amendment, too.

But that is not the issue. We have to face the issue of eyeball to eyeball in this amendment.

The issue here is if that time comes when we must vote to raise the debt limit of the United States—because that is the issue we are voting on—do we then want to make it harder to pay our bills or easier? Harder to keep our commitments or easier?

My friend from Illinois said we should not make those commitments so easily. I could not agree more. I voted for Gramm-Rudman. We are now talking about commitments which have been made. We are not arguing in this particular language whether we should make them. We are talking about whether we pay the bills we have incurred. That is the issue.

Mr. SIMON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEVIN. I am happy to yield for a question.

Mr. SIMON. I thank my colleague for yielding. Let me say that he and I generally vote together. In fact, a recent analysis of voting records shows that I vote more like the Senator from Michigan than any Member of this body. I hope it does not ruin the reputation of the Senator.

Mr. LEVIN. I welcome that, and I hope you can survive that in Illinois, too.

Mr. SIMON. I think the Senator from Colorado has made this very clear. What he wants to do is to put some real teeth into this thing to make sure that we do not in some fashion get around this thing, and I think that is all to the good.

Mr. LEVIN. If I could comment, I will yield the floor in 1 minute.

You are putting teeth into it and that sounds great. The teeth you are putting into it are immoral teeth, they are the wrong teeth. I want to pay our bills. You do not want to tell somebody to whom we owe money, who has provided services to this Government or who has lent money to a student based on the full faith and credit pledged of the U.S. Government, you do not want to tell those people that, "We may or may not pay you," in order to put teeth into a constitutional amendment.

That is not the way to do it. The ends do not justify the means. They do not justify any means around here.

What we are doing is, sure, we are putting teeth into it but we are putting the wrong kinds of teeth. These are bad teeth. These are unfair teeth. These are teeth which are going to bite the wrong people. These are teeth which are going to bite the banker who lent money to the student based on the pledge of the U.S. Government.

In conclusion, let me just say this, that the full faith and credit of the United States used to be followed by an exclamation point. If this amendment is adopted, it will be followed by a questionmark.

I yield the floor.

Mr. ARMSTRONG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Somebody has to have the last word. I think the Senator from Michigan has had it. I share his point of view. I agree with the Senators from Illinois, from Utah, from South Carolina, and from Arizona that this is a good amendment, and I hope it passes. I believe all Senators understand the issue and we are ready to go to a vote.

Mr. HEFLIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the language now changes section 1. I think we have clarified the issue concerning the presentment to the President. We still have the question of the changes that have been brought about by the Domenici amendment and bringing the word "total" into the picture with the word "outlays" and the word "receipts."

I have been trying to figure a method by which we could resolve this and resolve it to where there is uniformity as to the intention, trying to gather a method by which CCC loans, nonrecurring loans, loan guarantees, these offsetting matters and that sort of thing, could be clarified.

I have discussed it with some.

If I can get the attention of everyone, including the Senator from Michigan, I believe if we were to prepare a very detailed colloquy of definitions similar to what is contained in the report language as to how the words "total" and "outlays" apply, what is included, it would be helpful. Obviously, from statements last night by the distinguished Senator from Utah, CCC loans, revolving loans, nonrecourse loans, and loan guarantees are not intended to be within the term "total outlays."

I would think if we could prepare a detailed colloquy similar to the language that is in the definition section of the report in Senate Joint Resolution 225, dealing with outlays and receipts and publish it in advance of March 25 so everybody could review it and look at it, to see if they had any question—and I would particularly like to have the Senator from Montana, Senator MELCHER, who is very knowledgeable on farm matters, farm loans; Senator LEVIN, the Senator from Michigan, who raised these questions, Senator SARBANES, and others, to look at the colloquy—if there are differences as to what they might consider in definitions, we could discuss it and try to reach a uniformity of interpretation as to what is to be included in the term "total outlays" and in the term "total receipts."

I think we could resolve the issue and my reservation about technical amendments, while I would still want to reserve it, the chances are that the colloquy could take care of those technical amendments and we could cure this situation in a matter about which we would have uniformity of legislative history, with no ambiguity.

I think the report language attempted to do that, but I am fearful that the word "total" means all outlays. We have already seen from statements on the floor by the distinguished Senator from Utah that it does not include all outlays. Largely, the definitions that are included in the report language are not be be changed by this.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. I said that it does not include guarantees.

Mr. HEFLIN. What I am saying is that if the staff of the Senator's committee could work on this and come forth with it, publishing it about 2 or 3 days in advance of March 25, allowing for corrections or arguments pertaining to it and then on March 25 prior to the vote have a detailed colloquy, a colloquy in which Senator THURMOND, Senator HATCH, Senator SIMON, Senator DECONCINI all in effect would agree on a uniform interpretation of these terms, it could be helpful.

Mr. THURMOND. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I think we can discuss this matter and reach an agreement on that by the 25th. I suggest that the Senator and some of us get together and work up a colloquy and present it at that time. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to have it published in advance so that people could see it and see exactly what it is and what it means.

Mr. THURMOND. This could be done Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think it ought to be done at least by Friday before the vote on Tuesday.

Mr. THURMOND. I see no objection to that. If the Senator wants to prepare such a colloquy, or we will work with him, I am sure we can agree on a colloquy on that matter.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would suggest that that be done.

While I have the floor, let me make one statement.

The Armstrong amendment, in my judgment, puts teeth into the constitutional amendment. We have had many statutory enactments that say we are going to have a balanced budget. We have a procedure under the constitutional amendment that makes it harder to have an unbalanced budget, to have deficit spending.

You have a procedure here by which, if you have an excess of outlays over receipts—and that means deficit spending during a fiscal year—you must approve that specific amount by a three-fifths vote of the whole membership of both Houses. That in itself is fine, but it is largely directory. It does not have an enforcement procedure. An enforcement procedure is provided by the Armstrong amendment, which is the public debt.

The distinguished Senator from Michigan said it makes it harder to pay our debts. What it does is make it harder for us to vote a deficit. It means that if we do vote a deficit and therefore, we have to increase the public debt, if we fail to increase the public debt, then Government will come to a halt. If we do not increase the public debt, eventually, we run on a balanced budget.

We cannot run on deficit spending. Therefore, it has the intention of making it harder. So I say it is not for the purpose of making it harder to pay our debts, it is to make it harder to go into deficit spending and it gives an enforcement procedure.

I think that the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG] is to be commended—before when this came up and is to be commended now for this. Other than just being directory, it now has some teeth and that is what is so important if we are going to do away with deficit spending and operate so that we do not spend any more money than comes into the Government. That is what we are trying to achieve here. But it does allow for the escape in those instances of depression and those instances of war.

In my judgment, I still think my amendment on undeclared war should have been adopted, but I am not going to fight that again. I say now it has an enforcement procedure in it, a process, a mechanism that is so important, and it is not just words that we could pass by and ignore.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I do not want to prolong this debate, but I want to make this one statement on offsetting receipts.

Yesterday, we adopted an amendment proposed by Senator DOMENICI, distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee, to add the language "total" in front of outlays to underscore the committee report's principle that no particular programs are moved off-budget to escape accountability under Senate Joint Resolution 225. If some categories of Federal spending were not included in "outlays" as defined under this amemdment, the advocates of every category of spending would be tempted to have their pet programs excluded from the constraints of the amendment. Not only would this circumvent the intent of the amendment, it could destroy the Federal budget process as a comprehensive approach to Government spending, receipts, and borrowing. We would have reduced, rather than increased, our fiscal controls.

For that reason, all Federal spending and taxing programs must be included under the constraints of Senate Joint Resolution 225. The addition of the word "total" reinforced this principle by adding language to the proposed amendment to the Constitution.

We hope that makes it clear.

Mr. President, we are prepared to go to a vote.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, before we vote on this amendment, I want to thank the distinguished Senators here—Senator HATCH, Senator SIMON, Senator DECONCINI, Senator HEFLIN, Senator ARMSTRONG, and others who participated, for their excellent work in preparing this excellent amendment. I also want to thank the staff members who worked on this amendment last night and chiefly accomplished this for us:

On my staff, Mr. Joe Buzhardt was most helpful. On Senator HATCH's staff, Mr. Randal Rader was most helpful; on Senator DOLE's staff, Mr. Pieler was most helpful. On Senator DECONCINI's staff, Bob Fiedler was most helpful and on Senator SIMON's staff, Laurie Westley was most helpful. On Senator HEFLIN's staff, Karen Kremer was most helpful.

I just want to pay tribute to these people who worked last night several hours to work this matter out and they did a great job in connection with it.

On Senator ARMSTRONG's staff, I believe Tony Coppolino and Lincoln Oliphant were most helpful.

We want to express to all these people our gratitude for their working with us and trying to bring forth an amendment that we feel could be a consensus and could get adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I understand from the Senator from Utah that there are no exclusions. This puts a different light on it. I had hoped that I could work it out through a colloquy, but it may well be that we will certainly have to consider amendments now on the 25th relative to this matter and we shall have to study what it means.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, are we operating under unanimous consent now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no unanimous consent.

Mr. LEVIN. So there is no limit on later amendments, as my friend from Alabama indicated might be forthcoming?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Amendments to the unamended parts of the resolution would be in order.

Mr. LEVIN. May I understand, just one quick question to my friend from Utah—and perhaps my friend from Alabama can listen to this—that he would be opposed to exempting anything from that word "total" outlays for the reasons that he gave?

Mr. HATCH. I cannot state for the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

Mr. LEVIN. No, Mr. President. I am saying did I hear my friend from Utah correctly that he would oppose exempting anything from that phrase "total outlays" for the reasons he gave?

Mr. HATCH. No, Mr. President, we are talking about outlays. We would be opposed to excluding any literal outlays from the effect of this amendment, that is correct. But they have to be outlays.

Mr. LEVIN. Of course.

If, for instance, loans are involved which would require an outlay to pay it back that made the outlay, that outlay would be included in the language.

Mr. HATCH. If it becomes in default, that becomes an outlay, of course, but only if the loan is in default.

Mr. LEVIN. Those are the only loans we are talking about, those that are in default, because those are the loans the banks are afraid will not be paid so they require payment from the United States. Those are the outlays we are discussing. If I understand my friend from Utah, I think my friend from Alabama is exactly right. He has said he will oppose any exception, any amendment to that word "total" outlays. That is what we are facing right now.

Mr. HATCH. If we do not do that, we are going to provide a mechanism for any Senator to load anything into the amendments.

Guaranteed loans do not represent outlays in the year in which they are guaranteed. The proposed amendment would not preclude the Congress from authorizing such agreements. However, just to make it clear, to the extent that a guaranteed loan is defaulted by the borrower, the outlays would come under the terms of this amendment in the year of the default. It is just that clear.

Irresponsibility in extension of loan guarantees by a prior Congress could cause a successor Congress to face painful budgetary choices—no question about it—just as under current laws. It is the same as current laws. It would be those irresponsibilities that a successor Congress should face explicitly rather than the current practice of automatically shifting the burden to the private sector.

Nothing in the proposed amendment would prevent Congress from adopting constructive procedures for dealing with this aspect of spending. If anything, the amendment itself could be constructive in inducing Congress to adopt long overdue guidelines and procedures for the Federal credit budget.

So this has great meaning, and I think the Senator has done a service in making sure that we have this clarified once and for all. I think it has been cleared up. I do not think there is any question about it. We are just not going to let any loopholes on outlays exist. It is that simple. We want Congress to do what it really needs to do. We have been using every mechanism through the years to get around a balanced budget and to shift things off to other areas. We have used off budget mechanisms. We have used private sector mechanisms. You can go on and on—capital mechanisms. There are other ingenious approaches. I cannot believe the ingenuity of the Members of Congress who want to spend and sometimes that includes everybody, because everybody here wants to spend one way or the other.

What we are trying to do is have a constitutional amendment that will give the taxpayers and the citizens out there a break by giving them a fair game so that Members of Congress have to stand up and do things straight up, and not find loopholes, and not find ways around the law, and not find ways around a constitutional amendment to continue the spending practices that have brought us to a $2 trillion to $3 trillion national debt.

Now, that is what we are trying to do. We think this amendment does it. We think it does it in a legitimate, reasonable, easily enforceable way, and we believe that everybody who understands the budget understands that clearly. I am prepared to vote.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I thank my friend from Utah. I do think that he has been forthright on this issue, but I would want to make it very clear that no colloquy is going to solve the problem of my friend from Alabama, because the colloquy is not going to permit any combination, any modification, any deviation from what the Senator from Utah has said.

Total outlays will include any outlay which is necessary to pay on a defaulted loan. It will include that, and so then the question will come: Are we going to pay loans that this Government has guaranteed or are we going to make it more difficult to pay those loans? Do we really want to make it more difficult to pay our bills? That is the question. Should we ever incur those bills to begin with? I happen to agree with the Senator. I happen to agree where he says we should make it more difficult to incur those bills. But this is the place that we differ and I think where our friend from Alabama has made such a contribution. We ought to pay our obligations once they are incurred, and that is the issue on this amendment, whether we want to make it more difficult for ourselves to do that.

Mechanisms to get us to reduce deficits are fine. I am all for them. But not mechanisms which hit the wrong people, people who provide services, people whose loans have been guaranteed, people who rely on the full faith and credit of the U.S. Government. That is not the mechanism you want to look to. You do not want to threaten people who have provided services to this Government that we are not going to pay the bill for those services. You do not want to threaten farmers who have relied on the law that they are going to get a crop loan. You do not want to threaten those farmers with no loans after they have been assured by law that that loan will in fact be made to them. So you are threatening the legal obligations of the Government, and that is where I think we must draw the line. We should make it harder for ourselves to do that.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEVIN. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. HATCH. We are not doing that at all, no way. The farmer has his loan. The Government has not incurred an outlay expense unless that farmer defaults. When the farmer gets the loan, he knows that he has to live up to the credit.

Mr. LEVIN. I am talking about the bank that makes the loan.

Mr. HATCH. Even so, the bank knows its obligations and it knows why it is making the loan. It knows it is being protected by a U.S. guarantee.

A little bit further. This is just a program.

Mr. LEVIN. Just a what?

Mr. HATCH. A program out of thousands of programs that we fund in the Federal Government.

Mr. LEVIN. But we have to focus on some program.

Mr. HATCH. There is no reason why we cannot resolve the problems. We just have to make the priority choices.

Mr. LEVIN. To answer the question, we have to focus on a program to illustrate the point. The point here is that a bank has made a loan to a farmer based on our promise to repay. Now we are saying that repayment, if that loan is in default——

Mr. HATCH. No.

Mr. LEVIN. If I could just finish—that repayment, if that is the thing which pushes us above the debt limit, if that is the one bill that is at the bottom of the pile on the desk of the Secretary of the Treasury, then it will take 60 of us, three-fifths of us to vote to raise the debt limit to pay that particular bill.

Now, I think we ought to pay that bill. It was a good faith bill by a bank relying on our promise of the full faith and credit of the U.S. Government. So should we use mechanisms to reduce deficits? Your darned right. But those mechanisms must not jeopardize the full faith of this Government and must not put teeth in this at the expense of people who have in good faith provided us services and lent money to people based on our guarantee.

Mr. HATCH. If the Senator will yield——

Mr. SIMON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. If the Senator will yield for just one more comment—and I will be happy to yield to my friend from Illinois—look, if a farmer defaults on a CCC loan or FHA loan or whatever it is and the bank is held responsible and the Government has the guarantee, that may be $100,000, it may be $150,000—I do not know what it is, but it would be a pretty pathetic thing if we Members of Congress cannot resolve it. So it is not the monumental problem that the distinguished Senator has indicated.

Mr. LEVIN. It is a monumental principle.

Mr. HATCH. But as Members of Congress, we will have to make priority choices among competing programs. I have no doubt in my mind that we will always live up to the guarantees of the United States of America. We have to. But it may mean that we are going to have to either raise taxes, cut other programs, or get the three-fifths vote to increase the debt limit.

There are lots of mechanisms. We may have to set up contingency funds. We may have to do a variety of things that will be financially and fiscally responsible, things that are not being done today. That is what this amendment is going to help us to do.

We can debate these individual items ad infinitum. It does not make much difference. It just comes down to the fact are we going to be fiscally responsible or are we not. And that is what this amendment requires us to be.

Mr. SIMON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEVIN. If I could just comment on that before I do yield because I did have the floor. I would like to comment on that question. The amount of money may not be monumental in that particular instance, but you have to talk about some real example. Let us use that example of a $100,000 loan. It may not seem like a monumental loan to you, but it is to that bank that made that loan. It could be a small bank. The principle is monumental. My friend from Utah says he has no doubt that we will always pay our obligations. His amendment makes it harder for us to pay these obligations. That is the issue. Do we want to make it harder when that moment comes, if it ever does, that we have to increase the debt limit? Do we want to make it harder to pay legal obligations of the United States? Should we have incurred those obligations? No. Under the Senator's amendment, in fact, we probably will never be in the position, if it passes, where we could incur them. Under Gramm-Rudman or a similar approach, we are not going to be incurring these obligations. I have voted in many instances to cut incurring these obligations. I have voted where necessary to raise revenues to pay our obligations.

That is not the issue. The issue in this amendment is where those legal obligations have been incurred, do we want to make it harder to pay.

My friend from Illinois is candid. He said we should pay our obligations. This amendment says, yes, but it will take 60 of us to pay our obligations instead of 50. So I understand what the Senator is trying to do. He is trying to put a mechanism in here which he thinks will help enforce the other provisions of the constitutional amendment. But what I am saying is the teeth that he is putting in it are biting the wrong people—biting the banker who makes the loan on the good faith of the United States, or biting the person who provides services to the United States, or biting somebody who is working in the Social Security Administration sending out our Social Security checks. He is biting the wrong people.

Mr. SIMON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEVIN. I will be happy to yield. I yield the floor.

Mr. SIMON. If my colleague will yield for a question, though.

Mr. LEVIN. I will be happy to.

Mr. SIMON. I think it ultimately gets down to a judgmental call. It is based on this question: If we have obligations, will there be 60 votes to raise the debt or 51 debts to raise the tax to meet those obligations? My belief is the Congress of the United States is not going to avoid meeting its obligations. I gather the judgment of the Senator from Michigan is he thinks that somehow we will not do it.

Mr. LEVIN. You are making it harder. That is all I am saying. This amendment makes it harder to meet our obligations, not easier.

Mr. SIMON. I understand it makes it harder, but does the Senator from Michigan really believe we will not meet our obligations?

Mr. LEVIN. The Senator from Michigan has been on this floor on many occasions when we could not get 60 votes to meet our obligations.

Mr. SIMON. Temporarily.

Mr. LEVIN. Many occasions. And permanently.

Mr. SIMON. But we always manage to do it. And I think we will do it.

Mr. LEVIN. You are making it harder to do it. For the life of me, I understand why we want to make it harder to incur obligations but not by threatening not to pay the ones that have been incurred. That is a means to an end that I do not think we ought to threaten. Should we not incur these obligations? Absolutely. Should we threaten people to whom we owe money that we will not pay that money in order to deter us from making obligations? No. That is a means to an end that I do not think we can justify. That is the difference between us.

Mr. SIMON. I recognize that.

Mr. LEVIN. I do not think it is a justifiable mechanism. Is it a useful mechanism? Will it work? It might, but then the question is what are you willing to do to achieve an end? I think, again, the teeth that we are putting into this are going to bite people who have provided services who have worked for the Government or who have lent money to students based on the full faith and credit of the Government. You are biting the wrong people with these teeth.

Mr. SIMON. If I felt this would do that, I would be voting against the amendment, as the Senator from Michigan will.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I certainly commend my colleague from Michigan for his interest in this matter. My respect for the Senator from Michigan is very great. I hold no one in higher esteem in this body than I do the Senator from Michigan. He is a very thoughtful person. He has stood with us on many occasions. He has indicated his sympathy, as he is doing today, for the farm program and for those who must depend upon the reliability of Government programs at critical points in terms of economic crisis. I appreciate his sensitivity to those problems. But, with all due respect, I believe that today he is seeing something in this proposal that is not there.

As the Senator from Illinois has said, if I truly believed that it would work as the Senator from Michigan is saying, I would not be for this proposal myself.

We are not operating here in a vacuum, however. We have had experience at the State level with budget balancing amendments.

I had an experience with that kind of provision as Governor of Oklahoma. we did not have the right to increase the public debt of the State of Oklahoma or the indebtedness of the State of Oklahoma if our estimates of our income and our estimates of our spending did not happen to be acurate. We did not have the luxury of paying it out of the deficit, as we do again and again at the Federal level, until we have run our country into the ground, until we have created a looming crisis in our country, in which we have decimated key sectors of our economy, and we attract foreign money to pay the interest on our debt, which is the result of living beyond our means for many years. We did not have that luxury at the State level.

If the income was not sufficient to fully fund the budget, we simply had to automatically reduce our spending proportionately, until the legislature and the Governor got together and made a decision: either cut other areas of spending or raise additional revenues to pay the bills. It works.

The State did not break any of its obligations. Those not under contractual obligation were proportionately reduced until the money was there to pay the bills. It does not result in failing to meet responsibilities.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BOREN. I yield.

Mr. DECONCINI. In the experience of the Senator from Oklahoma, did the State of Oaklahoma have any guaranteed programs where they extended their credit without having to put up the money and guarantee any obligations?

Mr. BOREN. We did not have a lot of guaranteed programs. There are certain guaranteed bond programs where the full faith and credit of the State stands behind those. We never had an experience of defaulting on any of those responsibilities. We had entered into contracts for goods and services, and those contracts were honored, and we proportionately reduced other kinds of expenditures.

Mr. DECONCINI. If that is the case, that there were some obligations or guarantees there, those guarantees, in and of themselves, were not included?

Mr. BOREN. That is correct. Those obligations were met without proportional reduction.

Mr. DECONCINI. And before they were met, they were not included in your receipts and disbursements, were they?

Mr. BOREN. It would depend on the program. They were not proportionally reduced in midstream.

Mr. DECONCINI. So far as having to pay that, which the Senator indicated the State never had to, it would not have been part of the equation of what the cost to the Government would have been unless there was a default. Is that correct?

Mr. BOREN. That is correct. It would not have been part unless there was a default.

Mr. DECONCINI. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma, because I think that underscores what we are talking about here. It is really two different things.

The Senator from Michigan has left some impression that the obligations through guarantees are going to be part of an obligation to pay immediately. That is not the case. A long period of time goes through in any default before it becomes the obligation of the guarantor. I am sure the Senator from Oklahoma agrees that there has to be legal action to take back the property that is put up as the security. The individual also has probably signed and maybe put up other security. Then, of course, if it is not enough to pay the loan, maybe half the loan, maybe all of it, goes to the guarantor.

Mr. BOREN. The Senator is correct. In our experience of operating under the balanced budget amendment at the State level, we have never experienced a situation in which the Governor of the State and the members of the legislature failed to meet their responsibilities. If we found that the actual income fell below the estimates or the outflow was ahead of the estimates, we simply managed a special session of the legislature or took care of it in a regular session, in a straightforward manner, to say that we have a shortfall and we have a choice. One choice was not to increase the debt of the State. Our choice was to cut certain areas of spending, to bring it back into balance, or raise revenues. By following that procedure, we have avoided a lot of problems that we have incurred at the Federal level, and these problems are decimating our country.

We have reached the point where we all understand that it is not a question of whether some day the next generation of Americans will have to pay the bill. We all know they will.

There is no way you can run budget deficits such as we are running, to the tune of $200 billion, and the bill not some day come due. There is no way that in order to fund those domestic budget deficits, by continuing to cripple the whole export sector of this country—agriculture, heavy industry, or other export products—you will not eventually come into the situation in which people in other countries to whom we owe money will not finally say that we have to pay that money back.

When we have to pay that money back, the standard of living in this country will have to be diminished.

We all understand that if we save money and lend it to someone else, we are deferring the enjoyment of that money ourselves until some later period of time because we want to earn a return on that money in the meantime. Other countries are lending us money right now on that basis. But they are not going to forever defer the enjoyment of the fruits of that money, which they have earned by selling us more than we have been selling to them. When they decide that they want the pleasure of enjoying that credit balance that they have built up against this country, the real standard of living of our people is going to plunge.

So here we are debating a constitutional amendment to try to rectify that situation—at a point in time when we are the first generation of Americans who are likely to be passing on to the next generation a diminished standard of living and a diminished quality of life from that which we have enjoyed. Throughout our history, every succeeding generation of Americans has had its standard of living and quality of life a little better than the preceding generation. Every succeeding generation has been a little more highly trained, a little more educated, a little more literate than the previous generation.

We have reached the sad point in our country where it is increasingly possible that this generation, for the first time, will pass on something less, something diminished, to the next generation. I do not think any of us want to do that.

It is our hope and dream, as Americans, not only that we will benefit from the heritage that has been passed on to us, but also, that we will care enough about this country and its future that we will add something to it in ourselves, our own efforts, our own spirit, and enhance it in some way as we pass it on to our children and grandchildren.

But we are not going to do that. Why? Because time and time again we have paid for our own pleasure, we have paid for the programs which we want to enjoy now, we have paid, you might say, for the luxuries for this generation by sending the bill on to the next generation.

I think what the American people want is for us to finally have to live within our means so that we do not continue to erode the future of this country, that we do not continue to live off our inventory, that we do not continue to denude the shelf at the back of the store without replenishing it.

This amendment, yes, it is radical in a sense compared to what we have been doing.

It says this: If you have an actual imbalance in your budget, if you are spending more in actual fact at the end of the fiscal year than you have taken in that fiscal year, you must make two difficult choices: you must either reduce your standard of living, the way you have been living beyond your means, you have to cut your spending; or, you are going to have to find some way to pay for it through additional revenues to the Government.

That is exactly the choice which the American people want us to have to make. That is exactly the choice that year in and year out, except in times of emergency or some extraordinary circumstance, that we should be making.

We should not be continuing to live beyond our means by simply paying for it by adding to the debt.

So, yes, this makes it much more difficult as a choice. It is more difficult as a choice to live beyond our means and say we will simply pay for it by adding it to the debt. It requires a supermajority. It is for us by simple majority to either cut our spending or increase our revenues to balance our budget. It should be. If we are going to sell this budget balancing amendment to the people of the United States as some kind of long-range solution—by the way, it is certainly no short-range solution—we are fooling ourselves and the people if we say that we ought to go ahead and make our responsibility here and now.

It has always been a little ironic to me that the President, who has submitted budgets to us that have been in deficit approximately a trillion dollars by his own suggestions what he asked us to do himself over the last 4 or 5 years, that he ran about the country calling for an amendment to balance the budget, when he himself becomes engaged in the budgetmaking process, instead of sending us budgets over here billions and billions of dollars in the red, requesting us to rubberstamp those budgets deficits that are huge. If he had already done his job and engaged us to better do our job we would not be in the situation we are in.

If we are going to have an amendment, and I think we should have a constitutional amendment, let us not send an amendment to the States with no teeth in it.

As I mentioned last night, we have balanced the budget in this country in Congress several times just since I have been here a mere 7½ years. I can remember the joy we felt on several occasions when we thought we had our paper estimates of our income and our paper estimates of our outflow all in balance and it was a wonderful prediction that we were on the road to balancing the budget and going to live up to the law, the statute that the Senator from Virginia at that time, Senator Harry Byrd, had written into the statute, only to find at the end of the year that our estimates were over by billions of dollars.

What this does is put some teeth into the provision. It says if we are wrong in our estimates and we finally have to face the fact that we are spending more than we are taking in, we are going to either have to cut the spending or raise taxes, or we are going to have to marshal a supermajority to increase the public debt of this country.

This should only be a last resort and it should take a supermajority. This amendment makes sense. It does not mean that Congress is not going to stand behind guaranteed programs.

It means we will be forced to come in here and set priorities, find ways to pay for those programs, including keeping faith with those that are under control and we will meet those responsibilities.

States have met those responsibilities operating under very, very similar circumstances as those that are required in this amendment.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield for a question?

Mr. BOREN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. METZEMBAUM. The premise of the Senator's remarks is that we have to reduce the standard of living of Government and we know that under the original constitutional amendment it provides that revenues must at least equal outlays. Under Gramm-Rudman, assuming we were able to meet that target, we would still be $140 billion short this year.

Is it not the fact that we will then have to go out and borrow that $140 billion, and is it not the fact that a bare majority will not be sufficient but that we will have to have three-fifths?

Under those circumstances, are we not putting in jeopardy the CCC funds, the TVA funds, those funds? As a matter of fact, the Senator from Utah has actually said that anything the Federal Government spends except to pay off the debt is embraced within the term "outlays?" That means SBA, that means farm housing loans, all of that money is obtained through the Federal financing bank.

Do I understand my friend from Oklahoma to be saying that none of those moneys can be raised from the public if this amendment is adopted and that, furthermore, we will not be able to pay our debt? We are not now talking about expenditures. We are talking about paying past debts. That is the point that the Senator from Michigan has been making. How do we pay our past debts?

Mr. BOREN. I say to my friend from Ohio, and I will try to be brief because I know my colleagues who have been here earlier are anxious to bring this matter to a close and allow the Senate to express its will on this matter, first of all, that if we were to pass this constitutional amendment through Congress, it, then, of course, must be submitted to the legislatures of the States, ratified by the legislatures of the States. We all know that this is a time-consuming process. It is not going to happen overnight.

One of the reasons why many of us felt we must get on a glide path to a balanced budget is not only there is an urgent and immediate need to do so, but we hope it will allow us then in an orderly way to put in place a process that will keep our budgets in balance once we reach those targets for the future so we will not fall back into our old bad habit of simply charging everything to the next generation and adding it to the national debt and paying for things out of the debt ceiling.

We are not in a circumstance where this amendment is going to take effect tomorrow. If we act on it today, it is not going to go into effect tomorrow.

It is my hope, if we do submit this amendment to the ratification of the vote of the State legislatures and they are moving to the ratification of it, it will be another incentive to us to work along this glide path to make sure we get the budgets in balance by the time this amendment is due to come into effect.

Then we will not have the problem that the Senator is anticipating.

I know the economy of this country is going to be in shambles if we do not move toward a balanced budget, perhaps not in the manner that Gramm-Rudman now imposes upon us, but certainly in terms of getting the total deficits down under that kind of a guideline. I think it is essential that we do that.

I would simply say, and the Senator from Ohio knows my strong feeling about agricultural programs, educational programs, if I were rewriting the budgets of this country, priorities would be very different. I would not be increasing foreign aid by $3 billion and cutting education by $3 billion.

It is often said I wish whoever wrote the President's State of the Union message about the importance of education also had a hand in writing the budget. They, obviously, did not talk to each other.

But I think we are simply in a situation where we are not singling out any program; we are singling out all the outlays.

In terms of the loan programs, many of the agricultural programs are revolving funds, that not only have payments at one end but also have paybacks at the other, so they are running a deficit.

Mr. METZENBAUM. They run back for more money. The CCC, the Conservation Corps, the Commodity Credit Corporation just needed $5 billion, as I understand it. You would not have been able to get that $5 billion because that would have been increasing the debt to the Federal Government had this amendment been in place without getting three-fifths of the Members of Congress voting for it.

Mr. BOREN. We finally get into the situation and it is true if we have a shortage at the end of the year—some years there are surpluses and some years there are shortages.

Mr. METZENBAUM. When was there ever a surplus?

Mr. BOREN. I did not bring over my research on that point.

But, of course, in the recent years, the last 3 or 4 years, because of the agricultural depression, we had the most serious problems, and this Senator has certainly supported emergency appropriations to make those funds whole.

We still have to consider that under appropriation for a particular period of time. We do not do this on a weekly basis.

If we are going to run short on an annual basis when the money runs out and then we do have to dip into what would be called net outlays for the Government, we are not getting in as revolving funds paying out; we have to make a supplemental appropriation to it. That supplemental appropriation and every supplemental appropriation for every program of every kind of spending imaginable would fall under the rules that we would have to pay for in one of two ways: Either cutting other programs to come up with the money, raising revenue to come up with the money, or if we had a surplus in some area of the budget, tapping that surplus in the budget. The States sometimes have had that. Or we have to add to the debt.

Mr. METZENBAUM. How about those we owe debts? We have—I forget how much it is—I think it is in excess of $2 trillion in debt now. That debt rolls over every year. That means that there is nothing—they could not issue new bonds unless Congress authorized it by a three-fifths vote.

The Senator from Oklahoma does not have to be persuaded how difficult it is to get a majority around here to increase the national debt. If you need a three-fifths vote it would become almost impossible. Are we not going to jeopardize our ability to meet out obligations in the future once we pass this amendment as amended by this amendment?

Mr. BOREN. I thank my colleague from Ohio. I would just have to conclude—and I will conclude at this point so we can go forward with a vote—that

I suppose we just have an honest difference of opinion on this matter. I think we should treat all of our obligations the same. I cannot believe the Congress would fail to meet the responsibilities that would in any way impair the full faith and credit of the Government of the United States. We have always, over the years, attached a very high priority to maintaining the full faith and credit of the United States once it is extended and maintaining the credibility of that full faith and credit. I believe any succeeding Congress would be derelict in its duty if it failed to so so.

What we have done all too well, all too well, is continue to live beyond our means, spend beyond our income, and pay for it by increasing the national debt. That has been a serious mistake economically and socially for this country. It is time for us to remedy that mistake. It is time for us to quit paying for our excessive spending, which exceeds our income, by continuing to pass on the bill to the next generation, by adding it to the deficit, and by continuing to increase the national debt levels. I think it is time we put the brakes on. I think this amendment is an effective way to apply those brakes and I think it is sensible and sound public policy.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I want to make three points.

First of all, while we have had a confusion on guaranteed loans being compared to the funds to operate the Credit Commodity Corporation, I believe that perhaps that has been clarified to the extent that we now recognize that Credit Commodity Corporation funds are appropriated. When the crop loans, for instance, are paid back, the funds paid back go directly to the Credit Commodity Corporation as a revolving fund.

Nevertheless, this particular amendment disturbs me and it disturbs me on a very basic, fundamental point. The actions that Congress takes from time to time are almost invariably decided by majority vote and not by anything more than a majority vote. Yet, there we are going to impose a super 60-percent vote on Congress in what is currently the functions of the day-to-day operations of Congress. Because that is where we are. Since we have large deficits and since we have a large public debt, we are attempting to gain control of it and to establish priorities. And, by and large, we are doing that on a majority vote, as it should be.

My friend from Oklahoma mentioned that when he was Governor of Oklahoma, when they were faced with an unbalanced budget, they had to make corrections in that. Of course, if their legislature is like our Montana Legislature, they did it by majority vote, not by some figure of a supermajority, in this case 60 percent is what we are proposing here.

I believe that this is very unwise to raise this threshold. It is not done very often in the Constitution. It is reserved for a few very serious propositions where we require more than a majority vote. In both of the two sentences of this section, by requiring three-fifths of the whole number of both Houses of Congress for an action to be successful and to pass the Congress, I believe we are raising the threshold too high.

For that reason, a fundamental reason, I shall vote against the amendment and I hope it is defeated. If the amendment is passed and adopted as part of section 1, I believe that it will require some careful research and examination by many of us to see how extensive this raising of the threshold to 60 percent of the whole number of both Houses and how it impinges on not only the Credit Commodity Corporation, but it impinges on some other programs that are vital to the success of the United States.

I sincerely hope that the amendment is defeated because the basic constitutional amendment as proposed does enough. We go far enough in revising the Constitution on balancing the budget. I am afraid this amendment goes much too far.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I thought it would be a little interesting to check some history on this subject, and so I dug out the files. I think we ought to understand that not since 1981 has the Senate had a three-fifths majority to increase the debt limit. And I also checked to see how those who are sponsoring this amendment have voted in the past with respect to increasing the debt limit.

Now in 1981, we increased the debt limit $50 billion and in that instance it was by a vote of 73 to 18. Senator HATCH, yes; Senator ARMSTRONG, no.

Then we get after that into 1982 and we increased the debt limit by $64 billion. In that one, the vote was 49 to 41, obviously not three-fifths. Senator HATCH, absent; Senator ARMSTRONG, no.

In May 1983, we increased the debt limit by $400 billion, Senator HATCH, yes; Senator ARMSTRONG, absent.

In November 1983, we increased the debt limit by $61 billion. The vote was 58 to 40, obviously not a three-fifths majority. Senator ARMSTRONG, no; Senator HATCH, no. It might be interesting to note that had they both voted yes at that time there would have been a three-fifths majority.

In 1984, there was an effort to increase the debt limit by $251 billion. The vote was 14 to 46, it was defeated. Senator ARMSTRONG, no; Senator HATCH, no.

In 1984, they then came back to the same issue, reconsidered it, and at that time it did pass by a vote of 37 to 30, again not by a three-fifths margin. Senator ARMSTRONG, absent; Senator HATCH, yes.

And in 1985, even though it was a part of the Gramm-Rudman bill, they still did not have a three-fifths majority. And with that, Senator ARMSTRONG and Senator HATCH, yes.

My point is that those who are proposing this amendment have not been a part of that group which was willing to increase the debt limit in the past; that, as a matter of fact, there has only been since 1981 one instance in 1981 when there was a three-fifths majority.

I think what you are doing is hamstringing the Government. I think you are making that which you would propose as a constitutional amendment that will work totally unworkable. And I would say to all of my colleagues who have a concern about farm programs, who have a concern about TVA, who have a concern about the Bonneville Power Authority, who have a concern about the SBA, who have a concern about student loans, who have a concern about any of the lending agencies of Government, that with this amendment it may be impossible to run the Government in the future, but, even worse than that, it probably would be impossible to meet our debt obligations to the people who hold the U.S. bonds or other obligations.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I did not intend to speak on this amendment but I cannot proceed without responding to my good friend from Oklahoma. We served together as Governors, and had many opportunities to work under the strictures of a balanced budget. And he pointed out this morning in some detail the efficacies of the balanced budget amendment at the State level, and how well it worked.

Let me repeat again that State balanced budgets and State balanced budget amendments are far more apparent than real. All States, or virtually all States, have separate capital budgets which would paint a considerably different picture if that were applied at the Federal level.

In addition, when States have found it difficult to balance their budgets under the strictures of a balanced budget amendment, they have used a wide variety of fiscal legerdemain to show a balanced budget when in fact they were taking from the future. These elements include such things as underfunding the amounts that need to be applied to State pension programs. They include changing the scope and nature of a fiscal year. They include—and they did include in the State of Washington—adding the 25th month of a biennium in terms of income which is a one-time gain.

Several States borrow funds on a short-term basis from credit markets to cover operating expenses. I certainly do not suggest that that is wise budgetmaking, but nonetheless they do it. Michigan, Minnesota, and Washington have all done that. Almost half of the States at one time or another have postponed certain payments into the next fiscal period to give the appearance of a balanced budget. They improve their cash flow also by pulling revenues into the current fiscal period when they normally would be delayed until the next.

In other words, there are many, many ways to reach a balanced budget, and this amendment—and, in fact, the balanced budget amendment itself—will not by itself do the job.

It is strange. It is strange, indeed, that we will likely have a vote on the constitutional amendment when it comes to final passage where 60 or perhaps 63 or 64—but I do not think 67—will vote for it. It is strange indeed that there is this 60-plus majority in the Senate avidly supporting a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution, a number incidentally strong enough to vote cloture—far more than enough to do the job of budget balancing.

What in the world has happened in past years? Where have these same people been in past years? What has prevented them in past years from doing the responsible job that has been talked about at length during the course of the last week?

No amendment is necessary for that 60-plus in this Senate to do the job of responsible budgeting. This amendment, I think, is a wrong addition. And there will be many opportunities, if the amendment is adopted to speak on it, and to analyze it between now and the time of the final vote on the 25th.

I hope it will not be adopted. It puts strictures on this and future Congresses that will prove to be not only painful, but just simply wrong.

Mr. President, I think it is quite apparent that those who would suggest that the States are paragons of virtue simply have not analyzed how and under what circumstances States have purportedly lived up to their balanced budget amendments. Those amendments have not been the things that have worked. States that have done a good job financially, and States that have budgeted responsibly have done so because it was the choice of those who served in the legislatures, and those who governed those States to do so. It was not the balanced budget amendment, which I have shown can be eluded in many, many ways.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, Senate Joint Resolution 225 does nothing described by the Senator from Michigan. It addresses no specific programs, only aggregates. It only says that Congress must prevent total outlays from exceeding total receipts. Congress must act to ensure deficits do not occur. Congress will finally be obligated to remain fiscally responsible.

Senate Joint Resolution 225 does not jeopardize these programs, loans, or guarantees in the slightest. We have heard many drastic predictions that Senate Joint Resolution 225 might somehow harm these basic services. These predictions might be justified if Senate Joint Resolution 225 required a balanced budget under all circumstances and if Congress were not free to implement 225 responsibly. Let me be perfectly clear. Senate Joint Resolution 225 could not cause the drastic consequences predicted by the Senator from Ohio; only Congress could cause those conditions. And it is very unlikely that Congress will be insensitive to the needs of their constituents. To repeat, Senate Joint Resolution 225 does not harm these programs in the slightest. It does not change the circumstances affecting Social Security at all. Under Senate Joint Resolution 225, these loans could only be harmed if Congress elected that course—an unlikely prospect.

If the conditions described by the Senator from Michigan were even remotely possible under a balanced budget in some future fiscal year, Congress could avert those consequences in many ways. It is important to review those alternatives which clearly leave Congress in the posture of deciding how to handle difficulties. Thus, Congress, not Senate Joint Resolution 225, would dictate any potential alterations in loans of all kinds.

It is important to note, however, that I cannot imagine a senerio under which Congress is likely to fail to keep its commitments. As has been repeatedly mentioned, Senate Joint Resolution 225 will be implemented by legislation. In this legislative implementation, Congress will be free to suggest whatever protections are necessary to prevent any damage to the basic purposes of Social Security. Even in the most desperate economic circumstances, Congress would have alternatives to ensure that these vital programs are not harmed. Let me list some of these. Congress could set aside a contingency fund to cover defaults. Congress could enact spending rescissions or cuts in less important programs to secure compliance with a ratified Senate Joint Resolution 225. Congress could by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress enact a tax increase or surtax to comply with 225. Congress could do any combination of these alternatives to comply with Senate Joint Resolution 225. Moreover the President would have a role in enforcing this amendment. The President could veto inappropriate spending, defer spending in accord with authority conferred by the 1974 Budget Act, recommend rescissions or tax increases, or any combination of these alternatives to complement Congress's compliance actions. It is important to note that none of these alternatives imply defaulting on loans.

It is important to note that I have not yet mentioned the authorization of a specific excess of outlays over receipts by three-fifths vote. Yet this would still be a further safety valve. In the conditions described by the Senator from Michigan, I would fully expect that Congress could muster the consensus to take such a step. This is still a further protection.

Although I am confident that most of my colleagues have voted at one time or another to preserve the basic purposes of these loan programs. Indeed very few, if any, Senators would allow the United States to default on its obligations.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EVANS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I understand we are about ready to vote on the pending amendment. The distinguished minority leader wishes to speak on the amendment.

While we are awaiting that, I thought I might indicate to my colleagues that if we can let this be the last amendment, and if we can satisfy the concerns of the Senator from Alabama and get agreement for final passage on the 25th of March, it would be my intention to move to one of three things:

The committee funding resolutions which we have to do by tomorrow. There will be amendments and votes on committee funding.

Reconciliation, which we have been working on. I think a number of Members on both sides have a deep interest in that.

Third is a water resources bill, if we can accomplish that, something we have not been able to do for 9 years. I know there are some concerns. The Senator from Ohio has expressed concern about amendments, but there is another glitch or two we are trying to work out in the water resources bill.

Overall, I understand that members of the committee, both Republican and Democrats, are pretty much in support of the committee bill and would like to get it up and out. We might be able to do that rather quickly.

I would hope that Members will not be inconvenienced if we are here for a while this evening.

Mr. HART. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HART. What did the majority leader say about an evening session?

Mr. DOLE. I said there might be one.

Mr. HART. When will the majority leader know about that?

Mr. DOLE. I am almost certain there will be one right now. But with all of these other matters there has been some concern about trying to get out in midafternoon tomorrow. If the Senator has a special request, maybe we can work on it.

I am advised by the distinguished minority leader that we can proceed with the vote.

Have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question is on agreeing to amendment No. 1668, as modified.

The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SYMMS] is necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS] are absent on official business

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PRESSLER). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who disire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 57, nays 40, as follows:

NOT VOTING—3

Goldwater	Mathias	Symms

So the amendment (No. 1668), as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

The Senate will be in order.

AUTHORIZATION FOR JUDICIARY COMMITTEE TO MEET TODAY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I might make one request here while we are waiting. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, March 13, in order to receive testimony concerning the nomination of Jefferson Sessions to be U.S. district judge for the southern district of Alabama. I would indicate that that has been cleared by the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I remove my reservation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senate continued consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as I understand it, there are no further amendments to Senate Joint Resolution 225. We think we may be able to reach some agreement to satisfy the concerns of the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

We are trying to put in writing what the Senator indicated, in consultation with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. EVANS] the three of them might agree on. As I understand the Senator from Alabama, what he is suggesting is that between now and March 19——

Mr. HEFLIN. Wednesday, March 19, yes.

Mr. DOLE. Wednesday, March 19—the staffs, Senator THURMOND, Senator HATCH, Senator DECONCINI, the Senator from Alabama, and others who want——

Mr. HEFLIN. I think maybe Senator DOMENICI ought to be there, too, and CHILES.

Mr. DOLE. DOMENICI and CHILES. In any event, those who would have responsibility in the event this constitutional amendment passed would be able to review the language of the amendment, see if there are any technical amendments that would need to be made, particularly in the area of definitions or if it could be resolved through a colloquy where the Senator from Alabama, for example, could ask questions and could be agreed upon or whatever discussed by the managers. Then, if that was not totally satisfactory, that it would be in order to offer a technical amendment on March 25 at some time after 2 o'clock.

Let me just read the request and see if that is anywhere near what the parties had in mind.

I will not put the request. I will just read it for our own information

I would ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be advanced to third reading immediately following the disposition of amendment No. 1652, as amended.

Then I would ask unanimous consent that the vote occur at 4 p.m. on Tuesday, March 25; then, that a colloquy be placed in the RECORD, to be prepared by Senators HATCH, THURMOND, DECONCINI, and HEFLIN, no later than—I have here Friday, March 25.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think it is all right to place that in the RECORD. It would have to be agreed to.

I am trying to get a deadline to agree on it. To place it in the RECORD, it would be on the 21st.

Mr. DOLE. No later than March 21.

We would discuss the definition of several items.

In the event that a colloquy cannot be reached, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] would be recognized at 3 p.m. on Tuesday, March 25, to offer a technical amendment which would add to the joint resolution a definition section, and that amendment be limited to 1 hour, to be equally divided in the usual form.

No amendments would be in order to the Heflin amendment, and the agreement would be in the usual form.

Then there would be an information statement that anyone who has an interest in technical amendments or the language itself should contact the staff of Senator HATCH, Senator DECONCINI, and others.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. SARBANES. Under this arrangement, is the colloquy going to be generally available to the Members of the Senate to review before it moves along?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. SARBANES. There may be a group that will agree on a colloquy, and others may disagree with the interpretation of the colloquy.

Mr. DOLE. That is why we suggest it be placed in the RECORD on March 21—the colloquy.

Mr. SARBANES. So there would be an opportunity at the beginning of the following week, before the vote, to indicate a disagreement with the colloquy, if one had it?

Mr. DOLE. The Senator from Maryland is correct.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I would further suggest that this unanimous-consent agreement be changed, to the effect that in the event that people disagree with the colloquy, anyone would have the right to add a definition section in the amendment, to be limited to 1 hour, in a way that it is not reserved just to me. As it is right now, it is reserved only to me. It could be to somebody else. Senator MELCHER may want to agree with the colloquy. I would say that he might want to add a definition. But that would be limited to 1 hour debate, equally divided—whoever makes it.

Mr. DOLE. What I have done is just outline it. We have not had a chance to discuss this with anyone. It was just handed to me.

I suggest that we spend a little time—those who have an interest in going back and refining it. This is simply a draft that the staff has prepared very quickly. Perhaps we could have a brief quorum call, and the principals could get together here and see if they can agree on it.

I do not have any pride of authorship, obviously, and I do not have a role in this matter except trying to facilitate the business of the Senate.

I might add that when we complete this, if we can, we will go to the committee funding resolutions. I hope we will be able to do that by 1:30 and that we could complete action on those no later than 3 o'clock.

It is my hope that we can bring up reconciliation this afternoon and do that rather quickly, and then start on the water resources bill this afternoon or this evening.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. EVANS. If there is to be a potential of an amendment with 1 hour equally divided, it seems to me that we ought to then extend debate on the bill itself, to assure that there is 2 hours of debate on passage of the bill. Otherwise, we will be very restricted in final debate, if an hour of that 2 hours is taken out for an amendment.

Mr. DOLE That is a matter that can be resolved.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield. I am ready to yield the floor.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I think that, in fairness to the majority leader, I will have to say that I cannot agree to this proposal at this time.

We are not dealing with a statute. This is not just an ordinary bill, no matter how important an ordinary bill might be. We are discussing a constitutional amendment.

I say that for this reason: There are more than just the principal Senators who have been most active. There are 100 Senators who will have to make a decision on this amendment.

I cannot agree at this moment that there be only one amendment, a technical amendment. I see that we are going to be asked that no amendments be in order to the Heflin amendment and that a "technical amendment" be limited to 1 hour.

In our haste, if this turns out to be a constitutional amendment that straitjackets the operation of this Government so that it cannot effectively act in the face of a recession or in a situation in which American troops are militarily engaged, or are being introduced into an environment of imminent hostilities, we can be sorry we acted in haste.

I do not want to agree at this time that there be no more amendments; that the resolution go to third reading and that there be no more amendments. I do not believe that is the way to legislate on a constitutional amendment.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I just say in response, and then I will yield the floor to the Senator, maybe if we just vote right now—if no one has any amendments—go to third reading and have the vote.

I am trying to accommodate some Senators who cannot be here. But as far as I know there are no more amendments, technical or otherwise.

I think there will be a colloquy between the Senator from Alabama and maybe a number of Senators. If we could do that now then perhaps rather than string this out and start over on March 25, we might be better served to vote today.

I am not certain where the votes are. If there are no amendments, then I am certain we could go to third reading.

The distinguished minority leader indicated he does not have any amendments or is not trying to hold it up.

I am just trying to get it either locked in concrete for a future date or maybe dispose of it today.

So perhaps, if we could have an exchange between the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from South Carolina and others who want to get into that exchange, then we could decide whether just to go ahead and vote. That might be the best procedure.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I want to put a clean copy of the amendment in the RECORD.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a clean copy of the amendment as has been approved so far by the Senate be printed in the RECORD at this point for the convenience of Senators so they can see just what has been acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wish to review what is being offered as a clean copy.

Is this being offered as an amendment now to it or just as a technical correction, or what?

Mr. THURMOND. No. This is the amendment as it stands today as amended by the Senator's suggestions, by other Members' suggestions and actions taken by the Senate.

I thought Senators would like to see a copy of the amendment where it stands so they can study it, read it, and be prepared to vote when the time comes.

Mr. HEFLIN. This is not a substitute of what we have done so far?

Mr. THURMOND. No.

I am just asking unanimous consent to have in the RECORD this copy for information of Senators.

Mr. HEFLIN. This is just a proposed method of the way it will appear when it is published right now?

Mr. THURMOND. This is what the Senate has done so far. We have changed the amendment considerably, and that is the way it stands now. I just thought Senators would like to see the way it stands now so they can understand whether they want to vote for it on the 25th.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, will the Senator be so kind as to ask unanimous consent that the amendment as it stands, which he has just offered and sent to the desk, be printed and be at the desks of all Senators?

Personally, I think it is very helpful to have before me what the proposal is before we have to vote on it.

Mr. THURMOND. That is all this does. It prints what we have done so Senators can see it.

Mr. LONG. Could we have unanimous consent that the amendment as it stands be printed and made available at the desks of all Senators?

Mr. THURMOND. That is the point I made. That is exactly what I proposed.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, if the distinguished President pro tempore will yield, as I understand the Senator he merely wants the amendment, meaning the basic amendment, not a new amendment, to be printed to reflect the actions that the Senate has taken to date.

71-059 O-87-12 (Pt. 4

Mr. THURMOND. That is what I said.

Mr. BYRD. It is not an amendment that will be called up.

Mr. THURMOND. That is what I said.

Mr. BYRD. It is simply a reprinting of the amendment with the actions that have been taken.

Mr. THURMOND. With the actions taken to date.

Mr. BYRD. I think that is a good thing.

Mr. THURMOND. I thought every Senator would want to see that.

Mr. HEFLIN. All right.

I just wanted to be sure. I will review it afterward.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARTICLE —

SECTION 1. Total outlays of the United States for any fiscal year shall not exceed total receipts to the United States for that year, unless three-fifths of the whole number of both houses of Congress shall provide for a specific excess of outlays over receipts. The public debt of the United States shall not be increased to fund any excess of outlays over receipts for any fiscal year, unless three-fifths of the whole number of both houses of Congress shall provide, by law, for such an increase.

SEC. 2. Any bill to increase revenue shall become law only if approved by a majority of the whole number of both Houses of Congress by rollcall vote.

SEC. 3. Prior to each fiscal year, the President shall transmit to the Congress a proposed budget for the United States Government for that fiscal year in which total outlays are not greater than total receipts. The President may also recommend an alternative budget in which total outlays exceed total receipts, which shall be accompanied by a detailed explanation of the need for such excess.

SEC. 4. The Congress may waive the provisions of this article for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall enforce and implement this article by appropriate legislation.

SEC. 6. This article shall take effect for the fiscal year 1991 or for the second fiscal year beginning after its ratification, whichever is later.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I wish to say we have been on this amendment now for 3 days. Everyone has had a chance to offer amendments and a lot of Senators have offered amendments.

There is no use to have delay after delay and those who are opposed to it do not want to act anytime. They want to keep putting it off, keep amending it, keep going forward.

So as far as I am concerned, it seems to me that if there are any additional amendments they want to act on today we can try to get through with it.

I thought we were going to third reading. We told Senators about these amendments coming up. We have acted on all amendments that have been presented.

I want to say that it is my intention to work with the distinguished Senator from Alabama to develop a colloquy on the matter and I believe the sponsors of this proposal are in agreement that the definition of "total outlays" and "total receipts" should be based on the Judiciary Committee report which I understand the able Senator from Alabama favored doing.

So I was under the impression that the amendments were all through, that we were through with the bill, that we will just have a colloquy to accommodate the Senator from Alabama on the point that he raised there.

Mr. HEFLIN. In reply to it, I would assume that if the colloquy clarifies the issue, I am only seeking a uniform legislative history to give a uniform interpretation to certain terms that are included in it. As long as they are as we understand them and basically as I understand it now the Domenici-Chiles amendment by adding the word "total" is not to change any of the definitions that were contained in the report language other than to add off-budget items to be included within the words "total outlays" and "total receipts."

I would assume that we can work that colloquy out and that that can be done.

If we are not going to vote today, I would assume it can be published in advance, Senators could go over it, and we could go into a detailed colloquy and, in the event the colloquy does not satisfy everyone, then the right to have an amendment for a definition section would be available.

But I am perfectly willing to try to move either now or later.

It is my understanding there are absent Senators, and all I am doing is saying that if there is time let us take advantage of that time to review this in order that we not make any mistakes.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, everyone has had a chance to offer amendments. Amendment after amendment has been offered. Day after day has gone here. We have been on this amendment 5 days. I believe today goes on the sixth day.

Those who are opposed to it never want to come to an end with it.

We feel that we have had ample time. We worked with everyone and tried to accommodate and reach a consensus as much as we can. The only thing that remains that I know to be considered was this question of definition of "outlays," and we have a colloquy with the distinguished Senator from Alabama. We will get with him on the 21st and work up a colloquy and then present that on the 25th when we come back to act to get a final vote on the amendment.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished President pro tempore yield?

Mr. THURMOND. I am pleased to yield to the able Democratic leader.

Mr. BYRD. The distinguished President pro tempore says that we have spent 5 or 6 days.

Mr. President, our forebears who met in Philadelphia during that hot summer of 1787 did not have any air-conditioning units, I am sure. However, no one proposed after 5 or 6 days, to set up a final date for a vote with the condition that only one amendment be offered in the meantime or that a given problem be settled by a colloquy.

I have no problem with setting a final date, my I say to the distinguished President pro tempore. If we want to make the final date for a vote the 25th of March, that is all right with me.

My problem comes with having us say to ourselves: "Well, there cannot be any amendments, or there can only be one amendment, or we will just resolve this or that matter by colloquy."

I have every good faith in the distinguished Senator from Alabama and other Senators who would participate in that colloquy. I commend the Senator from Alabama on having focused on a palpable weakness here. I assure the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, Mr. THURMOND, that I am not interested in filibustering. I do not personally have any amendment in mind.

The President pro tempore did the Senate a service in asking that there be a new print of the resolution showing the actions of the Senate thereon to date. As I say, if the Senate wants to enter into an agreement to vote for final passage on the 25th, that is OK, but I cannot, at the moment, agree that the Senate enter an order precluding the offering of amendments by Senators prior to final passage.

I have no intention to filibuster this proposition. I am not going to agree to a unanimous-consent request that, in essence, we treat the constitutional amendment as we do a statute. On statutes, as I have said already, whether they be joint resolutions or bills, we, from time to time, enter into agreements ruling out nongermane amendments, ruling out further amendments, or specifying certain amendments only that can be called up. But this is a far, far different matter, when we are talking about an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Once it is done and we find that, to our regrets, we acted in too much haste, it will take a long time to undo our mistake.

So, again, if the majority leader or the distinguished President pro tempore wants to set a final date for the vote, that is all right with me. I would like to leave the resolution at least open to amendment if, in the meantime, our review of the actions of the Senate indicates a need for further amendment. The Senate ought to have the opportunity to meet that need.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I just wish to say that the able Democratic leader mentioned about those who wrote the Constitution, that they met in April and finished in September of 1787. But they wrote a whole new constitution for a new government. We are not doing that. We have just one amendment. There have been 26 amendments to the Constitution so far. This is just one amendment on one subject that we have been on now for 5 days, and 2 years ago we spent a month on this question. It seems to me that most of the people are generally familiar with it.

We feel that ample opportunity has been given to everybody to offer amendments. The able Democratic leader offered an amendment. It did not pass, but he had a chance to offer it or offer more. Others have offered amendments, and we have taken action on them.

It seems to me the American people are demanding now that we go forward and get this amendment passed, if we can.

I wish to repeat: We have not balanced the budget but once in 26 years—26 years. No individual and no corporation could stay in business that operates like that, and this Government cannot, either. It is time we give the people relief on this subject. We are going in debt at the rate of $200 billion a year, a debt between $2 trillion and $3 trillion a year.

Now somebody said the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings amendment takes care of the situation. I supported that. I think it is a good amendment. Under that, if we stick to it, we have got the courage to do it, we can balance this budget in 5 years. But that only brings us to a balance. But what are you going to do to keep it in balance? We have not shown the fortitude to keep it in balance so far.

So this constitutional amendment will mandate a balanced budget, and it will make the Congress balance the budget. That is the only way I think we are ever going to get it done.

Pressure here is so great on the Congressmen that they want to accommodate the constituents in various matters, vote appropriation after appropriation, and spend money after money.

But this constitutional amendment will bring it to a head. It will tell the people that we cannot spend more than we take in. In that way we can keep the budget balanced.

So I say this is a way once we get the budget balanced to keep it balanced. We need to do that.

I do not think this matter ought to be delayed unnecessarily. We have given ample opportunity to everybody all this week to offer any amendment they wanted to. We thought they were through. Nobody else came forward with any other amendments. Why should we not act, and send it to third reading? We do not need any other amendment. The only thing that is left to consider is a definition there of outlays and total receipts.

I am sure the able Senator from Alabama, in working with our group, can reach a consensus on that, and have a little colloquy and end it, go to third reading if they will vote, and those who are against the amendment will have a chance to vote against it. For those who are for it—and I hope there will be two-thirds for it, and the people want it—they will vote it overwhelmingly. In the polls they want it. And then they can act on it.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the time has come to act, to quit delaying this matter, and quit putting it off as some now want to do. I hope we can go to third reading. Then the distinguished Senator from Alabama, if we do not reach an agreement with him on the colloquy, can keep it open and continue. But if we do, it is not necessary to continue.

The distinguished Senator from Alabama is on the floor. I think he feels we can reach an agreement here in a colloquy on a definition of total outlays, and total receipts. That is all that is left. It seems to me we ought to go ahead and act.

Where is the Senator from Alabama? He was here just a moment ago.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, as I understand from the Senator from Alabama in talking with us, he felt this matter could be handled with a colloquy, it would not be necessary to have any further amendments, and that the total outlays and total receipts could be based on the Judiciary Committee report. But any other differences there I feel we could handle with a colloquy and get through with this matter.

I would like to know if the Senator from Alabama still feels that way.

Mr. HEFLIN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was talking, and I did not understand exactly the inquiry.

Mr. THURMOND. I just made a statement that we understood the Senator's position was that we are through with the amendments, and the only thing left could be a little colloquy between the Senator and our group, to get together and agree on that colloquy. And we can meet on the 21st, and work that out. On the 25th we would have a final vote.

Mr. HEFLIN. Basically, my position is that I want to try to have a legislative history that brings about an unquestionable, uniform interpretation. I do not want an interpretation from the legislative history that would indicate differences of opinion as to what the term "total outlays" means, and what the term "total receipts" means. I am trying to clarify any ambiguities or any inconsistencies that exist in the minds of the Members. I think that can be done through a colloquy.

There are some people from a substantive viewpoint on what is included within total outlays that may have some legitimate substantive differences. That is a matter, of course, that would have to develop.

My concern is primarily technical in nature, and an attempt to insure as we draft a constitutional amendment, that it is drafted in the best possible manner. Therefore preventing a lot of questions for the courts to cover concerning the legislative history of the legislative intent. That is my purpose.

As I understand it, if this proves to be correct, I do not have any real objection to moving forward at any time. And the purpose of adding the world "total" to the world "outlays," and adding of the word "total" to the word "receipts" by Senator DOMENICI in his amendment was for the purpose of bringing in all budget items. It was not intended in any way to change any of the definitions that are contained in the report of the committee on Senate Joint Resolution 225.

There are definitions which are scattered throughout, but there are some particular definitions on pages 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53 of the report that as I understand from Senator HATCH have not been changed by the use of the word "total" which has been added to the word "outlays" and the use of the word "total" which has been added to the word "receipts".

The purpose of a report, as the distinguished President pro tempore of the Senate, and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, is to give definition, and is to give legislative history rather than trying to put every detail in the Constitution. The constitutional enactments ought to be general, broad language and supported by a report or by the legislative history to give the intent, and to provide the details.

So that is my understanding, and if that is correct, I have no problems with it at this time.

It could well be that there could be other Senators that do have substantive problems with these definitions, and with the additions of adding the off-budget items. But that remains for them to articulate and to voice.

Mr. THURMOND. I say to the Senator that I think he has interpreted correctly, and no one else has challenged him. On page 42 of the report, it says:

"Outlays" is intended to include all disbursements from the Treasury of the United States, either directly or indirectly through Federal or quasi-Federal agencies created under the authority of acts of Congress, and either "on-budget" or "off-budget."

On page 43 of the report it says:

"Outlays," "receipts," "fiscal year" are all terms defined by or to be defined by statute and, as such, have no constitutional standing apart from these statutory definitions. The intentions of the Committee with regard to current concepts have been set out elsewhere in the report. At the same time, the Committee is sensitive to the likelihood that such concepts will undergo modification through time. Provided these modifications are not designed to subvert the restrictions imposed by the amendment, but rather are designed to further those purposes, there is no intention that the meanings given here are immutable.

In other words, the way the Senator has construed it is the way we construed it.

He is the only one who has raised the point. So where is the conflict? As the Senator said originally, and as I think he probably feels now, a little colloquy here will clear things up. I am sure we can get together on it on the 21st and we can put it into the RECORD. Then on the 25th we can have a final vote.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank the Senator. That will be fine.

Mr. THURMOND. I thank the Senator. In view of that, is there any objection now to going to third reading?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have already indicated that it is agreeable with me if the Senate wishes to enter an order to the effect that the final vote would occur on this joint resolution on the 25th of March. I have no problem with that. I will be having a conference of Members on my side of the aisle at 2 o'clock today. That conference will be for the purpose of discussing several subjects.

I shall talk with my colleagues in that conference to see if they are willing to go to third reading, which precludes further amendments.

I will discuss this matter with my colleagues.

Having said that, there is nothing more I can say to ease the concerns of the distinguished President pro tempore.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I just want to say that I repeat again that everybody has had the opportunity to offer amendments. We have taken up every amendment anybody has offered. We attempted to work out the bill and finally pass it yesterday or today. But some Senators had to be away. Senator MATHIAS, who voted against it, was away and some others were away. The only reason the vote was put off until March 25 was to accommodate those Senators, so they could be here. Everything else was supposed to be finished today.

Mr. President, does the able Democratic leader not feel we can go to third reading?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I do not think we have to go over and over this matter. I have stated very clearly what I think I should do. I have responsibilities not only as a Senator but also as the leader of my party. I just cannot agree, as I said earlier, at this time to entering an order that would provide for going to third reading.

I will say once again that there is a conference of Democratic Senators at 2 o'clock today to discuss other matters. I will seek to find out at that conference how Senators on my side feel about entering an agreement that would have the Senate go to third reading on the joint resolution, with no further opportunities to offer amendments.

I do not wish to go over and over and over this subject. It has been adequately aired. I think my position is eminently clear.

I would hope that the Senator would desist from trying to get an answer at this point in time that is other than what I have already stated repeatedly as being my position.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I see the majority leader is back now.

For his information I might just say that we were under the impression that we were going to finish everything today, except for the vote on the 25th. The able Senator from Alabama is satisfied now with the colloquy. He is the only one who has raised any point about that. There has been nobody else who has come forward with any amendment. We thought we could finish everything today except the vote on the 25th, with a colloquy to be worked out on the 21st, to be worked out and printed in the RECORD and available to us.

So Mr. President, that is the status now. There is objection to third reading. The minority leader says he is having a meeting at 2 o'clock with his Democratic colleagues and will take up the matter there.

Again I want to repeat that Republicans and Democrats have had days and days to offer any amendments. They knew we wanted to get through. It seems to me they should have offered them before now if they were going to do it.

We have given everybody plenty of time, ample time. Those who are against it, of course, never want it to come to a vote.

Several of them here have offered amendments. They have said they were going to vote against it even though they offered amendments, they said, to try to improve it. They have a right to do that.

The point is, I do not know that you will satisfy everybody in either party. It seems to me for the good of the people we ought to do this.

While I am on my feet, I want to say to the people of the United States, "If you want a constitutional amendment, contact your Senator and tell him you want it. Polls have shown all over this country that we deserve a constitutional amendment, that the people want a constitutional amendment. I hope you get in touch with your Senator and tell him how you feel."

Some Senators are reluctant, it seems, for one reason or another, to go forward here. We feel that the people ought to be heard from. We feel they ought to get in touch with their respective Senators and let them know how they feel.

If you want to keep this budget balanced, once we balance it under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings amendment, which I hope we do, we want to keep it balanced. The Senate has not shown in actions heretofore, the House either, to keep it balanced.

This constitutional amendment will mandate the balanced budget. That is what it is going to take to keep it balanced in the future.

The fact that we have not balanced it but once in 26 years I think is an indication that even though we balance it by 1991, it will not stay balanced. It will become unbalanced again. But if we pass this constitutional amendment to make the Congress balance it, that is another story.

I hope the people of the United States who are listening to the radio today will contact their Senators and urge them to vote for this constitutional amendment so we can keep this budget balanced, keep interest rates down, and keep inflation down.

If we do that, if we balance this budget, it will do more than anything I know to keep interest rates down and keep inflation down, which would help everybody: Senior citizens on fixed income, other people on fixed income, people all over this country, enabling more development to take place, more houses to be built, and more improvement and progress in every way.

This constitutional amendment is the most vital subject before the American people today. We must pass this amendment. We must pass it for the good of future generations. It is not right for our generation to be spending and putting on the backs of our children and their children this deficit and make them pay it off. We ought to have the courage to keep it balanced.

If it takes more taxes, we ought to have whatever it takes. But if the country spends as we think it ought to, it will not take more taxes.

Again, I want to say that we have to balance this budget, which I think we will do by 1991 under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, and then have this amendment and keep it balanced.

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I just heard an argument in politics on radio in the Senate. I did not know we were going to get into politics on this. I thought we would discuss it on the merits.

I am concerned about the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina because he knows as well as anybody on this floor that yesterday those of us who were opposing this amendment made every possible effort to shorten the debate. We wanted to get to a final vote yesterday afternoon. We knew that one Member on the opposite side was leaving for about a week and we wanted to give him an opportunity to vote on it. We tried to get Senators either not to call up their amendments or if they did so to shorten their remarks.

But it is a fact that just about the time we thought we had resolved that matter an amendment was called up on behalf of those who support the constitutional amendment and about four Senators dragged out the debate for a sufficiently long period of time that then it became necessary for the majority leader and two of the other Members on the other side of the aisle to come back with a unanimous-consent proposal.

Those of us who were opposed to the amendment and are opposed to it agreed to that. But we had hoped we could vote yesterday afternoon. We wanted to vote yesterday afternoon. We tried in every possible way to vote yesterday afternoon.

So I am a little bit disturbed to hear the distinguished Senator from South Carolina start talking as if the opponents were the ones who had delayed this matter. This matter has been delayed when those who are supporting the constitutional amendment did not have the votes yesterday. They knew they did not have the votes yesterday and they did not want to vote yesterday.

The distinguished Senator from South Carolina himself proposed to me that we put the matter off until March 25. I said, "No, we are not willing to do that."

I would just say that we are prepared now to agree to vote on March 25. There was somewhat of a hangup having to do with some concerns expressed by the distinguished Senator from Alabama, but I think those have been pretty well worked out.

As I see it at this moment, the minority leader has indicated that he wishes to consult with Members on his side of the aisle. It would seem to me that the majority leader and the minority leader might serve all of our purposes well if this matter were just laid aside for an hour and a half or two, unless the minority leader or the majority leader has an objection to that and perhaps we might go on to some other matters. I still hope we can come to an agreement to vote final passage or final defeat, whatever the case may be, on March 25.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Ohio, the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, and the distinguished minority leader. What I would like to do now is ask that we move this measure aside and move on to Calendar No. 526, Senate Resolution 353, the committee funding resolution. That would give the distinguished minority leader and Members on his side an opportunity to caucus. I have checked with Senators FORD and WARNER. I told them that about 1:30, we ought to be ready. So, if there is no objection to that, that should satisfy the concerns just expressed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Hearing no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection. it is so ordered.

OMNIBUS COMMITTEE FUNDING RESOLUTION OF 1986

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report a resolution.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 353) authorizing expenditures by committees of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I appear today on behalf of the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee, Mr. MATHIAS, who had to depart the country on official business. It is a pleasure to be joined today by the distinguished ranking minority member, the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. FORD].

The Senate has been debating for several days a constitutional amendment to balance the budget. As we are all aware, the Congress passed last year the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings amendment which would balance the budget by 1991.

The Committee on Rules and Administration has therefore favorably reported to the full Senate, Senate Resolution 353. This resolution authorizes expenditures by committees of the Senate which maintains the Senate committee budget at the 1985 funding level, less the amount sequestered under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. This is in keeping with the efforts of Congress to control Government spending.

This is a very important resolution as it permits our committees to continue their work of holding hearings on issues of vital importance to our Nation and the people. This resolution also permits the Senate to pay the very able and capable staff who research the issues before the committees and maintains the daily operation of the committees. Committees are a very vital and important part of all legislation that is passed or sometimes rejected by the Senate.

The Committee on Rules and Administration, in reporting an original resolution authorizing expenditures for Senate committees, recommends a total funding level for the standing committees of the Senate, the Special Committee on Aging, the Select Committee on Intelligence, and the Select Committee on Indian Affairs, of $43,597,366 for the period, March 1, 1986, through February 28, 1987. I submit for the RECORD the amounts for each committee as recommended, and I ask unanimous consent that this material be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION AND COMMITTEE	Amount
Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry	$1,263,379
Appropriations	3,999,860
Armed Services	2,097,190
Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs	1,613,364

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, the Rules Committee held 3 days of hearings, February 3, 4, and 5, 1986, with each committee chairman and ranking minority member presenting their committee plans for oversight and legislative review activities for the coming year.

On February 27, 1986, the Rules Committee held a markup session and took the following action:

The committee agreed to a method to comply with the fiscal year 1986 sequestration mandated by the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act. The $2,195,000 reduction is to be prorated between the committee fiscal year ending February 28, 1986, and the committee fiscal year beginning March 1, 1986.

This is the strong recommendation of the Rules Committee. I urge my colleagues to support Senate Resolution 353.

Mr. President, at this time I yield to my distinguished colleague from Kentucky.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. WARNER]. He has accurately related the procedure which the Rules Committee followed in determining the amount of funds for the various committees of the U.S. Senate.

It is not an easy job for those of us on the Rules Committee to try to satisfy each committee or to satisfy each chairman and ranking minority member of the various committees.

I think the decision by the Rules Committee has been fair. It is adequate. I know there are some who would have liked to have more money, but under the circumstances I think the Rules Committee and its members have made, as I said earlier, a fair judgment on funding for each committee.

I join my distinguished colleagues in urging the Senate to adopt this resolution and that any amendments to the resolution, other than technical, not be accepted.

If any problems appear in the coming fiscal year, there is always the normal procedure of a supplemental appropriation, and at that time I am sure the Rules Committee will give it the same kind of consideration it gave the present resolution, and I am sure the Senate will act accordingly.

So, Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleagues for allowing me to say these few words.

I should like to compliment the chairman of the Rules Committee, Senator MATHIAS, from the great State of Maryland, who is out of the city on official business. He has been a stalwart in standing up for fairness. This budget we are presenting to the Senate today has his strong backing, and I want to thank him publicly for the hard work he has given to bring us to the point we are today.

I yield the floor.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I talked with Mr. MATHIAS, the chairman, before his departure last night, and he would be the first to reciprocate those kind remarks were he present today. Having been a member of this committee several years, I have seen firsthand the very close working relationship between the chairman and the distinguished ranking minority member. Indeed, their selfless efforts enable those of us who are members of the committee to rely most often on their recommendations, without a great deal of independent analysis of the issues by other members.

AMENDMENT NO. 1669

(Purpose: Payment of long-distance telephone calls)

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I send to the desk a technical amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. WARNER] proposes an amendment numbered 1669:

In section 2(c) after the word "required" insert "(1)", At the end of section 2(c) strike the period and insert the following: ", or (2) for the payment of long-distance telephone calls."

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, this is in the nature of a technical amendment. This amendment is intended to restore standard language which was inadvertently omitted when the resolution was reported. It authorizes an administrative efficiency by eliminating the need for committee clerks to prepare vouchers for the expense of long distance telephone calls. The bills are paid by the Sergeant of Arms after each committee has had an opportunity to certify the accuracy of its portion. The funding authority of each committee is then debited by the appropriate amount and the Sergeant at Arms appropriations is reimbursed by the aggregate total of all committee long distance charges. This is the same procedure used to pay for the toll calls placed by each Senator's Washington office.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I join my colleagues in supporting this amendment. It is technical. It was inadvertently left out in the printing. It is part of the resolution that was approved by the Rules Committee and I urge its adoption.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I see no other Senator desiring to speak to this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1669) was agreed to.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, as the distinguished Senator from Kentucky has just said, we, as managers of the bill are prepared to address any amendments desired by other Members of the Senate.

It is the intention of the leadership to have this measure move along as expeditiously as possible. Of course, Senators are aware that, for certain technical reasons, the Senate has to act on this measure prior to tomorrow, in order to avoid certain financial hardships.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a brief remark?

Mr. WARNER. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, on behalf of the Members of this body, I want to thank both Senators and other members of the Rules Committee for the service rendered. I have noticed with satisfaction the great volume of work they have done.

I was on the Rules Committee for a time, and I know how tedious a lot of the work is and how personal it is and how voluminous it can be.

Soon after I came to the Senate, I was taken to the White House to meet the President of the United States, Harry Truman. He was formerly a Member of this body. He asked me what committees I was on, and I told him the Rules Committee. He said, "Well, that's a good one, but it's fruitless of thanks." So he explained a little in his good humored way.

I have noticed that the volume continues, and I feel that gratitude, and I think the membership does, for what the committee has done.

I want to join in the tribute to the retiring chairman, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS]. He never gives out. I have enjoyed seeing him in his work on the Senate floor, in his committee. He always makes good speeches and is always prepared on his entire assignments.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, on behalf of the chairman, the ranking minority member, and all the other members of the Rules Committee, I express our heartfelt thanks for the thoughtful remarks of the senior Senator from Mississippi.

There are few among us who have a greater knowledge of the Senate as a whole and responsibilities of Members, and when you take the responsibility yourself, Senator STENNIS, to interject your personal thoughts as you have just done, it is a very special commendation to all of us. I express our appreciation.

Mr. STENNIS. Thank you.

Mr. WARNER. Now, Mr. President, I believe there is another Member on the floor seeking recognition as to the pending business.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am going to offer an amendment. Before I do so I want to address a question or two to the manager of the bill. I confess I have not had time yet to read through this resolution now before us. I certainly am disposed to accept the recommendations of the managers.

But I do have one area of question which I will direct to the Senator from Virginia, if I have his attention: Can he tell me the amount of funding allocated to the Committee on Armed Services? Does that stand right out in this report?

Mr. WARNER. Yes. The Senator is correct. It is in a document that was placed before the Senate by unanimous consent rather than read all the figures.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Does the Senator have the gross figures for Armed Services?

Mr. WARNER. The Committee on the Armed Services has been authorized $2,185,810. At the present time, that allocation of funding is below the level sought by the distinguished chairman and ranking minority member.

When you delete the sequestration, the net figure for Armed Services will be $2,097,190.

I and other members of the Rules Committee are looking at a means by which to accommodate special needs of the Armed Services Committee, needs justified by the ever-increasing responsibilities placed on this committee by the growing defense budget.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am glad to hear the sensitivity of the Senator from Virginia to that point.

I wonder how much on the same basis is allocated to the Rules Committee staff?

Mr. WARNER. The Rules Committee following sequestration would get $1,194,353.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Virginia.

The point I wanted to make, although the statistics do not quite back me up as well as I thought they might, is that the Armed Services Committee, in the view of this Senator, who is a member of that committee, does not have sufficient staff to effectively carry out its duties.

I know it is almost treason to say as much in public today, that we do not have enough staff in this area or that. But I would point out that the defense budget is nearly a third, it is in any event 28 to 29 percent of total Federal spending, and among other things with which the Armed Services Committee shares is the oversight of those expenditures, some pretty close to $300 billion and that is an awful lot of oversight to be undertaken by the limited number of staff which we have.

Now, let me illustrate with a concrete example. The Senator from New Hampshire chairs the Subcommittee on Preparedness. The Preparedness Subcommittee is principally charged with reviewing and overseeing the operations and maintenance budget, which is a substantial part of the defense budget, approximately $80 billion in fiscal year 1986, and the chairman has available to him in that responsibility a total of one staff member to help him oversee some $80 billion in spending.

I suggest to my colleague that there is no way that I or any Senator with one staff member can do an effective job of oversight under those circumstances.

I suggest further that it is a false economy. I bet we could save the salary of several staff members a thousand times over in efficiencies and economies if we could effectively oversee the O&M budget. But we cannot. I cannot with one staff member. And this is my way of registering a protest, I suppose.

I do not know quite how the allocation between committees is accomplished. I am sure there is a great deal of conscientious effort. I think there is also, I am told, at least a lot of historical precedent involved. Once a committee received a certain amount of money it is sort of difficult ever to cut that individually unless it is on the across-the-board basis.

I wonder if some of these committees are not getting more really than they need and others, for instance the Armed Services Committee, a good deal less.

Has that issue been addressed in this year's allocation?

Mr. WARNER. Yes. I wish to assure the Senator from New Hampshire that the Committee on Rules as a whole considers carefully each budget.

The Senator is correct. Some of these levels of funding have been established over many years traditionally in the Senate. But I have found that recently in view of the constraint on spending that the Committee on Rules is beginning to look into those traditions and make adjustments in the figures where they feel it is appropriate.

I regret that our distinguished former chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Senator STENNIS, has just departed the floor, because I think the very conservation figure that the Armed Services Committee has operated on for many years is derivative of the stewardship, the excellent stewardship, provided first by Richard Russell, then JOHN STENNIS, John Tower, and now the distinguished Senator from Arizona, Mr. GOLDWATER.

The Senator from New Hampshire is correct, having himself served on this Committee of the Armed Services now for over 7 years, recognizing the growth in its responsibilities occasioned by the increases in defense spending.

So we are going to address the shortfall brought to the attention of the rules Committee by Chairman GOLDWATER this year.

Now, there are several means by which that shortfall is going to be addressed. It may well be that one Senator will shortly come to the floor with an alternative which may well be in the form of an amendment today.

But absent that, as the ranking minority member pointed out, there is an established procedure within the Rules Committee now to address anytime in the fiscal year the special needs of a committee.

Perhaps my colleague would like to comment.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, and I thank him, I believe it was Senator BYRD's resolution that we followed some several years ago and it was not one of those things that you or I, either one, would like to do because we are dealing in an impersonal way, as Senator STENNIS said a few moments ago, but we cut all of the committees 10 percent and almost $5 million, and we have refused to allow those committee expenditures to go up.

So with inflation and other things, I think it is indicative of what the Rules Committee has been trying to do over the years. What we did this time is that the committees will take a smaller cut than your office account. So when you look at your personal office and it takes a deeper cut than your committees, I think the Rules Committee came up with some innovative ideas as it related to funding for the committees.

So I say to my distinguished friend that I hope that what he is driving at is not to ask for more money for the various committees and therefore we can continue along the Gramm-Rudman path that he wants us to follow, and if you think it is tough this year, you wait until we get into 18- or 20-percent cuts beginning next year, and it will be somewhat tougher, and you will be coming and saying we are getting cut 20 percent and that is about $400,000.

You are not only not getting additional help, but you are probably losing a staff member, and you are going to have to burn some midnight oil yourself or more of it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from New Hampshire is not arguing for the overall greater staff budget for the Senate.

I am simply suggesting that the allocation of staff resources between committees should not rest on historical practice, because responsibilities change over the years, but should rather reflect the responsibilities of each committee.

I have not attended the Rules Committee. I am sure their workload is very heavy. But let us recall that the Rules Committee deals largely with housekeeping functions of the Senate. I do not want any of my housekeeping functions cut off. But it gets $1.2 million for staff.

The Rules Committee—and I do not mean just to pick on that one—since they make up the budget are in a privileged position I suppose: $1.1 million for Rules which oversees the housekeeping in the Senate, and $2.1 million for the Armed Services Committee which oversees $300 billion in spending on perhaps, at least in the opinion of this Senator, the most important business of the National Government.

(Mr. COHEN assumed the chair.)

Mr. FORD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Of course.

Mr. FORD. It does not take nearly as long and nearly the wailing and gnashing of teeth to work out the funding for the Department of Defense as it does to try to have TV in the Senate.

Every document that a Senator sends out, as it relates to the expenses of his office, is audited by the Rules Committee. All those are our responsibilities.

The functions of the Senate and the housekeeping is just part of it. We are the overseers. We have oversight of all of the offices to try to hold the expenses down, not only for the personal offices but for the committees.

If the Senate sees its way clear to alter what we have done, that is the will of the Senate. That is the way for all committees. So if a Senator has a problem with what we are doing, enter an amendment, and let us have a vote on it. If not, we would like to get this budget passed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I may well take the Senator up on his invitation next year.

Mr. FORD. I know the Senator will.

Mr. HUMPHREY. And I am not prepared to do so this year. But I am hoping to encourage a discussion of this issue because on the surface it appears the allocation of resources between the committees is not consistent with the changed responsibilities of those committees.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, if the Senator will indulge me just for a moment, since there are now persons following this matter, and possibly listening by radio, I would state the following observations. The Rules and Administration Committee is composed of some of the most senior and experienced Members of the U.S. Senate: Retiring chairman, Mr. MATHIAS; Mr. HATFIELD, chairman of the Appropriations Committee; Mr. MCCLURE, chairman of the Energy Committee; Mr. HELMS, chairman of the Agriculture Committee; myself; Mr. DOLE, the majority leader; Mr. STEVENS, the senior member of the Appropriations Committee; Mr. GARN, chairman of the Banking Committee.

On the minority side, the distinguished ranking minority member Mr. FORD; Mr. PELL, ranking on Foreign Relations; Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, the minority leader of the Senate; Mr. INOUYE, the senior member of the Appropriations Committee; Mr. DECONCINI, the senior member of the Appropriations; and Mr. GORE.

So I think we have a very good prospect in the Senate to look at the very issues raised by our distinguished colleague from New Hampshire with great care.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I must say that is a very impressive roster. But I would ask the Senator from Virginia to offer his opinion on whether he would consider it adequate to have as an example one staff member assigned to the chairman of the subcommittee which oversees $80 billion in spending? Do you think any chairman with such subcommittee with such responsibilities can adequately discharge those responsibilities with one staff member?

Mr. WARNER. I say to the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, having again indeed served with him for these 7 years plus on the Armed Services Committee, that I recognize the increasing difficulty of his subcommittee as well as other subcommittees of the Armed Services Committee to discharge their duties in view of the restraints on the budget overall at the Armed Services Committee.

With specific reference to the question, and the Senator's subcommittee, I would have to differ to the chairman, Mr. GOLDWATER. But I would say I would be highly supportive of any recommendation the chairman might have with respect to the staffing situation of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. President, I will not dwell on this point further. My real purpose in addressing this point was just to focus attention on it. I do think it is an area that needs attention very badly in fact. I hope some enterprising reporter will dig into this matter so that we might encourage a public dialog as well as between Senators.

AMENDMENT NO. 1670

(Purpose: To express the sense of the Senate with respect to the conducting of an investigation by the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, and for other purposes)

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, my main purpose is to offer an amendment, and I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of Senator DOLE, Senator DIXON, and myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HUMPHREY], for himself, Mr. DOLE, and Mr. DIXON, proposes an amendment numbered 1670.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 24, after line 16, add the following reservation:

INVESTIGATION BY THE COMMISSION ON SECURITY AND COOPERATION IN EUROPE

SEC. 23. (a) It is the sense of the Senate that the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe (hereafter in this section known as the "Commission") should—

(1) conduct an investigation to determine—

(A) whether any officer or employee of the United States violated any law of the United States or any State or local law, including any statute, regulation, ordinance, or procedure promulgated pursuant to law, in connection with the defection attempt of Mirsolav Medvid;

(B) the instances in which an individual (other than the individual referred to in clause (A)), who was a national of the Soviet Union or a Soviet-bloc Eastern European country, requested political asylum in the United States and was returned to the authorities of his country in violation of any United States, State, or local law, including any statute, regulation, ordinance, or procedure promulgated pursuant to law; and

(C) whether the treatment accorded to individuals described in clauses (A) and (B) requires changes in the laws of the United States; and

(2) submit a report, not later than one year after the date of adoption of this resolution, to the House of Representatives and the Senate to the findings of such investigation, including any recommendations for changes in the laws of the United States.

(b) Salaries and expenses in connection with the implementation of this section shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate out of the Account for Miscellaneous Items, subject to the following terms and conditions:

(1) The aggregate amount of salaries and expenses payable under this section shall not exceed $200,000.

(2) Such salaries shall be payable only for not more than five individuals at any time—

(A) who shall be employees of the Senate and shall be under the policy direction of the Chairman and Cochairman of the Commission; and

(B) who shall be appointed to perform services in the conduct of activities under this section, on or after the date of adoption of this resolution, and who shall have their compensation fixed at an annual rate, by the Secretary of the Senate, upon the joint recommendation of the Chairman and Cochairman of the Commission.

(3) Payment of expenses shall be disbursed upon vouchers approved jointly by the Chairman and Cochairman of the Commission, and no voucher shall be required for the disbursement of a salary of an individual appointed under paragraph (2).

(4) For purposes of determining whether and to what extent any travel or other official expense incurred by the Commission in carrying out any activity under this section is payable from the contingent fund of the Senate, such expense shall be treated as if it has been incurred by a standing committee of the Senate and as if the Commission and its staff were members and staff, respectively, of such a committee.

(5) Any expense under this section may be payble only if—

(A) the Committee on Rules and Administration of the Senate approves;

(B) such expense is of the type for which payment may be made if incurred by a standing committee of the Senate;

(C) such expense is not attributable to the detailing of employees; and

(D) the payment of such expense is otherwise in accordance with all laws, rules, and regulations governing expenses of standing committees of the Senate.

(6) Not more than $20,000 of the funds made available by this subsection shall be available for the procurement by the Secretary of the Senate, upon the joint recommendation of the Chairman and Cochairman of the Commission, of services, on a temporary basis, of individual consultants, or organizations thereof, with the prior consent of the Committee on Rules and Administration of the Senate. Such services may be procured by contract with the providers acting as independent contractors or, in the case of individuals, by employment at daily rates of compensation not in excess of the per diem equivalent of the highest gross rate of annual compensation which may be paid to employees of a standing committee of the Senate. Any such contract shall not be subject to the provisions of section 5 of title 41, United States Code, or any other provisions of law requiring advertising.

(c) None of the funds may be obligated from the contingent fund of the Senate to carry out any provision of this section on or after a date 30 days after—

(1) the date on which the report described in subsection (a)(2) is submitted, or

(2) a date one year after the date of adoption of this resolution,

whichever comes first.

(d) For purposes of this section, the term "Soviet-bloc Eastern European country" includes Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Poland, and Romania.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, could I ask the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire whether or not he has considered the possibility of a time agreement on this particular amendment?

Mr. HUMPHREY. It had not occurred to me. Does the Senator anticipate a great many amendments to this resolution?

Mr. WARNER. We know of three other amendments.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Why do we not proceed here and see how things develop? If we get bogged down, I would be happy to consider that. I know Senator SIMPSON has a vital interest in this amendment. I am sure he and I could come to some agreement, if one seems indicated.

Mr. WARNER. We will proceed on the assumption that the Senator from New Hampshire will cooperate with the managers if he feels a time agreement is necessary.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, we are getting into a schedule problem as relates to two other pieces of legislation. The majority leader would like to bring them up today. I am not sure that he is expecting a time agreement on amendments of this legislation. I would encourage the distinguished Senator, if he could, to give us a time agreement so we can begin to fit. He can work out his schedule, and the majority leader can bring up the other two pieces of legislation that he would like to bring before the Senate before we leave tonight.

So I would encourage him, if he felt he could, to give us a half an hour divided equally, or something similar—40 minutes, 20 minutes on each side, so we can know. I would say 40 minutes, 20 minutes on each side probably would be a good time limit. We would not want any more than 20 minutes on our side, and may not need all of that.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I understand the wish of the floor manager for the minority side. I would prefer not at this point to enter into such an agreement.

The matter I wish to address is very important, and has in one form or another been before this body for a long time. I do not really wish to be rushed though I do not think it will take a great deal of time.

Mr. President, a little background: Some months ago, about 4 months ago in fact, Senator DIXON and I—and at that time I think it was 60 Senators altogether—sent a resolution to the desk which has lain there since that time, whose purpose was to construct a special ad hoc committee to investigate the case of Myorslav Medvid, the Ukranian sailor who jumped ship, and ultimately left this country back in October.

The cosponsorship of that resolution is now 63 Members of the Senate. The amendment which I have just sent to the desk is similar to that amendment which 63 Senators have cosponsored but represents at least from our point of view something of a compromise.

The resolution offered back in November would have created a special ad hoc committee, as I have said, in the Senate whose members were to be appointed by the majority leader and the minority leader, and which would have been funded, as I recall, by some $300,000 to be drawn from the contingency fund of the Senate.

For various reasons we have elected to modify our approach, and that modification is embodied in the amendment which I sent to the desk a moment ago.

The amendment now before us has the very same purpose—to investigate the Medvid case from top to bottom, and to do so by providing explicit and dedicated resources for that text. But the responsibility for the investigation, instead of being lodged in a special ad hoc committee, would instead be lodged in an existing body of the Congress—namely, the Helsinki Commission. Moreover, the requested funding has been reduced to $200,000; likewise to be drawn from the contingency fund of the Senate.

My principal sponsor, Senator DIXON, is anxious to speak on this subject. I know Senator SIMPSON, who has another point of view, will want to speak, and I will certainly want to respond to his remarks, and perhaps any questions he might care to offer.

Before yielding the floor, Mr. President, perhaps a brief review of the situation of the principal case in mind is in order at this point.

All of this stems from the Medvid incident which began in the evening of October 24 of last year when Soviet seaman Myroslav Medvid placed his personal possessions into a glass jar and jumped 40 feet off the Soviet freighter, the Marshal Konev, into the hurricane broiled waters of the Mississippi River.

To make a tragic story short, while he was in the hands of the border patrol, a call was placed to a contract interpreter, Irene Padoch, who at that time was in New York City. Mrs. Padoch subsequently stated in her testimony before the Senate that in her conversation with Medvid he several times asked for asylum, making it perfectly clear that he did not want to return to the ship or the Soviet Union.

Despite that, tragically, Medvid was placed in the hands of the shipping agent who has the contract for that particular cargo and they proceeded to return him by launch to the Konev.

As the launch approached the Konev, this time, I guess, at 2 or 3 in the morning, pitch dark, in the midst of the hurricane, or perhaps it was only a tropical storm at that time, Mr. Medvid on approaching the ship jumped once again into the Mississippi River, swam ashore, was run down there and bound, according to the shipping agents as quoted in the press. He struggled violently. He screamed and resisted in every way he could. Apparently, he was nonetheless forcibly returned to the Konev and disappeared into that vessel for several days before he was seen further by an American.

At that point he was examined and we got some of the details. For the purpose of brevity, he was examined by American physicians, taken ashore and questioned at some length by State Department officials, and ultimately signed a statement indicating that he was returning to the Soviet Union of his own free will.

Before he was finally, for the last time, turned over to the Soviets, the Senate Agriculture Committee issued a subpoena for Mr. Medvid, the subpoena of which the administration was aware, of which the executive department of the Government was aware, to which the executive attached no particular or obvious importance for the executive department chose not to exercise its authority under regulations under which it could have detained Medvid, under which they can detain any alien wanted for investigation by the executive, judicial or legislation branches of the Government.

For what reason the executive department chose not to detain the man who was clearly wanted by the legislative branch for investigation I have not been able to determine, though I have written the Justice Department months ago asking for an explanation. I have so far received only a bureaucratic letter.

That, at least from my point of view, is a barebones recap of that tragic episode.

A lot of questions were asked at the time, and even more afterwards, about the event. A lot of contentions and allegations were voiced.

Very early on I voiced a wish for a full fledged investigation independent of the executive, that is, a legislative investigation. That is why back in November, Senator DIXON and I, a total of 63 Senators, asked for an investigation. Many questions remain to this day.

Why did the executive ignore the subpoena?

Why did it fail to detain Medvid when he was known to be wanted for a legislative investigation?

To his credit, Senator SIMPSON, our colleague from Wyoming, chairman of the Immigration Subcommittee, since Mr. Medvid's departure, has held, I believe, two hearings which have answered to some degree, and I think in some cases to a large degree, some of those questions.

But I would observe that so far we have heard mostly from those who would defend the administration or themselves, for that matter. We have heard from the border patrol agents that they think they did everything right, that they do not think Mr. Medvid really wanted asylum. We heard from the physicians who examined him, who said he was in good shape. But we have not heard from independent medical experts their opinion on whether Medvid was in fact in good shape or could have been in good shape knowing that he had been heavily drugged.

We have not heard from the administration why they chose to ignore the subpoena, and so on.

My point is that 4 months after the episode we still have a great many questions unanswered. We still are in need of a top-to-bottom investigation. It is my view, and evidently the view of 63 Senators including the majority leader, that existing committees, because of their many responsibilities and, in some cases, staff which are inadequate, considering the burden of responsibilities and the pending agenda, simply cannot provide this kind of top-to-bottom investigation which is needed in a case like this.

So that is my point of view.

The Senator from Wyoming has a somewhat different point of view. We have butted heads and locked horns on this now for many weeks. I have grown to respect him even more, although I have sometimes wondered under my breath about his obstinance. I will leave it at that for the moment.

Mr. FORD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There appears to be a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, Senator HUMPHREY and I came to this body in the same year. I remember we both appeared at a campaign gathering together when we were in the general election campaign. I came to know him then. I have come to have a high regard for him, I can assure you. It is a friendship that I enjoy. His wife Patty is a good and fine friend.

He speaks of the obstinance of the Senator from Wyoming. I always say it takes one to know one, I will say in exchange! That is what makes him an effective Senator. I have seen him take on issues and doggedly pursue them until he wins the day. This may be one of those. At least his day will not be won in the subcommittee which I chair, where I am doing everything I possibly can to examine into the Medvid incident.

It is almost a thing with an eternal life, I guess.

Medvid was here. He jumped or fell off a ship. He was taken back by the shipping agent with no one from the Federal Government present. He was later taken into a nonthreatening situation. He was examined by a psychiatrist and a doctor of the United States in the presence of Soviet officials. It was almost as if our Government was cheering for him to ask for asylum. They waited, they asked every single question known to man to ask Miroslav Medvid whether he wanted to stay in the United States of America. They asked him with two different interpreters, they asked him also with a State Department official, who was a superb witness at one of our hearings, and who spoke fluent Russian, as did Mr. Medvid, who was a Ukrainian but spoke fluent Russian and Ukrainian. They asked him time and time again if he wanted asylum.

When we deal with asylum in this country—we had about 65,000 petitions when I was dealing with this matter a few years ago you must recall that all you have to do to ask for asylum in the United States is just say the word or even just grunt. When we pick up people on the shores of the United States and ask them in any language, "Are you seeking asylum? Do you want to be here? Will you be hurt if you return to your country? Will you be slain?" And if they say, "Yes." That is enough. That starts the procedure.

Medvid was asked dozens of times whether he wanted asylum. As I say, one of our Government officials testified that we were almost cheering him to "Just say something," so we could then take him into the United States.

Mr. President, that is what happened in the Medvid case. Errors were made by the INS and discipline was dished out by the INS. The two men who were involved in the original interrogation, having some difficulty with the interpreter and understanding of the interpreter, were both heavily disciplined. If you say you are looking for people on the other side of the issue, how about a couple of witnesses who were disciplined by their own Government? You would think they would probably want to say something harsh. The thing they did say was that they knew the Medvid they saw was the Medvid they saw the first time and they knew he never asked for asylum.

That is what we developed, Mr. President. We have had three public hearings, and two closed sessions which were confidential. I personally sent the most capable and effective chief counsel and staff director, Mr. R.W. Day, to New Orleans. He conducted an intensive staff investigation. Indeed, I have made it a point to advise and to invite participation. I have asked Senator HUMPHREY and any other persons who have signed the letter—and I think we want to keep in context the letter, which has been circulating around for some time now. It essentially is just saying we want to look into asylum procedures in the United States, and I say that is great and I will, and we are.

It says that it is an unfortunate thing that happened with Mr. Medvid, and it could not be more clear that was the case. I believe it even goes on to talk about freedom and this country of freedom and humanitarianism and these things. And I believe in all of these things.

The majority leader is the one who deserves the accolades here. He has put this before us once more, which is appropriate. I am going to vote against it, but I admire the majority leader because, again, the Senator from New Hampshire is an insistent fellow and he was going to see this come up again.

If it had been in its original form, we would have had a much richer debate than we are having here. This measure now provides that this goes on to the Helsinki Commission. That is fine. I hope the Senate can find the $200,000 to go with it from our contingency funds. I understand that those have been pretty well tagged in the times of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

I want to share with you two things. I have not heard it brought up in today's debate. We are now told that perhaps there was a "substitute Medvid." That makes good copy—and you may remember that yesterday I talked about how often things in here flow along on a kind of tide of emotion and fear and guilt and racism. I said that yesterday. Now, when America tunes into this Chamber, it will find that that is how we often do our business in here—some amalgam, some blend of emotion, fear, guilt, or racism. That is the way it is.

Then thoughtful Republicans and Democrats have to come along and, as I say, police up after that and try to get the work done.

Mr. President, I said two things. I do not think there is a question in any thoughtful person's mind that they probably took Medvid back on that ship and said, "Look, Buster, you want to get something clear: Get the wax out of your ears and tell them you don't want to stay in the United States. Either you do that or we are going to do something bad to your mother and father in the Ukraine."

Does anybody believe that did not happen? I bet it did happen. I would bet a buck that it happened. I bet more than that it happened. But Medvid had a choice. He could have come in and said, "I want asylum in the United States," and then knew he would probably never see his mother and father again. He knew—and he is over there now, going to school apparently, according to TASS, and he is inviting us to come over there and visit with him. He is inviting Members of Congress to come over and chat with his mother and father and himself. I would be interested to know anyone who would do that and I even think a bit of it myself.

But the indication may be that he was told just exactly that: "Either you get out there and say you don't want to get into this country or something bad is going to happen."

The testimony showed that he mentioned "mama and papa" several times to the psychiatrist. Indeed, he did. And why not? Those who share the hardest-possible-line view of the Soviet Union would have to believe that indeed did happen.

Then the second one is the substitute Medvid. If you were really going to substitute a Medvid, why would you not get a guy who would get up and say, "I want to go back to the motherland; this country is trash. I want to get back on that ship and I want to go to the Soviet Union, and I am Myroslav Medvid, and let's start the ship."

Why would they substitute some stumblebum who could not say anything, according to what the testimony is? He could not say he wanted asylum. They asked him. He quietly responded, "No, no." That is what really happened.

If you are going to substitute a Medvid, then get a Medvid who is a good old hardliner who is going to get in a private visit with United States officials and say, "Don't you touch me and you put me back on that boat and I want to go to the Soviet Union."

That is what a substitute Medvid would have done. If this were a substitute, he was the worst possible person to pick. We have an absolute chain of eyewitness identification of this man. No one has challenged that yet. Link by link: "Is this the man you saw first?" "Is this the man you saw second?" "Is this the man you saw third?"

"Yes, it is." Without question. Without any question.

Mr. President, a lot of questions remain. I am sure we will find them. As to the denial of the subpoena, I have a couple more hearings to go. I would like to get the shipping agent in there and ask him what he did see on that ship when nobody else was present.

He was alleged to have beaten his head on the rocks, yet he was examined by eyewitnesses or by physicians who said there were just maybe some rough marks on his arms where they had jerked him around, and of course, the injury to his left arm.

I guess the thing that I have to work through is where is the real reason—there is always a reason for something around here. We sometimes spend more time trying to find the real reason. If we are looking for the sinister final link, which I guess is a phone call from George Schultz, the Secretary of State, to the INS, which would say, "Put this man back on the ship and get him out of here so we don't mess up the Summit Conference," I am willing to ask George Schultz to come and testify. Knowing that remarkable and most capable man—who is anathema to some in so many of these movements—he could come and testify to that effect. That link I do not think you are ever going to find, because no one else has even ever indicated that it happened.

Then we have a theory of secret agreements with the U.S.S.R. on grain shipments and on cultural exchange to guarantee the return of Russian defectors—always and every time, without their being able to ask for asylum.

We have gone all through that. I had a strange comment when this thing first occurred. I said, "Have you ever run this thing on the flip side? We have hundreds of U.S. seamen in Soviet waters. Are you saying that they could be taken off a ship with some kind of legal proceedings from the Politburo and then not be able to have an American present while they are being interrogated?"

I do not think that one would sell very well. That is the flip side. They say that he should not have been in the presence of any Soviet officials when he was being examined. Well, flip that around and try that on hundreds and hundreds of U.S. citizens in Soviet waters who could be lifted from a craft with some kind of legal document, subpoena or whatever, and then taken into a separate locale without any American presence and then told, "We know you want to stay in the Soviet Union and tell us that right now." An interesting point, I think.

Finally, there has been an unfortunate occurrence, and it is painful. Some have made an issue of alleged insensitivity to the Ukrainian ethnic group. That is very unfortunate. I do not know where that ever came to pass. It certainly did not spring from me. I have had some rather harsh, nasty letters from the Ukrainian community that somehow we are doing a terrible thing or something is occurring that should not be. That is unfortunate. In the testimony of that ethnic community it was obvious that there is a deep feeling about the Russification of the Ukrainians.

I try to be sensitive to that, but I do not think the average American knows that there is a distinct difference—and yet is is very real—between the Ukranian and the Russian. To put some ethnic twist on that I think is very unfortunate, and they made it somewhat of an issue, a deeply emotional issue at that.

I have the deepest respect, admiration and regard for the Ukranian community. They have been abolished—eliminated in many cases by the Russians. That is why they had an interpreter who spoke both Ukranian and Russian for this man, on the second go-round. Medvid chose to speak in Russian. The ship captain was Ukranian. Those are some distorted things that go with the emotion and the feelings on this issue. But it is typical of everything you do when you get to one like this.

The American people do not even understand the difference between a refugee, an asylum seeker, an economic migrant, an extended voluntary departee or immigrant. So how do you get them to make a distinction like this one cited?

I have been there. People talk about refugees and immigrants in the same breath—and the difference between them is worlds. One is here to work and earn and the other is here out of flight, fleeing persecution or having a well-founded fear of persecution, based on race, religion, national origin, and the other conditions.

I can only say to you that here you can release this into the Helsinki Commission and spend the $200,000. I am not going to support that. I go against that. I deeply admire the majority leader for bringing it to your attention. I will not go against his position on bringing it up. I think it is important. I am pleased that, if it does pass, at least we will just go right ahead in the Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy and do our work, which we are doing.

In fact, I had two closed hearings especially for those who seem to be so destructive of the INS and what it was doing. At one point they did not even feel that they could attend. I am ready to do some more of those. I am ready to subpoena anybody that somebody wants to trot up for a subpoena. We are going to talk with the shipping agent.

But somewhere along the line, as I have said before in this place, the ball game has 9 innings. If everything has 22 innings, then we are going to be here a long time. That is why we often spend such a long time here. Sometimes there must be finality in something. Medvid is gone. The INS made a mistake. People were disciplined. Procedures have been put into place to try to avoid it. People will jump ship all the time. And guess what? None of them want to get back on the ship. Isn't that an interesting thing? Why do you jump ship? You get off the ship because you want off the ship. And when you go to them and say, "Do you want to go back on the ship?" They say, "No," without exception. We pick up people from the Soviet bloc and Eastern bloc countries. We pick them up from all over the world every day. We have only had one Medvid incident in that process. Some are processed in, some are rejected, some are given asylum, some are not, and it goes on every day in the United States of America.

This man is gone. There is nothing to do about that except you can go visit him, according to Tass, pay a call on him. He is there live, pictured with his family the other day.

It does not matter if there were two Medvids or 15 Medvids. They are all gone. The issue is an error was made. People paid for their error. The Secretary of State was not involved to tell anyone to end the operation so we would not ruin the summit. That is a strained interpretation.

We are preparing a report on the Medvid incident from the subcommittee, the staff investigation, and the subcommittee hearings. As I say, we have had three separate open hearings, and two closed. The subcommittee members have been marvelously helpful. The subcommittee consists of Senators KENNEDY, SIMON, DENTON, and GRASSLEY. We do our work and have been doing it I think quite well for many years. So I stand ready to investigate any new material, anything at all. Bring it in, trot it up. Any legitimate issue relating to Medvid, bring it in, roll it out. We will have a shot at it. If you want to subpoena somebody, let us subpoena somebody. We will look at that and any appropriate witnesses or documents if there are any further facts to be ascertained. I pledge to do that.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. DOLE addressed the chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I wonder if it is possible to get a time agreement on this amendment.

Mr. FORD. I say to the majority leader I am perfectly willing and tried earlier, but the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire thought we ought to discuss it some. I am willing to do whatever is amenable.

Mr. DOLE. How much time does the Senator from Illinois require?

Mr. DIXON. I do not think the Senator from Illinois would require a great deal of time. I am here to be entirely supportive of my friend from New Hampshire and whatever he would indicate is an appropriate amount of time for him would be satisfactory.

But I might say to my friend from New Hampshire that my talks with my distinguished friend from Kentucky have not been fruitful, and I expect that there will be a rollcall and recorded vote. Given that, I expect that we are going to have to convince our colleagues of the merit of our cause, the Senator might want to take that into account when he indicates to the distinguished majority leader how much time he requires.

Mr. HUMPHREY. If the majority leader will yield, I advise my colleague from Illinois that I have already spoken, I do not expect to have to say anything further. So it is really a matter of how much time the Senator from Illinois wants.

Mr. DIXON. I think that 10 minutes or so would be adequate for the Senator from Illinois to express his warm support for what his friend from New Hampshire is trying to do.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Kentucky will not require a great deal of time and we are checking with the distinguished minority leader to see if we can reach a time agreement.

I support the amendment. I have cosponsored the amendment, and I understand the outstanding work that has been done in the subcommittee. However, as I have explained to my colleague and friend from Wyoming, when I am presented with a problem, I try to find a solution. And I think the so-called Helsinki Commission does provide a forum. It does not take away anything from the subcommittee, but it does provide a forum.

I hope we can dispose of this matter. We have been an hour on this amendment, or almost an hour, and there is one additional amendment.

Mr. FORD. Maybe two.

Mr. DOLE. I think the Senator from California may not offer his amendment so it would be one by the Senator from Alaska. We still have to do reconciliation this afternoon.

Mr. FORD. Mr President, will the distinguished majority leader yield for a point?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. FORD. I have a problem with the solution proposed by the majority leader.

This may involve the illegal use of Senate funds; 2 U.S.C. 68-2 restricts the use of contingency funds of the Senate to those expenses which are intimately and directly connected with the routine legislative business of the Senate.

I believe that the amendment strays from that statute by making the Senate contingency funds available for operations outside the Senate.

I reluctantly say to my distinguished leader that this would be a bad and possibly illegal precedent. I am not saying it is, and I am not a lawyer. But my advice is that this certainly strays from the statutes. Of course, whatever the Senate wants to do, it is up to the Senate. But I want to warn my colleagues that we could be bumping up against something costing $200,000, and under Gramm-Rudman we are trying to cut back.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I only indicate that the amendment was drafted, as I understand, by Senate counsel, and I hope they would not draft legislation that would be in violation of another section of law.

I do not quarrel with the point of the Senator from Kentucky. I think it is a good point, and the RECORD should reflect that.

In my view, this is an important amendment to many people on this floor, and it is an important amendment to many people across this country. I have spoken to many of them, in Chicago and Detroit and other places.

Debating this from the standpoint of dollars, I hope we can dispose of the amendment in the next 15 or 20 minutes.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I say to the majority leader that my remarks will be very brief. I think that in 7 or 8 minutes I can clarify my position in this matter; and if it accommodates the Senator from New Hampshire and everyone else, I will be willing to vote as soon as possible.

I should like to express the very strong feelings of the Ukrainian people in Cook County and elsewhere around my State who feel very strongly about this.

Mr. FORD. I know this is not quite what the majority leader wanted, but would he enter into a unanimous-consent agreement that we vote no later than 3:30 and that the time between now and 3:30 be equally divided?

Mr. DOLE. That is fine.

Mr. DIXON. That is satisfactory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, we could save about 20 minutes by having a voice vote.

Mr. FORD. I say to my distinguished friend that if the amendment is going to be defeated by a voice vote, I will be glad to do that. Otherwise, I will ask for a rollcall vote. The point is about spending $200,000, the possibility of an illegal expenditure, or having the Committee on the Judiciary, which has the full authority to investigate this matter, continue to do the job.

We passed Gramm-Rudman, of which the Senator from New Hampshire was a cosponsor, I suspect, and now we are trying to spend $200,000 more, when we already have a function of the Senate in place.

Has the unanimous-consent request been propounded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I want to respond quickly to the point about spending the money. This would require a brief program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, could I alter the request and say that the unanimous-consent agreement is that we vote by 3:20, not later than 3:20?

Mr. DOLE. That is fine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FORD. And the time be equally divided, so that it will be 15 minutes on each side.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I do not expect to take the entire time allotted to our side.

I had occasion some months ago to be in the city of Chicago—I should correct that to say outside the city of Chicago—near O'Hare Airport, with my friend from New Hampshire, at which time we met with a large Ukrainian group from my State concerning this question.

I can assure my colleagues in the Senate, wherever they might be, if they are listening to the discussion here on the floor on their squawk boxes, that there is an immense amount of concern in the Ukrainian community in the country about what happened in the Myroslav Medvid case.

I say to my distinguished friend from Wyoming, for whom all of us have the greatest personal regard, that I mean it as no reflection on the good work he does in the Senate or whatever may be done in the hearings before that subcommittee, that there is an impression out there in the country among people who are vitally concerned about this issue that we are not obtaining a full airing of the Myroslav Medvid case; and those people who come to this country from other shores have the right to know the true facts about this.

There truly is a belief in the country, among a great many people, that a different person was involved on one of the occasions and that there are at least two people who represented themselves to be Mr. Medvid.

Again I am forced to say what I said before, when we talked about this question on the floor of the Senate. To suggest that a man jumps into the Mississippi River twice and slashes his wrists when he wants to go back to the Iron Curtain, I think that stretches the imagination of most people that I know pretty far.

I can see no reason why we ought not get to the bottom of the facts in this case and reveal the whole truth to the satisfaction of the country as a whole. I do not care what forum it takes.

I do not recall the exact number that my distinguished friend from New Hampshire had on that original resolution, but I think it was over 60 Members of this body who wanted to know all the facts in this case. I stand to be corrected, and hope my colleague will correct me if I am in error about this, but I believe that the 60-some Members of this body were evenly divided between members of the majority and minority who were anxious to have the truth in this matter.

I am sure that my distinguished friend from Wyoming and others who have looked into it are doing a conscientious job in respect to this, but it simply is not being elevated to the prominence it would receive if we had a separate look at it by some duly-constituted authority such as now is suggested in this most recent amendment. I believe you will find that there will be more confidence in the country as a whole if it is done that way.

In conclusion, I want to remind everybody in the Senate that we are a great Nation, made up of a lot of people who came here from other countries. A good many of them have come to our shores and enjoy the great dreams this Nation makes available to all our people who come from countries where they did not have those dreams. Many have relatives and friends still in those countries. They are concerned about sanctuary and asylum for their loved ones and friends and relatives and others who might want to come to this country. They are concerned about the integrity of our system and about whether our laws work well and whether the services that are supposed to protect citizens in these places perform adequately.

There are newspaper and other media accounts that that did not work well in the Medvid case. We should learn our lesson from that. We should find out what occurred in that case and should try to do better in the future.

Without taking any more time of the Senate, I hope we give this a separate airing. I say that if we do not take this opportunity to do it right now, regrettably there will be a vast number of people in this country—many of whom came to our shores convinced of the demonstrated integrity of our democratic institutions—who will feel that this matter was swept under the table and that we have not given an adequate investigation of the circumstances of this case.

So I urge my colleagues in the Senate, and particularly on this side, to support my friend from New Hampshire.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, this is an emotional issue, and I understand the emotion.

I understand my distinguished colleague from Illinois. This is a haven. This country has opened its arms forever. We are all made up of people from someplace else.

We are now seeing a revival of American spirit as it relates to refurbishing the lady in the harbor in New York. I know the young folks in my community are collecting nickels and dimes to refurbish the Statute of Liberty.

I think that we get down to several questions that are involved here.

Where is the money coming from? It is coming out of the contingency fund. There is no money in the contingency fund. We will have to go to the Appropriations Committee. We will have to appropriate the money. We just stuck them for $3.5 million to put TV and radio in the Senate. And now we want to go back for more.

I hear the cries in this Chamber, until it bother them a little, let us cut back on everything; let us start reducing; let us get a balanced budget.

What is the procedure of the Senate? The procedure of the Senate is that we already have a committee to investigate. We already have done some investigation. We have already held hearings both private, closed hearings, and public hearings. And we are going to have some more. But that is not satisfactory.

We have to basically break that statute, one, and two, basically break the contingency fund.

Now, I am not a lawyer. My dad told me a long time ago, "Get yourself a good lawyer and stay with him."

My good lawyers say without going to court they think that we are on the verge of breaking the statute.

Supplementing the Helsinki Commission funding—that is what this amendment does.

This amendment is highly unusual in that it uses the contingency fund of the Senate of the United States to supplement the operation of a panel whose appropriations are funded outside the legislative branch.

We have a question here now of more than just investigation of Mr. Medvid.

Do we follow the law or do we, because we are a deliberative body, the greatest deliberative body in the world, by 51 votes or a majority vote, eliminate the statutes? That is the question you have to decide in your own mind.

There are Members who are not members of the legislative branch and there are members of the executive branch. I do not hear the executive branch down here wanting this money because their members are on the Helsinki Commission.

I go back and repeat what I said earlier, that 2 U.S.C. 68-2 restricts the use of the contingency fund. It restricts the use of the contingency fund of the Senate to those expenses which are "intimately and directly connected with the routine legislative business of the Senate."

So, Mr. President, I believe this amendment strays and strays widely from the statutes by making the Senate contingency fund available for the operations of an intergovernmental panel.

Beyond that, if it is not breaking the law, or bending the statutes, this would establish a very bad and possibly illegal precedent. Think about it just a little bit on that basis.

Sure, there are emotions. Sure, there are questions.

And if the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire would like to offer an amendment to take the $200,000 from one of his committees, that is another proposition. He might want to amend his amendment to say he is going to take the money from one of the Senate standing committees. Take it from the Judiciary Committee. Have them just eliminate their subcommittee that now has jurisdiction. Send that money to the Judiciary Committee. But we do not have the money in the contingency fund to support this amendment.

The money comes from a line item in the budget—I am sure the distinguished Senators are aware of that—entitled "resolution and reorganization reserve." It is in the legislative appropriations account. It is under miscellaneous items, if you want to get down into details. This would be the source of the funding that is being asked for under this amendment.

And if you want to know the facts of it, the reserve that you are asking money to be dispensed from has already been overobligated. So, you are going to have to go back to the Appropriations Committee; the Appropriations Committee is going to have to recommend that we appropriate some more money.

So when we have already overobligated the funding and we are trying to cut back, and we have a committee and a subcommittee to handle it, why do we need another $200,000?

Mr. President, some difficulty will arise and reprogramming will have to be done by the Appropriations Committee and that will even make it more difficult for the Senate to live under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

I am talking about the reasons for this amendment. I do not question the integrity or desires of any of my colleagues. But it comes to a point where we have to, I think, live within our means. We simply do not have the money, simply do not have the money, and we have already overobligated this committee for the funding and now we are going to overobligate it more than $200,000.

This just says take it. When will the supplemental come? When will the distinguished Senators from New Hampshire and Illinois come with their supplemental to give more money to the Appropriations Committee so they can fund the operations of the Senate?

The Rules Committee cut almost $5 million out of the committee budgets and they have survived with that cut. They have survived with that cut and we have held it at zero growth for 5 years now and we used an innovative procedure to not cut the committee's expenses, their budget, any more than necessary.

In fact, we cut the committees' budgets less than we cut in our offices, and we are responsible to our constituents.

You know, there is something funny going on here, and let me just give you an idea where the Helsinki Commission is funded. I wonder if the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire knows where the Helsinki Commission is funded, from what part of the budget those funds are derived. The Department of Transportation. And it is overseen by the GAO. I am informed that that is in error. It is in the Commerce, Justice, State, Judiciary appropriations bill. It is funding for an independent agency, the Helsinki Commission.

Now, we are going to take the contingency funds of the U.S. Senate and bend the statutes and say we are going to fund it even more.

Mr. President, I implore my colleagues. Let us look at the real issue here. We do not have the money, one; two, we have a Judiciary Committee; and, three, they have a subcommittee that handles this particular item. Because some do not believe it was handled right, they want another comission to handle it. They want more money to spend.

I think it is time we say no to the expenditure of these funds, and begin to tell the people who are finally listening to us for a change that we are not going to vote for these additional moneys.

If you want the Helsinki Commission to look at it, that is one thing. But paying them to do it is another. I say to my distinguished friends that at some point I am going to get a rollcall vote on this, and we will find out how many people want to spend money, and how many people think we already have a system that is adequate enough to oversee the functions of the Senate.

I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to add $200,000 to the funding of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe—the Helsinki Commission—for the purpose of looking into the United States' treatment of specific asylum requests. I believe that the amendment properly utilizes an existing forum—the Helsinki Commission—for resolution of some questions that pertain to this country's handling of asylum requests.

Specifically the Commission is authorized to examine the singular case of Miroslav Medvid to determine whether asylum procedures were followed. But more broadly, the Commission will examine other instances in which nationals of the Soviet Union or a Soviet-bloc country were denied asylum in violation of a United States statute.

The amendment requires that the Commission shall submit its recommendations not later than 1 year after its establishment.

Many of my colleagues share some serious concerns over the Medvid case that have led us to question the very laws that govern asylum requests. It is my hope that this study might put these concerns to rest.

IN SUPPORT OF THE SPECIAL SENATE PANEL ON POLITICAL ASYLUM

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, as one of the original cosponsors of Senate Resolution 267, I rise in strong support of this important resolution to establish a special Senate panel to investigate the Medvid case and to review our overall political asylum procedures.

The question at issue here is a very basic one: Will our Government, in a consistent and fair way, continue its historic tradition of offering protection in the United States to those fleeing political oppression.

I believe we must, and I believe the American people support this view.

A critically, important part of the effort to guarantee the preservation of asylum protections will be the investigation conducted by the special panel into two important matters.

First will be its review of the case of the Ukrainian sailor, Miroslav Medvid. I believe the sensitivities of the Ukrainian community over the handling of the Medvid case are very legitimate, and are ones which I share. It is my hope that the findings of the panel will give us a better understanding of the apparently contradictory actions he took in first jumping ship, and later, agreeing to return to the Soviet Union.

Beyond this, I believe it is critically important that we review all of our existing asylum procedures to ensure that every consideration is given to the requests of those seeking political asylum in the United States. That will be the second task of the special panel.

Mr. President, in preparation for its centennial celebration this year, the Statue of Liberty is undergoing an extensive physical restoration. As we enhance the beauty of this impressive symbol of liberty and justice, we must also ensure that our Nation lives up to the Liberty's promise of hope to those seeking political freedom.

The special panel's investigation will make an important contribution toward that effort, and I congratulate the Senate on allowing the panel to begin its work by approving this important legislation.●

Mr. HUMPHREY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield time? We are on a time agreement, are we not?

Mr. WARNER. I will yield such time as the distinguished Senator——

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, what is the situation with regard to time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has 1 minute remaining, and the Senator from Virginia has 6 minutes remaining.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I will be guided by my colleague from Wyoming. I had to go to a committee hearing for a moment. He was more or less manager at the time.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I understand 1 minute remains for Senator FORD.

I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I might well clarify who is managing the time on behalf of the proponents of the amendment. Is it the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. WARNER. The time agreement was made in the absence of the Senator from Virginia who had to go to a committee meeting. I will have to defer to my distinguished colleague from Wyoming who represented to me that he would manage the bill in my absence.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire as the mover has control of the time.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Very well, I thank the Chair for that clarification

Mr. President, I do not see any need to extend the debate any great amount. I would simply reiterate for the benefit of my colleagues and their staffs who may be listening that this is a compromise approach worked out with the majority leader.

The language was drafted with the assistance and approval of legislative counsel. We believe it to be consistent with the law.

The Helsinki Commission, which body this investigation would go to, is an official agency of the Congress.

I believe this is a good approach, Mr. President. I believe this will enable us to provide dedicated resources is a way that again would otherwise be done for a top-to-bottom investigation of this matter, which is now 4 months old.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the majority leader, Senator DOLE be added as an original cosponsor of Senate Resolution 267.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Just a point of clarification. That is the original legislation which has been at the desk for some 4 months—not the amendment which is now pending although the majority leader is likewise a cosponsor of the amendment now pending.

Inasmuch as it has been 4 months since this matter was last on the floor, Mr. President, perhaps it would be—on second thought, I will not do that. I was considering reading a list of cosponsors. I guess that is redundant at this late juncture.

Let me ask unanimous consent that the list of the cosponsors of Senate Resolution 267, the original legislation on this point, which has not been modified in the form of the amendment before the Senate, namely, that the cosponsors of the original legislation be made a part of the record at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COSPONSORS TO SENATE RESOLUTION 267

*After name means not original cosponsor.

REPUBLICANS (35)

Abdnor, Andrews, Armstrong, Boschwitz, Chafee*, D'Amato, Denton, Dole, Domenici*, East, Garn, Gorton*, Grassley, Hatch, Hawkins, Hecht, Heinz, and Helms.

DEMOCRATS (29)

Baucus, Boren, Bradley, Bumpers, Burdick, DeConcini, Dixon, Dodd*, Eagleton, Exon, Ford, Glenn, Gore, Harkin, and Heflin.

Johnston*, Kerry, Lautenberg, Long, Melcher, Mitchell, Moynihan, Proxmire, Pryor, Riegle, Rockefeller, Sarbanes, Simon, and Zorinsky.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, does the Senator from Illinois wish to speak?

Mr. DIXON. If my colleague has concluded, I would like to make one more brief remark.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Let us reserve 1 minute. I yield all remaining time except 1 minute to the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, may I simply say this: No one in this Chamber has warmer personal regards for the distinguished senior Senator from Kentucky than this Member. But to argue the merits of Gramm-Rudman on an issue as minuscule against all we do here, the issue whether we ought to make $200,000 out of a $1 trillion budget available to look into the question of whether people who come to our shores may be protected in their interest in living in a freedom-loving Nation rather than being returned to Iron Curtain countries I think is a remarkable argument: specious in character, and largely irrelevant to the subject matter at hand.

I cannot imagine any subject matter more important and more dear to the hearts of America than the question of whether people who come to these shores can be protected by our laws, and entitled to the integrity of our system from the standpoint of remaining here if that is their real desire.

And the whole question here is did Medvid have that protection? Did we mess up? Did we do the right thing here, or do we in our system fail to protect the rights of individuals who were entitled to the protection of our laws, and want to remain in this country? I think this is a very small investment to look into that question. I hope my colleagues will support the resolution of my friend from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I yield the balance of my time to the distinguished Senator from Wyoming.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, "specious"? Wait until my mother hears that! [Laughter.]

Then, I say to my friend from Kentucky that my father was a lawyer and I too practiced law. And my father always said that "If anybody goes to jail, be sure its your client." [Laughter.]

I have tried to live that way. Let me say this to the Senator:

I hear totally what the Senator from Illinois is saying. But let it be absolutely clear that this country spends hundreds of millins of dollars on refugees, asylees and even people who are here illegally—millions and hundreds of millions.

So you know, I hope we can keep the Statue of Liberty still glowing there in the harbor. It does not say on it to send us everybody you have got legally or illegally. That is not what it says. But that is not this issue. You have a man that had every possible opportunity to ask for asylum, and he did not do so. I wish he had. So does the State Department. So does the INS. They could have tortured him, I guess, to say he did. But he did not, because he wanted to go home, and he is home. That is the way that is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. SIMPSON. I ask unanimous consent for 1 additional minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. Let me say the Senator from New Hampshire has asked for an independent investigation. That is what he is receiving through the Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy. If we put it in the Helsinki Commission, we are not getting it independently because we have members of the executive branch on that commission. I think that is important to consider. Old witnesses will be presented. There are no new witnesses. You have a new commission. You examine the same witnesses. There are no new people unless you go to Russia and hold it there. I guess we could do that. Any witness you have before the subcommittee is your witness in the Helsinki Commission.

Mr. HUMPHREY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I would make these final points: That 2 days ago the Senate wisely in my opinion made $3.3 million available from the contingency fund for a very short-range experiment in televising the Senate. The amount we are asking for here for this important investigation is one-seventeenth of that, approximately—one-seventeenth.

Again, I make the point that it will not result in new expenditures but rather require, as the TV in the Senate matter requires, a reprogramming—not new appropriations, but rather a reprogramming, and slight, tiny, miniscule reordering of our priorities.

Mr. President, if the manager on the other side is prepared to yield back his time, if he has any, I am likewise prepared to do the same.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPECTER). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment (No. 1670) was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, the matter pending before the Senate is open to further amendment. The leadership is interested in having this matter resolved in as short a time as possible so that we can turn to other matters on the calendar. It is the hope of the Senator from Kentucky and myself that Senators who desire to bring forth amendments will please do so as quickly as possible.

Mr. President, I see no Member of the Senate seeking recognition. Therefore, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I see the distinguished majority leader is on the floor. He is eager—maybe more so than I am but not much more—that we go ahead with this piece of legislation. We are waiting for one amendment that this Senator, for one, will oppose. I hope we shall be through by 4 o'clock or even before that. I encourage any of those Senators listening—I understand we have one or possibly two more amendments. I would like to get rid of them as soon as possible and will help the majority leader as much as I can.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the distinguished Senator from Kentucky. I would like to finish this by 4 o'clock or not later than 4:15 or 4:30.

We have submitted a copy of the reconciliation proposal to the distinguished minority leader. I must say we have not yet had agreement from the White House but we will negotiate with them. If we could get a time agreement on reconciliation and dispose of that, it may not take too long. We may have something on OCS, which I do not understand, but it is important to a number of Members on each side. I hope we can work out something like that, because it is very important to the Senator from Kentucky, the Senator from Virginia—any tobacco State Senators. The tobacco tax expires tomorrow at midnight. If we can expedite this, I shall try to do the reconciliation package next.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I should think it would be very important to the administration, too, because the tax on cigarettes expires at midnight tomorrow and the administration has used that tax in the budget submission for fiscal 1987.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. FORD. So we are all kind of caught up in the need to move that on. I hope that any agreement that could be reached on reconciliation would also be in agreement with the House measure. They are very fidgety, as I understand it, about receiving anything back from us. Now this ball has started bouncing. A lot of people have a great deal of interest in certain items in this measure beyond those of the tobacco States. I hope he can get something.

Does the majority leader indicate that what he has is acceptable to the House?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I would not be in a position to say that. I am led to believe—again I am not an expert in this area—the so-called AG for the OCS provision might be acceptable to a number of Members in the House from both political parties. That is the big ticket item.

There are a number of items I am not sure we will get agreement on. One is with relation to an AFDC amendment and one to the DRG's in Medicare. They are not major, but they are important to certain Members in the House. I am not certain how that is going to play.

It is my belief that the big stumbling block has been the OCS Program and that may have been resolved.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I appreciate the majority leader's interest. I am going to help him any way that I can to see that they get through. There are other items in there that I am interested in—public broadcasting. We can talk about all these little items that become extremely important when we put them together.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am advised the Senator from Alaska has left his office. I hope it is not in Anchorage.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I agree with the distinguished majority leader; I hope it is his office here and not the one in Anchorage.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1671

(Purpose: To defray extraordinary or unexpected committee expenses)

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alaska [Mr. STEVENS] proposes an amendment numbered 1671.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of section 2, add the following paragraph:

(e) Not more than $1,500,000 of the aggregate unexpended balance of the funds authorized by the Omnibus Committee Funding Resolution of 1985 is hereby transferred to a special reserve and made available for use from March 1, 1986, through February 28, 1987. The Committee on Rules and Administration is authorized to adopt regulations to govern use of the special reserve and may, notwithstanding any other provision of this resolution, make funds from the special reserve available, by administrative action, to the committee described in paragraph (a) to defray extraordinary or unexpected expenses.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, the funding resolution that is before the Senate was the result of a motion that I made in the Rules Committee dealing with the whole question of the allocation of funds to the individual committees. My motion, to which the committee agreed, gave each committee the same funding level in 1986 that it had in 1985 less the fiscal year 1986 Gramm-Rudman-Hollings sequestration.

The second portion of my proposal at that time was that there be a mechanism established to make available to specific committees funds needed to meet extraordinary or unexpected problems. For instance, this year there were requests from the Finance Committee and the Armed Services Committee for specific funding to meet unique needs. It was not possible to complete the discussion of that proposal at that time, and this amendment is a modification of that approach.

The effect of this amendment would be to make available to the Rules Committee as part of this funding resolution $1.5 million from the unexpended balance of the funds authorized by the previous resolution as a special reserve for use by the Rules Committee to meet the needs of individual committees.

The current approach, Mr. President, requires a committee that needs additional funds to pursue those funds in a complicated and lengthy supplemental funding authorization process that culminates in consideration of a supplemental resolution by the full Senate. For instance, let me point out that in 1980, the Judiciary Committee received $197,000 and the Indian Affairs Committee, $105,060. In 1981, Judiciary asked for additional funds and so did Intelligence. They were both given funds in November. In 1982 there were no supplementals. In 1983, Indian Affairs asked for money. It was finally approved in November. And Indian Affairs again in 1985 asked for additional funds and they were finally approved in December.

Now, my proposition is that the requests for funds that are before the Rules Committee now should not require us to go through the whole funding resolution procedure again.

My objections to the current procedure are two. One, we have those requests before us now, and we should act on them. Second, we should establish a procedure whereby small amounts of money for extraordinary and unexpected expenses of committees may be funded by the Rules Committee from prior year unexpended funds.

Now, let me address the unexpended funds issue, Mr. President. We have had substantial unexpended balances in the past, and the Senate now faces a substantial unexpended balance from 1985. The unexpended balance in 1984 was more than $4 million. The unexpended balance anticipated for 1985 by the staff is $4,203,055.

We now have the problem of dealing, particularly in this second session, with the tax bill and with the strategic defense initiative. The Finance Committee has the tax problem, and Armed Services has the SDI problem. They both asked for funds, and I think it is appropriate to make them available now as part of this resolution.

My amendment would make available to the committee $1.5 million of the aggregate unexpended balance of funds authorized by the 1985 funding resolution. The Rules Committee would be authorized to make these available for extraordinary or unexpected expenses incurred by other Senate committees. My amendment would authorize the Rules Committee to adopt special regulations governing the use of this special reserve.

Mr. President, I hope that if this approach is tried for 1 year and proven successful, it would become a procedure that the Rules Committee would see fit to follow for the future. But I point out to my friends who are the managers of the bill for the committee that this is a 1-year provision only. It does not become a permanent rule of the Senate. I hope they would be willing to agree to adopt this approach because of the special circumstances this year and to try it and see if it is a workable arrangement that we might carry forward in subsequent years.

Mr. WARNER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. If I might propound a question to the proponent of the amendment just for clarification only in the intent of the amendment. And I am reading the last sentence: "The Committee on Rules and Administration is authorized to adopt regulations to govern use of the special reserve and may, notwithstanding any other provision of this resolution, make funds from the special reserve available, by administrative action, to the committees described in paragraph (a) to defray extraordinary or unexpected expenses."

I read that to authorize the committee to provide the funds even though a committee petitioning for added funds has not expended the funds. In other words, I am dealing with the tense of the words here in the future. The committee petitioning for relief does not have to show as a matter of fact that they have already expended the funds before they can get reimbursement.

Mr. STEVENS. The Senator is correct. As a matter of fact, that is precisely what I want to avoid. I am confident that Armed Services and Finance are going to have to incur these extraordinary expenses in the near term anyway, and I do not see any reason why they should have to go out and spend the money and then come to the Rules Committee and try to get additional money and have a hiatus develop in their operations.

My amendment would provide that if any committee presented to the Rules Committee a request for additional funds based upon extraordinary or unexpected circumstances—and I think that both Finance and Armed Services are in the first category—they can get the funds without going through the process of having to get a resolution reported to the Senate and get the time allocated to take up the resolution and face the possible riders that might come on it.

Mr. WARNER. The question of the Senator from Virginia was just in the nature of a technical point. The Senator from Virginia agrees certainly with the observations of the Senator from Alaska with respect to the Armed Services Committee and the Finance Committee, the urgency of the need for the funds to be expended in the future. So we would now be—assuming the Senator adopts the pending amendment—authorizing the additional funds to be expended in the future, and that would be the format to be followed henceforth under this particular amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I appreciate the Senator's question and the spirit in which it has been asked. I would call attention to my good friend that according to the staff chart. I have, the unexpended balance that is anticipated for the 1985 account is $4,203,055.

I am asking that $1.5 million of that be set up as a special reserve to meet extraordinary demands on the committees of the Senate, particularly the Finance and Armed Services Committees. I think there may be one other committee that will be hit with an extraordinary demand before the end of the year.

Incidentally, if this $1.5 million is not used, it would lapse, just like the other money in this measure.

Mr. WARNER. I ask the distinguished Senator another question: He indicated that it would be for 1 year. Is there a particular purpose? Is this an experiment for a year, a trial?

Mr. STEVENS. In order to make it part of the permanent arrangement, we would have to file an amendment to the Rules of the Senate. I would prefer to see if we can try it this way, and if it works, we can do it as a committee procedure.

Mr. WARNER. So the authority under this particular amendment would lapse without further action by the Senate at the end of the stipulated period?

Mr. STEVENS. I say to the Senator from Virginia that that is my understanding, that my amendment allocates the unexpended 1985 money for use during the 1986 committee funding period, which expires on February 28 of next year.

Mr. WARNER. But, as a matter of fact, the funds themselves would be withdrawn as of September 30.

Mr. STEVENS. They are fiscal year 1986 funds, and they would have to be allocated by the Rules Committee for use prior to the end of the current fiscal year, as I understand it.

Mr. WARNER. So, in effect, the amendment would cease to be operative.

Mr. STEVENS. I think that is so, because we would be through with our work by that time, anyway.

I urge that the Rules Committee have the funds available so that in the near future it can respond to requests from the two committees that have already made application for additional funds.

Mr. WARNER. In conclusion, the authority sought under this amendment would expire February 28, 1987, in practical effect, since the funds would no longer be available after September 30.

Mr. STEVENS. I am informed that if the funds are allocated prior to that date, they may be expended by the committees throughout the period of the committee authorization year.

Mr. WARNER. Beyond September 30, 1986?

Mr. STEVENS. That is my understanding. They are blended, in any event, with the funds available for use during that period.

Mr. WARNER. A commingling of funds.

I thank the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, this is an unusual request by the distinguished Senator from Alaska. I do not like to be placed in the posture of opposing it. But we just went through almost a fiasco here a few moments ago, when we had a large argument over a sense-of-the-Senate resolution that everybody thought was sending $200,000 to the Helsinki Commission on the Medved problem; and in that resolution it said that all the expenditures—all—had to be approved by the Rules Committee.

I am not sure whether we can do it. I do not doubt the advice and counsel of the Senator from Alaska that any moneys we put in there from this year could be carried over after September 30. I am not really sure.

Let us look at where we were. The Rules Committee, of which the distinguished Senator from Alaska is a member, was performing its function. We were on the verge of allocating money to the Finance Committee and allocating money to the Armed Services Committee, almost within the amount they asked, within the budgetary allotment. We saved pretty good money. Now we want to take the money we saved and put it in the pot, and the committee is to have the right to dispense it. That is well and good, I guess; but we are saying to the chairmen of almost every committee, and the majority leader and the minority leader, "If your committee wants some money, we will get it. We have to vote on it." But I think the Senator is putting a burden on himself and on the committee as a whole that we should not do.

We had almost finished that day, when a motion was made that we not give anybody any more than they had last year, and that amendment was carried.

Mr. STEVENS. No, that was not the motion. The motion that carried was that we allocate all committees the same amount in 1986 as in 1985, which meant you gave no committee more or less.

Mr. FORD. Subject to the Gramm-Rudman reduction, and we amended that by taking part of it from the surplus and part of it from the 7 months forward.

Mr. STEVENS. The Senator is correct, but that was not my motion. My motion was that all committees receive the same amount in 1985 that they received in 1986 less the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings sequestration.

Mr. FORD. All we did then, we were subject to the 4.3-percent cut. I was not going to pinpoint it as the amendment of the Senator from Alaska. But that 4.3 was to be removed.

Mr. STEVENS. My amendment was to hold each committee authorization at the same level as last year, with each committee's budget being reduced in accordance with the Rules Committee's decision on Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

Mr. FORD. That was the amendment of the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes.

Mr. FORD. And that superseded the committee's labor for most of the morning, to try to allocate new funding or additional funding to the Armed Services Committee and to the Finance Committee.

Mr. STEVENS. In fairness, the Senator must remember that the second part of my motion could not be acted upon by the committee. I was requested to bring the second part to the floor, and that is why I am here.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, we are here now to say that we saved approximately $2.5 million last year by the committees themselves—money we allocated to them a year ago that they did not spend. We have committees that have a 5-year average of unexpended money of almost $400,000 per committee. Yet, we are unwilling to say, within that framework, "Let's allocate the money." That is exactly what we were trying to do.

Now we will be saying to the Rules Committee: "Here's a million and a half dollars. Boys, you can give it to any committee that wants it or needs it." They will want it, but they will come in and express their need.

It is going to be difficult for us to turn them down, because there are four or five chairmen of committees, there are four or five ranking members on the Rules Committee, and we find ourselves in an emotional box. I have listened to it day after day: "I want to take care of him. I have myself been in such a position that I have to help him, or I need to do this."

I am getting a little bit worried about the use of this procedure. We are going to have a surplus from the committees in fiscal 1986–87. There is no question about it—unless the chairmen will go out and hurry up and spend a lot of money they have not been spending.

We kept them at the same level they were last year, less 2 percent. We cut the committees less than you got cut in your office. You got 4.3, and the committees only got 2 percent. The committees are better off under Gramm-Rudman than the Senators are in their offices for their clerk hire and their office expenses.

Now we want to add a million and a half. Why do we not take it away from some of the committees that have not spent the money over the years, have a 5-year average of almost $400,000 a year, instead of putting $1.5 million in the pot?

So, I know what the Senator is trying to do. But we have had seven requests for supplemental help for committees in the last 6 years. That is all we have had, seven requests for supplementals. Not a one of them has been turned down, not a staff member has been fired, not a staff member gone unpaid, not a bill gone unpaid, and every supplemental has been approved. We have only had seven in the last 6 years.

I do not see the need of having a slush fund for committees. I just do not see it.

I am sure that I will probably get outvoted on this. It is the way things work, but I am just convinced that this is a perk that can be abused.

I am part of that decisionmaking process. I will have to make a judgment. I promise you that I would prefer to make a judgment on the money that is allocated for all committees rather than take the money that is saved and give it to committees that need it. If we would make the switch and allocate the money among the committees as we see their need, that is much better than having $1.5 million to spend.

I might add to my distinguished friend that those seven requests over the 6-year period only totaled $700,000. Now we are putting $1.5 million in a slush fund and we only know two committees that may need any money, only two committees asked for some money, and several committees came in with $200,000 or $300,000 surplus. So we only know two committees.

I would much prefer that the distinguished Senator said we are going to give Armed Services x number of dollars, going to give the Finance Committee x number of dollars; we are going to cut some others a little bit and let the Senate vote on it and see if we cannot stay within the dollar amount and let the $1.5 million go back to the general fund and try to help some of the other operations of the Federal Government.

I yield the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I appreciate my good friend from Kentucky and the statement he has made.

I think we have to keep in mind the whole history here in terms of the committees we are dealing with. Finance has not been a difficult committee for Rules to deal with. As I understand the situation in 1984, they missed their estimate by $5,535. They are not people who make mistakes in terms of their estimates. They have not overspent. They tell us this year that because of the tax bill they need more money.

The Senator from Kentucky would take that money from other committees when those committees are trying to determine what is going to be the future in the post-Gramm-Rudman-Hollings era.

The impact of my amendment is to make available, without the delay of a second resolution, the funds that are necessary to meet the needs of Finance and Armed Services. Again, I point out I wanted to discuss this proposal in committee. Time expired, unfortunately, and we were unable to consider it, and I was asked to bring it to the floor.

I think the committee which voted 8 to 2 on my first motion would have voted 10 to zero or maybe 9 to 1 anyway on my second motion. I respect the fact that my friend from Kentucky might have been the one.

I think that Armed Services and Finance have special needs now. They have stayed fairly well within their budgets, and they have done fairly well in anticipating their needs. In this instance, they have correctly anticipated their needs.

Because we have this extraordinary unexpended balance, I suggest to the Senate that $1.5 million be put into a special reserve. Then, we can see what happens this year as far as the funding needs of the committees are concerned.

This is not new money. It is not something in addition to the budget. It is not a slush fund. It is the savings that were made by this body in the first session of this Congress. We are saying that funds not spent in the first session may well be needed in order to complete the work of the Senate in the second sesssion.

I can think of nothing more important than the two subjects we are concerned with, the tax bill and the strategic defense initiative. Both of them are very enormous projects for Finance and Armed Serivces to consider in this 1 year, which as we all know is a short year. It is an election year. The committees will have to complete their work before the time that history shows a second resolution could be approved.

The special reserve procedure, I think, makes eminent sense.

I urge my friend to agree to it, even though he is reluctant to do so.

But very frankly, I have had no Member of the Senate ask me about this amendment's merit. On the contrary, a considerable number of Members have asked me why did I not follow up in committee and take care of the two committees that had the problem? And I told them of the action of the committee. If my good friend from Kentucky will recall, time just ran out on us that morning, forcing us to come to the floor.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes.

Mr. FORD. Am I correct that the Armed Services Committee asked for an additional $139,450 and the Finance Committee asked for an additional $470,000, making a total of $609,450?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, that is correct.

Mr. FORD. Why do you need $1.5 million?

I know savings around here are important. And just saving to spend it is another thing.

Mr. STEVENS. I say to my friend, the Senator from Alaska does not spend the money; it takes the Rules Committee approval to allocate money to a committee and then the action of the committee to spend it.

Mr. FORD. The Senator explained a while ago, the vote probably will be 9 to 1 and we already know it is going to be expended. Why do you not just make an amendment and take care of these two committees and take the burden off of the committee when the committee chairmen start coming after you or the ranking members start coming after you for some additional money. If you need additional money, you have the supplemental appropriations route to go.

We had seven of them in 6 years and none of them have been turned down, none of the committees have any problem and the whole dollars the last 6 years has only been $700,000. This year we are asking for $609,450.

Mr. STEVENS. Is the Senator asking me a question? I will be glad to respond.

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to establish a procedure, as I indicated, that would make the funds available through action of the Rules Committee from unexpended balances from prior years without having to act on a supplemental, which involves transferring new funds to committees in order to meet their needs.

I do not anticipate a lame-duck session, Mr. President, and I certainly do not hope that because of the lack of availability of funds committees may decide to drag their proceedings out in the postelection session in order to secure approval of a supplemental funding resolution. I have lived through a couple of postelection sessions. A shiver goes up and down my back every time I think of the fact I may live through another one. I do not like postelection sessions.

I believe these funds ought to be made available now. I also would call attention of my friend that there are things going around here this year that make this a very unique session. This is the first time we lived through this new budget procedure. This is the first time that we have tried to deal with the deadlines of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

I can anticipate that there may well be some requests for funds to meet extraordinary expenses incurred by committees other than Finance and Armed Services. Funding such requests under my amendment would not add money to the funding base of the committee requesting the funds. I did not say amend the Finance Committee base by x dollars or amend the Armed Services Committee base by x dollars.

Under this amendment, the Rules Committee can make available to committees for extraordinary or unanticipated expenses sums which the Rules Committee feels are necesssary to carry out the duties of the committees for this year.

The problem around here is every time we add new money to a committee's allowance, it becomes part of the committee's funding base for the next year's funding request process.

Now, money made available by my amendment does not become that. My amendment does not make structural additions to a committee's funding base. Therefore, it is an opportunity to save money by not building in an allocation to any committee on a permanent basis.

Mr. FORD. Does the Senator think the Finance Committee with $470,000 more this year will not need the same amount next year? Does the Senator think the 100 and some-odd thousand dollars the Armed Services Committee is asking for this year they will not want to keep next year? That will be a built-in.

Mr. STEVENS. No. It is not.

Mr. FORD. It is because what they spend is what the Rules Committee gave them, and they will expect the same amount next year. We will sit there, will not cut the committee, and they will get the same amount that year as they did before.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to beg my friend's pardon. That is precisely the reason for presenting it this way. It does not become structural so far as this Senator is concerned. The request of these two committees next year will have to be based on the Rules Committee's resolution. That is the one that is before us. This funding resolution specifies what those two committees can spend in the ordinary course of events.

Funds made available under my amendment for extraordinary or unanticipated expenses are special allocations for special circumstances. But I intend to see to it, if the Rules Committee will support my position, that those special allocations do not become structural. They will not be part of the permanent year-to-year base of the committees. Finance and Armed Services have made the case to us—by the way—that their requests are for extraordinary expenses for this year only.

Mr. FORD. We tried to work it out within the committee structure, and they had over $2 million in a slush fund. They only took $1.5 million of it. We could have taken care of that, given them every dime they wanted, and have $2 million left. Now we want to put the $1.5 million in the slush fund, and spend it.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I have got to take offense to the reference to a slush fund. We are not talking about a slush fund but a legitimate allocation of the taxpayers' money to attempt to carry out the work of the Congress.

I tell you this year we have a request facing Armed Services for $4.8 billion for SDI. We have the Finance Committee trying to deal with the tax bill within a limited timeframe. Both of those are extraordinary situations for those committees.

In my opinion, these extraordinary situations warrant the allocation of funds on a special basis to them with the caveat that the funds are for special projects and that those projects expire with this Congress. They will not be funded in the next year. Under those conditions, I think we are saving money. This amendment is not a slush fund.

The record will show I presented two proposals at the Rules Committee markup of Senate Resolution 353: one to fund the committees at the same level that they enjoyed in 1985 less the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings sequestration allocated in accordance with the previous decision of the Committee, and another to establish a mechanism to take care of these two extraordinary requests from Finance and Armed Services and other such requests that might be received in this extraordinary year.

I think that is a valid concept.

Mr. WARNER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EVANS). The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. If I can look at this thing sort of in a calm manner here for a moment, I think I would advise my colleagues in the Senate first to separate out their decision on this amendment from the factual situations that presently relate to Armed Services, and the Finance Committee. In my judgment the Senate is prepared to address the special situation of both of those committees, and hopefully allocate the necessary funds as requested by the chairman, and ranking minority of both committees.

So whether it be done by virtue of this amendment or by another procedure, in my judgment it is essential that those issues by those two committees be addressed and hopefully addressed in the manner that will meet the needs, special needs, of those two committees.

So, therefore, I think we turn our attention to the amendment as it stands, and look at it as a precedent we are about to establish if it is adopted by the Senate. I, therefore, put two questions to my distinguished friend and colleague from Alaska.

The first question, as I read this amendment, the amendment makes funds from the special reserve available—I stress, and draw his attention to the word "available"—by administrative action. This does not appear to permit the transfer of the funds to the petitioning committee which has a special need for funding authorization. In other words, the funds would not be merged or blended as was represented by the Senator from Alaska in his initial presentation amendment, and therefore reserves for all practical purposes would no longer be available after September 30.

Mr. STEVENS. Again, I do not quite understand, Mr. President, the Senator's question in the sense that I made the prior comment about blending.

Mr. WARNER. It is a purely technical observation. I want to make certain.

Mr. STEVENS. In handling the funds I have handled for the various committees and subcommittees the money is allocated, and drawn down on the basis of the allocation by the Senators that are charged with that duty. In this instance, my comment was the basic funds are allocated by the resolution for each committee. The supplemental funds that are authorized from this reserve would be allocated by the Rules Committee to the committee, and would be available in the same manner as if they were allocated by the original resolution with the exception that they are not added to the base in my judgment.

As far as the question of their being available after October 21 is concerned, again I call my friend's attention to the fact that the two problems of the committees involved are immediate. The funds will be spent by them immediately upon the allocation by the Rules Committee, and they have so informed us. One is to hire people to deal with the tax question, the other to hire people to deal with the SDI research. Both projects must be completed, I believe, within the next few months.

So the money will be expended. If it is not expended, then it is, as well as all other funds, part of the carryover balance, and that is the end of it.

Mr. WARNER. I say to my distinguished colleague from Alaska I understand that point. I merely am drawing his attention to a technical matter that has been brought to my attention by the financial clerk of the Senate. In other words, the Senate has to authorize the use of funds. This amendment simply allows the Rules Committee to make them available. And somehow there could be a technical problem. I would just urge the Senator from Alaska to take a few moments to hear the views.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I send a modification of my amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is so modified.

The amendment (No. 1671), as modified, is as follows:

At the end of section 2, add the following paragraph:

(e) Not more than $1,500,000 of the aggregate unexpended balance of the funds authorized by S. Res. 85, agreed to February 28, 1985, the Omnibus Committee Funding Resolution of 1985) is hereby transferred to a special reserve and made available for use from March 1, 1986, through September 30, 1986. The Committee on Rules and Administration is authorized to adopt regulations to govern use of the special reserve and may, notwithstanding any other provision of this resolution transfer funds from the special reserve by administrative action, to the committees described in paragraph (a) to defray extraordinary or unexpected expenses.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, if I may explain this, during the interim we have had staff confer with the financial clerk of the Senate. The first modification to my amendment is a technical one that refers to the 1984 resolution by number, and the date it was agreed to, February 20, 1985. The second modification changes the February 28, 1987, date to September 30, 1986, to eliminate any question about the availability of the money from this special reserve after September 30, 1986.

The last modification changes the phrase "make available" to "transfer" so that the Committee on Rules will transfer the funds from the special reserve to the committees to defray extraordinary or unexpected expenses.

It is the intent of the amendment that the committees to which unexpended 1985 funds are transferred would maintain, as will be requested by the financial clerk, a separate record of the use of these special funds, and would not merge them with their 1986 funds. All the questions that were raised by the Senator from Virginia are thus avoided.

This Senator happens to believe it makes no difference if the funds are merged, but the financial clerk wished to have them separate in order that they may be accounted for as part of the funds made available pursuant to the funding resolution of 1985 and this amendment.

Mr. FORD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I say this with all respect to my distinguished friend from Alaska, this draft is worse than the first one. Let me say why.

It now says that the "special reserve" money will only be available until September 30, 1986. I believe all will agree it is unlikely that any committee will run short of funds before September 30. They will not be out of money. That is just a few months.

So what will happen then?

The committees will come to the Rules Committee before they are short, before they have a problem, and they will say, "Hey, we will run out of money in December, or we are going to run out of money in January. So we want you to give us some money now before September 30."

Then after the money is given to them, they find out they do not need it. Sure, it will be turned back, but they are running to the Rules Committee to get them to give them some money before September 30. In all deference to my distinguished friend from Alaska, I will not call it a slush fund anymore. I will just call it the special reserve fund.

The problem is that we have no way of knowing what committees will, in fact, need money beforehand. We could give a committee money in September and find out later on they never need it.

I have found in my short time in this body that no one ever asks for what they think they can get by on.

The only increase that was requested before the Rules Committee was by two committees, as I recall. That total sum was $609,450. Now we have a special reserve fund for $1.5 million that is going to run out on September 30.

One reason I say that this amendment is worse than the first one is it dispenses the money administratively.

Well, what are the rules, administratively? You only need five people in the Rules Committee to transact administrative business. A majority of 5 is 3. That means now instead of having the full committee or the full Senate making a decision, we are going to boil it down to where three people on the Rules Committee will make a decision whether a committee needs money or not.

Let us think about that a little bit.

We have a surplus where committees did not spend their money. Several are habitually turning money back. They like to turn money back. They like to appear as having saved money. It is year in and year out. It is the same amount. Yet they come back and ask for more so they can turn back money.

So what do we have? We have a special reserve fund that expires on September 30. No committee can make a solid judgment on what they will actually need, I think. It is like Yogi Bera said, it is hard to predict because it is in the future.

So here we are saying we want to dispense this money administratively.

Mr. WARNER. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Mr. WARNER. In fairness to our distinguished colleague from Alaska, when you say three, that is accurate, but all members of the committee would have had notice of the action to be taken. Therefore, by virtue of their notice, they confer upon any members who show up the right to act.

Mr. FORD. If you get a proxy, you can exercise their proxy. But they have to have the actual bodies there and a proxy cannot count in the rules of the Rules Committee.

Mr. WARNER. But I am suggesting that this fund would not be manipulated by three Senators without all Senators being fully aware of the pending decision to be made.

Mr. FORD. Let me ask my friend from Virginia, how often do we have a quorum in the Rules Committee? How many times have we had to cancel meetings because of no quorum? How many times do we say, "We will talk about this, we have an administrative group here, but we do not have enough Senators here to report it out."

Mr. WARNER. I say to my friend that same situation confronts other committees in the Senate. Senators have a number of commitments occurring simultaneously. But I wish to remove any suspicion that three Senators can simply sit back and manipulate these funds. In fact, the whole committee would be aware. Other members could express, through proxy or otherwise, their sentiments.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FORD. I will be glad to yield for a question. Is that it?

Mr. STEVENS. The question is: Why should action by three members be considered something out of order?

Mr. FORD. It is not out of order.

Mr. STEVENS. When we get a reprogramming request for millions of dollars in the Appropriations Committee, two Senators sign off on it, the chairman of the subcommittee and the ranking member. I would be perfectly willing to have that happen in the Rules Committee, but members of the committee have indicated they would rather have it acted on by the committee in an administrative meeting.

Mr. FORD. I do not know about members. But this member does not want to take that responsibility for making a judgment and saying no to the chairman of a committee. You have to take into consideration what we are facing is all but one on the majority side are chairmen of committees or major subcommittees, and on our side most of them are ranking. So you are looking at committees who have the chairman and the ranking member. It is very hard for them to ever come because they are holding hearings; they have their committees. We are lucky to get an administrative quorum there. So even though they have been notified, it is difficult for them to come.

Let me make one other point. The Senator talked about armed services having a lot to do with star wars or SDI. Well, the Energy Committee has about $12 billion as it relates to research and development for SDI. The Energy Committee did not say they would like to have it, but they decided they would like to get by. The chairman of the Energy Committee said they could handle that part of it without additional funds. So the research and development as it relates to SDI in the Energy Committee is almost $12 billion.

Mr. WARNER. I have to take issue with my distinguished colleague from Kentucky. I am chairman of the subcommittee of Armed Services that deals with SDI. The part that the Energy Committee is dealing with is the warheads and the laboratories. As yet, that has not become an integral part in any great proportion as the Senator represents.

Mr. FORD. There is almost $12 billion in that particular section that the Energy Committee oversees, and a portion of the research and development in that particular section has everything to do or most of the research being done as it relates to SDI.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I just take friendly issue with my friend. It is extraneous to the matter here. I think both sides have presented their case and we ought to get on and decide whether to have a record vote.

Mr. FORD. This is the same way I did on the last one. I rolled over on that one to be a good boy, to let $200,000 be invested on something that has a very critical question as to its legality. The resolution was a sense of the Senate. It did not have any binding authority upon this body at all. We sat here and talked about it for 2½ hours. Then the second section of that confirms money to be spent on something that is not binding. Then it says that the Rules Committee has to approve every dime. Whoever wrote that resolution was not doing it properly.

I think we ought to compliment the distinguished Senator from Virginia because he got the technical problem involved in this amendment worked out. It took us 1½ hours.

If we want to spend this money, go beyond the rules, and have this special reserve fund, that is fine.

This is one I am going to ask for a rollcall on. I regret that I have to do it, but if the Senate wants to do it, it wants to set it up under these circumstances, let them roll over me. But roll over me they will.

I do not believe we have enough here to ask for a rollcall vote, I say to the Chair. Do we have enough Senators present to request a rollcall?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is always presumed to be present.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, we can gather sufficient Senators under the rules of comity of the Senate. We will get them here momentarily.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I just asked the Chair if we had sufficient Senators here for me to ask for a rollcall vote. He said the Senate is always presumed to have a quorum.

Mr. WARNER. Is that request being made?

Mr. FORD. I make that request, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, before we have the vote, I want to make a statement while we have two of the Rules Committee members here.

I suggested two proposals in the Rules Committee. One was that each committee continue to receive the allowance it had received in 1985 less the amount of the fiscal year 1986 Gramm-Rudman-Hollings sequestration. The second suggestion I made was that there be a special fund from which the committee would allocate funds for extraordinary requests such as had been presented by the Finance Committee and by the Armed Services Committee. This amendment of mine would establish such a special fund and authorize the Committee on Rules to transfer from a special reserve, funds derived from the large unexpended balance accumulated in 1985.

Those funds would be made available in this Congress. The first session did not have the same expenses that this session is facing, and that development is primarily related to the change in our total budget considerations. We now have to study in an extraordinarily short period of time SDI, the tax bill, and other issues. This amendment will make money available to those committees that have those extraordinary expenses—as judged by the Rules Committee.

Again, I state it is our intention that the request of the financial clerk be honored. That is that the committees that receive these funds would maintain a separate account for the purpose of accountability to ensure that the funds are not being blended into the funds that could be expended after September 30, 1986.

I consider this to be the most unique year that I have served in the Senate because of the total change in our approach to the budget, our turn to a new process that will bring about sequestrations. We must make available the assistance needed by these committees to review these extraordinary requests that we are receiving. Particularly, I think, the Finance Committee's need for money is well established.

So, Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will adopt this amendment. I call attention to the fact that the motion I presented in the Rules Committee was adopted 8 to 2, to make available to each committee the same amount of money that it had in 1985 minus the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings sequestrations that was allocated by the Rules Committee. Given those circumstances, the question now before the Senate, in my judgment, is whether the Finance Committee and the Armed Services Committee will get this money now when they needs it so they can present their work to the Senate promptly? Or shall we wait, as in six out of the seven times in the past when committees have asked for supplemental funding, until they expend their other funds and then have them come in and make their justification and then vote on it in September or December? Six out of the seven were voted on in November or December.

In my judgment, Mr. President, the needs are there now. They are extraordinary, and the committees should not have to take the risk that they might not get the funds needed through a supplementary resolution adopted much later in the year by the Senate.

I believe my amendment establishes a good procedure. It makes funds available to the Rules Committee to meet extraordinary demands in an extraordinary year in the history of the Senate.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Virginia has left the floor—no, he is back. Let me answer my good friend from Alaska for a moment.

We have the opportunity now, right this minute, Mr. President, under the procedures of the Senate, to take care of the request, if we wish, of the Armed Services Committee and the Finance Committee. We do not have to have a special amendment, we do not have to have a special reserve fund to be set up. That procedure is already here.

The money the distinguished Senator from Alaska wants to put in the special reserve fund is what the committees did not spend last year, and we have a 5-year history of how much money is being turned back by every committee.

Now, if you listen to the distinguished Senator from Alaska, he says that this gives us a way to give the money that was saved last year to the two committees that requested an increase in funding. Well, it is just a fact, when you listen to that statement, that the fund is being set up and set up only—only—for those two committees. That is all.

We can do it right now; they do not have to make a request; the Rules Committee will not be put on the spot; we do not have to worry about taking the money we saved last year and spending it this year by setting up a special fund—I promised the distinguished Senator I would not call it a slush fund any more; I would call it a special reserve fund as he is calling it.

But that is what is happening. We have the rules. We want to change it. We want to set up a reserve fund out of the money that we saved; and we are going to have money turned back next year; so why not go ahead and take care of it so we can immediately give this money to the Armed Services and the Finance Committees? We have not walked out in the Rules Committee, we were performing our job. I do not see why we have to come to the Senate floor and have it undone.

What is unusual about problems? What is unusual about being different? What is unusual about this body, about things being set up and it is going to be a strange year? Well, they are all strange.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am amused by my good friend from Kentucky. Anyone from Kentucky ought to understand a special reserve. I really think if he thinks about that, he will understand that term.

Beyond that, let me tell the Senate, sure, these funding needs before us could be taken care of the way some people in the Rules Committee wanted. I opposed that. Those individuals wanted to reduce the 1986 funding of other committees in order to meet the extraordinary needs of the Finance Committee and the Armed Services Committee.

Those committees have already been reduced by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. In my judgment, they should not take another reduction in order to meet the extraordinary and unexpected needs of Finance and Armed Services.

My motion in the Rules Committee that every committee receive the same allocation that it received under 1985 less the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings sequestration thwarted the effort to reduce the fiscal year 1986 funding of certain committees. If my amendment fails, the funding of the other committees will have to be reduced in order to meet the needs of the Finance Committee and Armed Services Committee. I do not think that ought to be done.

All I say is let us use that money for what it was intended to do, to carry out the work of this Congress.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, before we move to the vote, the distinguished Senator from Kentucky was challenging me on my figures on the SDI. I am prepared to respond.

Mr. FORD. I want the Senator to respond. See if I am right. The research and development is $2.16 billion for weapons research and $4.8 billion as it relates to defense production support.

Mr. WARNER. The figure I have is that the Department of Energy, which is administering a certain account for the Department of Defense, which account goes through our Committee on Energy, is a total of $8 billion, of which only $536 million is related to research and development on SDI.

Mr. FORD. The Energy Committee's budget reflects research and development in that particular area when we passed it out, $2.6 billion for the weapons research and defense production support of $4.8 billion.

The Senator's total is larger than mine, but we are pretty close.

Mr. WARNER. We have a friendly debate. Let us call it a draw and move on to the vote.

Mr. DECONCINI. Will the Senator from Kentucky yield for a question?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Mr. DECONCINI. I might not have understood the Senator from Alaska, but my understanding is that what is before us here is for 1987, the same amount of funds for each committee as they received in 1986 less the Gramm-Rudman amount.

Mr. FORD. No.

Mr. DECONCINI. Is that correct?

Mr. FORD. It is only 2.3 percent less.

Mr. DECONCINI. That is right.

Mr. FORD. It is about half. We took that half out of the money that the Senator is now trying to put into the special reserve fund.

Mr. DECONCINI. Right. So there is no addition even for the Armed Services and Finance Committees?

Mr. FORD. That is correct.

Mr. DECONCINI. So if I understood the Senator from Alaska, he said that if his motion goes down, all these other committees are going to suffer; they will have to put up money for the Armed Services and Finance Committees; that is not true?

Mr. FORD. That is not true.

Mr. DECONCINI. That is not true.

Mr. FORD. Only if we vote it.

Mr. DECONCINI. That would take another action by the Rules Committee and another action by this body if we elected to do that?

Mr. FORD. It could be done in the Senate tonight if an amendment is made.

Mr. DECONCINI. If another amendment is made to transfer more moneys from the other committees and take it out of the others.

Mr. FORD. Let me ask the Senator, was he ever notified of any kind of amendment such as this to be presented to the Rules Committee prior to the vote on the committee budgets?

Mr. DECONCINI. No, I was not. As a matter of fact, I was there when the Senator from Alaska came in. I was prepared, as the Senator from Virginia knows, to enter into some compromise there, though I really did not think that anybody should get an increase. The Senator from Virginia made an outstanding plea there. I think it was the Senator from Tennessee who made another plea for either Armed Services or Finance. I was ready to give some and we were working out that compromise when the Senator from Alaska came in with his motion to make it all the same, less whatever the percentage of Gramm-Rudman was. I decided the Senator from Alaska was just overwhelming in his convictions there, and I know my friend from Virginia was very disappointed that he ended up getting nothing. But I do not remember——

Mr. FORD. He still has nothing.

Mr. DECONCINI [continuing]. Ever hearing about a motion or suggestion until then that this proposal would be brought up at the Rules Committee.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I have no further statement. I think we ought to go on with the vote. The yeas and nays have already been called for. I do not have any time to yield back, but I have no further debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no further debate, the question is on agreeing to the amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS] are absent on official business.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART] and the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HECHT). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 69, as follows:

So the amendment (No. 1671) was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, unless it is desired by the leadership to address the Senate, I wish to send an amendment to the desk.

AMENDMENT NO. 1672

(Purpose: To provide additional funding for the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Finance)

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. WARNER] proposes an amendment numbered 1672.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I make a point of order that the Senate is not in order. I want my distinguished colleague to be heard because I think we are getting ready to settle something here that we had a great debate on this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. Senators will please take their seats and all conversations will cease.

The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. I thank the President.

Mr. President, first, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of section 2, add the following paragraph:

(e) $335,000 of the aggregate unexpended balance of the funds authorized by the Omnibus Committee Funding Resolution of 1985 is hereby transferred to a special reserve and made available for use from March 1, 1986, through September 30, 1986. Of this amount, $100,000 is authorized for the use of the Committee on Armed Services, and $235,000 is authorized for the use of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, the Rules Committee had taken up the petitions from the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Finance for additional financing this year.

I have my distinguished colleague here from Kentucky, and I think he will verify that it was the judgment of the members of the committee present that day that both of these committees merited an additional sum of money.

Just prior to the procedural matters raised by our distinguished colleague from Alaska, the committee was about to accept a settlement which was offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI], whereby the Committee on Armed Services received $100,000 and the Committee on Finance $235,000.

What happened thereafter is a matter of history, and we have now discussed that in the context of the amendment offered by the Senator from Alaska.

Therefore, I offer this amendment at this time for the purpose of effecting the judgment of the Rules Committee with respect to these two committees in the light of the failure of the Senate to adopt the amendment by the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WARNER. I yield.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WARNER. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. The effect of this is to make available money to the Armed Services Committee and the Finance Committee in addition to the amount that is made available for 1986. Is this new money rather than unexpended 1985 money?

Mr. WARNER. The amendment reads:

$335,000 of the aggregate unexpended balance of the funds authorized by the Omnibus Committee Funding Resolution of 1985 is hereby transferred to a special reserve and made available for use from March 1, 1986, through September 30, 1986. Of this amount, $100,000 is authorized for the use fo the Committee on Armed Services, and $235,000 is authorized for the use of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STEVENS. Then may I ask this question? The Senator's amendment does what the amendment which the Senator from Alaska just offered does except that it is limited to Finance and Armed Services. It creates the special reserve. It carries over the unexpended funds from 1985 into 1986. Is that right?

Mr. WARNER. Technically, the Senator is correct. But it is not new money. It is drawn from the surplus of funds.

Mr. STEVENS. That was my proposal. This amendment says that the Senate is making the judgment for the Armed Services and Finance Committees but no similar amount will be available for any other committees. Is that right?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, that is the essence of it. That is right.

Mr. STEVENS. Any other committee will have to wait until, if history is right, November-December for action on any supplemental funding request they may make.

Mr. WARNER. Other committees would follow the procedure established by the Rules Committee now. I think it is the rule.

Mr. STEVENS. I appreciate that.

I think the Senator has a good suggestion in view of what has just happened. But I think the record should show that the motion which I offered in the Rules Committee gave the committees for 1986 what they received in 1985—not what they requested of the committee. There are still committees who have requests before our committee which were not met by my motion.

Mr. WARNER. Only two. That is what we are taking care of. I think all along the Senator from Alaska has been supportive of the principle reflected in this amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand. But it does not create any special reserve for any other contingencies for any other committee this year?

Mr. WARNER. That is correct.

Mr. STEVENS. Very well.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I know of no request to have a rollcall vote.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just briefly?

I wanted to try to get it straight. Did I understand the Senator to say that the special provision is going to apply to the Defense Committee, and which other committee?

Mr. WARNER. Finance.

Mr. RIEGLE. They are going to get extra funds over and above what they had, and in short that is the reason for that. Why is there a special arrangement made in the instance of those two committees?

Mr. WARNER. The Rules Committee listed two of the petitions of both committees. There were justifications in the interest of Armed Services predicated on the added responsibility in a large part of the defense budget, particularly some special duties imposed by the Senate as a whole on the Armed Services Committee with reference to SDI, and then in view of the tax bill the Finance Committee provided justification for these added funds.

Both of these amendments are below the totals asked for by the respective chairmen and ranking minority members.

Mr. RIEGLE. Can the Senator tell me the size of the personal increase in each case?

Mr. WARNER. I do not have a computer.

Mr. RIEGLE. Just roughly; I am sure the staff has it. Are we talking about a nominal increase of 5 percent, or are we talking about 20 or 30 percent?

Mr. WARNER. The Armed Services Committee is receiving under the pending bill before the Senate $2.97 million. This would represent $100,000 over and above that figure. And the Finance Committee is receiving $2.153 million, and this would be $235,000 on top of those figures.

Mr. RIEGLE. So those increases—and I see the staff is working on this. Can they tell me what the percentage increase is in both cases?

Mr. WARNER. A quick calculation would show between a 3- and 4-percent increase for Armed Services, and about a 9-percent increase for Finance.

Mr. RIEGLE. Nine percent for Finance.

Mr. SIMON. Will the Senator from Michigan yield for a moment?

Mr. RIEGLE. Yes. I yield.

Mr. SIMON. I simply point out that in the Rules Committee the Senator from Alaska made a motion that we freeze all committees as is, and that carried by an 8-to-2 margin.

My own feeling—and I have great respect for the job that these two committees do, but I think all the committees, or many of them, come in and say they need more money for this, that, or the other thing.

My own feeling is that the motion by the Senator from Alaska in committee to freeze all committees where they are right now makes a great deal of sense.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. RIEGLE. I am inclined to think that way myself. I can appreciate the fact that there are some special defense-related issues at the moment, and especially the reauthorization which has worked its way. We have to keep track of it.

And the Finance Committee has some special obligations. But it seems to me that other committees as well have different——

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, may I make a point of order? The Senate is not in order.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. RIEGLE. I will. Let me finish the sentence, then I would be happy to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is not in order. The Senator's point is well taken.

Mr. RIEGLE. I was just going to conclude by saying that I am sure other committees as well have special requirements right now that might justify some upward adjustment, and it seems to me if we are talking numbers, the quick calculations are right. It is 3 to 4 percent in the defense committee increase. Is that correct? And in the Finance Committee it is something like a 7- or 8-percent increase.

That starts to be the larger in my view in terms of the exceptional nature of it versus other committees. I am just wondering if the Senator can share with us—and then I want to yield to the Senator from Alaska, as I said I would. But I am not sure if we should be making much of an adjustment in one committee when we are not doing it for any of the rest.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, in reply to the distinguished Senator from Michigan, only two committee chairmen came before the Rules Committee and asked for the increased funding—Armed Services and Finance.

Presumably, those that did not come forward decided with their committees that they did not have a justification for additional funds.

Mr. RIEGLE. I do not think that is exactly right. I think the reason we saw restraint is we passed Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, I think we are cutting down on Members' staff allowances, and a lot of Members have had to lay people off. I think the feeling has been that we are in a belt-tightening period, and I think probably a lot of committees thought if there were going to be increases granted in some cases, that they might have been prepared to bring to the attention of the Rules Committee some of the special problems they were facing.

But I promised to yield to the Senator from Alaska. I want to do so.

Mr. WARNER. I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I wanted to ask my friend if he realized the basis for the decision in the Rules Committee with regard to all committees. We tried to accept the proposition that committee—and the Rules Committee did accept the proposition—funding should be frozen at 1985 levels subject to Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

Two committees made strong presentations in support of funding for two special projects—SDI for Armed Services, and the tax bill for Finance.

Those projects warranted, in my opinion, the extra money. The Senate has just turned down my suggestion of setting up a special reserve for more than just the two committees.

This amendment will set it up for just the two committees. As a matter of fact, the funding problem can be resolved just as easily by adding the 1985 funds directly to the amount that is available to the two committees through March 1987.

I still believe in the special reserve concept. The House has run itself like this for a long time. But we have to have committees come before the Rules Committee and make a request for supplemental funding. By the time the Rules Committee gets around to it—six out of seven times—it has been November or December. Only one time did we take action in August.

We will have other requests this year. We will probably come back in the last part of this session, and act on the requests. Meanwhile, the issues for which the funds are needed will have gone by.

I urge Senators to support the concept of making money available now to the Finance Committee and the Armed Services Committee for the two extraordinary projects they have been assigned.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, still having the floor, I believe, I just say that I appreciate what the Senator from Alaska has said. It seems to me that it takes, in the case of the Finance Committee where they are in a tax bill—I mean that is the normal course of events. That is what the Finance Committee does—consider tax bills. I know this is a major tax rewrite. But am I to assume that when the Finance Committee gets done with that—and I hope it is going to be sometime this year—the special staffing needs then disappear?

In other words, it is just temporary. It is simply to get through passage and signing of the tax bill into law. Then they revert back to the old budget numbers, is that correct?

Mr. WARNER. I respond in the affirmative to the question of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. RIEGLE. They go back to the previous level once the tax bill is signed into law?

Mr. WARNER. When their budget comes up next year in the committee.

Mr. RIEGLE. That is the point I am making. Presumably the Finance Committee will get it done sometime a little later on this year. What I am saying is if we are making a special allocation in their case to get the job done, then I think the minute the job is done, the special allocation ought to be rescinded. If you are making the argument on that basis, let us provide that need but no more than that. I think there are other committees around, frankly, who will need help.

I know in the Space Subcommittee of the Commerce Committee, we have a lot of work to do to figure out what the Space Program ought to look like. We just lost $3 billion.

I think if they are going to receive special consideration, we want to take a look at it. I simply want to make sure that when the extra money is provided, once the problem is passed, you shut back down to the previous levels.

Mr. WARNER. The Senator from Michigan is correct. It is a onetime funding.

Mr. RIEGLE. But it is still not clear how long that runs.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, may I get involved a little bit with my colleague since this is on my side?

What we have done here is to reduce the request of the Finance Committee down to the level that we thought they could get by with. We have reduced the request of the Armed Services Committee down to the $100,000 level. That goes for the budget term. The budget term, as the Senator knows, runs from March 1 to February 28 of next year. So we have anticipated that would be all they would need.

These funds are not being taken out of any committee's present funding. This is taken out from the surplus that was left from last year.

What we are trying to do here is to keep a procedure where you, as ranking member or chairman of a committee next year, will have an opportunity to come in and make your case.

What you found in the other procedure was a special reserve fund that was administrative and it only takes five members of the Rules Committee to make a quorum and three of those would take care of any committee out there.

What we have done here is the same amendment that the Rules Committee was about to approve with the exception that this money instead of coming out of the present committee's funding, we are taking it out of the surplus that accrued from last year's budget.

Mr. RIEGLE. I understand that point. I guess you have helped throw some light on the point I was trying to make. That is if the tax bill is finished and signed into law by September 15 of this year, it seems to me the extra allocate ought to terminate at that point or shortly thereafter. It ought not run over into next year.

Mr. FORD. That is too much. That is 60 days.

Mr. RIEGLE. We have to have discipline.

Mr. FORD. The Senator can make his point but the only point I can make is that the Rules Committee was trying to make this one. If you want some money for another committee, you can go the regular route. We want you to have that opportunity. If you have money left over, that money will expire on February 28. The Rules Committee scrutinizes the records and expense and whatever is left goes back into the general fund and we save it.

We do not say on January 1 when a bill is completed there will not be some cleanup, there will not be some regulations to write, there will not be a lot of things that the Finance Committee, the Housing Committee, the SDI, or whatever, might need. Whatever is left over expires, it goes back into surplus in the general fund.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, we still have the Commodity Credit Corporation, reconciliation, and hope to start the water resources bill tonight. I know these are great decisions but I would say with reference to the last point made, I am not certain if the Rules Committee has decided they need the money, but it is pretty hard to spread it out. I assume if I were chairman of the Finance Committee, I would need a lot of help right now. He might use up that $100,000 in the next 3 or 4 months and there would not be anything to turn back. But I am not the chairman of the Finance Committee.

I would hope we would accept these amendments and move on to the Commodity Credit matter. There will probably be a vote on the other sometime around 7:30.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President. I wanted to ask the distinguished majority leader about rollcall votes this evening. I take it from what he said he does anticipate rollcalls.

Mr. DOLE. I do.

Mr. BYRD. Is there any window of opportunity for Senators who may have engagements elsewhere during the evening?

Mr. DOLE. I visited with a couple on the other side and they said that until about 7:30 they could make their contacts and be back.

Mr. BYRD. Between now and 7:30 there would be no rollcall votes?

Mr. DOLE. If there was a request we would not have the rollcall until 7:30.

Mr. BYRD. May I ask the distinguished majority leader what he anticipates for tomorrow?

Mr. DOLE. Well, I think the Commodity Credit matter can be resolved in an hour and the reconciliation may take a couple of hours. If we can do those two things, it would be my hope that on tomorrow we could lay down the water resources bill. I am advised by the manager that there might be enough work that would not require roll call votes that would take 3 or 4 hours tomorrow. There are a lot of discussions and there will be a lot of statements. We are trying to avoid any rollcalls, but I am not yet in a position to say that.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

One final question: In view of the items that he has indicated would probably be brought up this evening, together with rollcall votes thereon, what time does he think the Senate might be able to finish this evening?

Mr. DOLE. I would hope by 9:30. That may be optimistic.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, before the leaders depart, so far as I know there is no request for a vote on the pending amendment nor on final passage of the resolution now before the Senate. So for purposes of this measure, I do not think there will be any rollcall.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I have a question on SDI. The Senate some months ago in the last authorization bill reached a compromise on staff concerned with sorting through the SDI issue. Is one of the reasons for this request for additional staff in order to help the staff meet that Senate requirement?

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, the Senator is correct. I do not know specifically how the chairman wishes to allocate the $100,000, but a portion of it goes toward committee obligations under that request by the Senate as a whole.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank my friend and I hope it is accepted.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, if there is no further discussion on this I move adoption of the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1672) was ageed to.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, if there are no further amendments, and I know of none, nor does my colleague from Kentucky, I suggest that we move to the vote on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 353), as amended, was agreed to as follows:

S. RES. 353

Resolved, That this resolution may be cited as the "Omnibus Committee Funding Resolution of 1986."

AGGREGATE AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 2. (a) In carrying out its powers, duties, and functions under the Standing Rules of the Senate, and under the appropriate authorizing resolutions of the Senate, there is authorized in the aggregate $43,597,366, in accordance with the provisions of this resolution, for all Standing Committees of the Senate, the Special Committee on Aging, the Select Committee on Intelligence, and the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

(b) Each committee referred to in subsection (a) shall report its findings, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than February 28, 1987.

(c) Any expenses of a committee under this resolution shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee, except that vouchers shall not be required (1) for the disbursement of salaries of employees of the committees who are paid at an annual rate, or (2) for the payment of long-distance telephone calls.

(d) There are authorized such sums as may be necessary for agency contributions related to the compensation of employees of the committees from March 1, 1986, through February 28, 1987, to be paid from the appropriations account for "Expenses of inquiries and investigations".

(e) $335,000 of the aggregate unexpended balance of the funds authorized by the Omnibus Committee Funding Resolution of 1985 is hereby transferred to a special reserve and made available for use from March 1, 1986, through September 30, 1986. of this amount, $100,000 is authorized for the use of the Committee on Armed Services, and $235,000 is authorized for the use of the Committee on Finance.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY

SEC. 3. (c)(1) The committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to study or investigate—

(A) the efficiency and economy of operations of all branches of the Government including the possible existence of fraud, misfeasance, malfeasance, collusion, mismanagement, incompetence, corruption, or unethical practices, waste, extravagance, conflicts of interest, and the improper expenditure of Government funds in transactions, contracts, and activities of the Government or of Government officials and employees and any and all such improper practices between Government personnel and corporations, individuals, companies, or persons affiliated therewith, doing business with the Government; and the compliance or noncompliance of such corporations, companies, or individuals or other entities with the rules, regulations, and laws governing the various governmental agencies and its relationships with the public;

(B) the extent to which criminal or other improper practices or activities are, or have been, engaged in the field of labor-management relations or in groups or organizations of employees or employers, to the detriment of interests of the public, employers, or employees, and to determine whether any changes are required in the laws of the United States in order to protect such interests against the occurrence of such practices or activities;

(C) organized criminal activity which may operate in or otherwise utilize the facilities of interstate or international commerce in furtherance of any transactions and the manner and extent to which, and the identity of the persons, firms, or corporations, or other entities by whom such utilization is being made, and further, to study and investigate the manner in which and the extent to which persons engaged in organized criminal activity have infiltrated lawful business enterprise, and to study the adequacy of Federal laws to prevent the operations of organized crime in interstate or international commerce; and to determine whether any changes are required in the laws of the United States in order to protect the public against such practices or activities;

(D) all other aspects of crime and lawlessness within the United States which have an impact upon or affect the national health, welfare, and safety; including but not limited to investment fraud schemes, commodity and security fraud, computer fraud, and the use of offshore banking and corporate facilities to carry out criminal objectives;

(E) the efficiency and economy of operations of all branches and functions of the Government with particular reference to—

(i) the effectiveness of present national security methods, staffing, and processes as tested against the requirements imposed by the rapidly mounting complexity of national security problems;

(ii) the capacity of present national security staffing, methods, and processes to make full use of the Nation's resources of knowledge, and talents;

(iii) the adequacy of present intergovernmental relationships between the United States and international organizations principally concerned with national security of which the United States is a member; and

(iv) legislative and other proposals to improve these methods, processes, and relationships;

(F) the efficiency, economy, and effectiveness of all agencies and departments of the Government involved in the control and management of energy shortages including, but not limited to, their performance with respect to—

(i) the collection and dissemination of accurate statistics on fuel demand and supply;

(ii) the implementation of effective energy conservation measures;

(iii) the pricing of energy in all forms;

(iv) coordination of energy programs with State and local government;

(v) control of exports of scarce fuels;

(vi) the management of tax, import, pricing, and other policies affecting energy supplies;

(vii) maintenance of the independent sector of the petroleum industry as a strong competitive force;

(viii) the allocation of fuels in short supply by public and private entities;

(ix) the management of energy supplies owned or controlled by the Government;

(x) relations with other oil producing and consuming countries.

(xi) the monitoring of compliance by governments, corporations, or individuals with the laws and regulations governing the allocation, conservation, or pricing of energy supplies; and

(xii) research into the discovery and development of alternative energy supplies; and

(G) the efficiency and economy of all branches and functions of Government with particular reference to the operations and management of Federal regulatory policies and programs:

Provided, That, in carrying out the duties herein set forth, the inquiries of this committee or any subcommittee thereof shall not be deemed limited to the records, functions, and operations of any particular branch of the Government; but may extend to the records and activities of any persons, corporation, or other entity.

(2) Nothing contained in this section shall affect or impair the exercise of any other standing committee of the Senate of any power, or the discharge by such committee of any duty, conferred or imposed upon it by the Standing Rules of the Senate or by the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended.

(3) For the purpose of this section the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, or its chairman, or any other member of the committee or subcommittee designated by the chairman, from March 1, 1986, through February 28, 1987, is authorized, in its, his, or their discretion (A) to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of witnesses and production of correspondence, books, papers, and documents, (B) to hold hearings, (C) to sit and act at any time or place during the sessions, recess, and adjournment periods of the Senate, (D) to administer oaths, and (E) to take testimony, either orally or by sworn statement, or, in the case of staff members of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations specifically authorized by the chairman, by deposition.

INVESTIGATION BY THE COMMISSION ON SECURITY AND COOPERATION IN EUROPE

SEC. 23. (a) It is the sense of the Senate that the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe (hereafter in this section known as the "Commission") should—

(1) conduct an investigation to determine—

(A) whether any officer or employee of the United States violated any law of the United States or any State or local law, including any statute, regulation, ordinance, or procedure promulgated pursuant to law, in connection with the defection attempt of Miroslav Medvid;

(B) the instances in which an individual (other than the individual referred to in clause (A)), who was a national of the Soviet Union or a Soviet-bloc Eastern European country, requested political asylum in the United States and was returned to the authorities of his country in violation of any United States, State, or local law, including any statute, regulation, ordinance, or procedure promulgated pursuant to law; and

(C) whether the treatment accorded to individuals described in clauses (A) and (B) requires changes in the laws of the United States; and

(2) submit a report, not later than one year after the date of adoption of this resolution, to the House of Representatives and the Senate on the findings of such investigation, including any recommendations for changes in the laws of the United States.

(b) Salaries and expenses in connection with the implementation of this section shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate out of the Account for Miscellaneous Items, subject to the following terms and conditions:

(1) The aggregate amount of salaries and expenses payable under this section shall not exceed $200,000.

(2) Such salaries shall be payable only for not more than five individuals at any time—

(A) who shall be employees of the Senate and shall be under the policy direction of the Chairman and Cochairman of the Commission; and

(B) who shall be appointed to perform services in the conduct of activities under this section, on or after the date of adoption of this resolution, and who shall have their compensation fixed at an annual rate, by the Secretary of the Senate, upon the joint recommendation of the Chairman and Cochairman of the Commission.

(3) Payment of expenses shall be disbursed upon vouchers approved jointly by the Chairman and Cochairman of the Commission, and no voucher shall be required for the disbursement of a salary of an individual appointed under paragraph (2).

(4) For purposes of determining whether and to what extent any travel or other official expense incurred by the Commisson in carrying out any activitiy under this section is payable from the contingent fund of the Senate, such expense shall be treated as if it has been incurred by a standing committee of the Senate and as if the Commission and its staff were members and staff, respectively, of such a committee.

(5) Any expense under this section may be payable only if—

(A) the Committee on Rules and Administration of the Senate approves;

(B) such expense is of the type for which payment may be made if incurred by a standing committee of the Senate;

(C) such expense is not attributable to the detailing of employees; and

(D) the payment of such expense is otherwise in accordance with all laws, rules, and regulations governing expenses of standing committees of the Senate.

(6) Not more than $20,000 of the funds made available by this subsection shall be available for the procurement by the Secretary of the Senate, upon the joint recommendation of the Chairman and Cochairman of the Commission, of services, on a temporary basis, of individual consultants, or organizations thereof, with the prior consent of the Committee on Rules and Administration of the Senate. Such services may be procured by contract with the providers acting as independent contractors or, in the case of individuals, by employment at daily rates of compensation not in excess of the per diem equivalent of the highest gross rate of annual compensation which may be paid to employees of a standing committee of the Senate. Any such contract shall not be subject to the provisions of section 5 of title 41, United States Code, or any other provision of law requiring advertising.

(c) None of the funds may be obligated from the contingent fund of the Senate to carry out any provision of this section on or after a date 30 days after—

(1) the date on which the report described in subsection (a)(2) is submitted, or

(2) a date one year after the date of adoption of this resolution,

whichever comes first.

(d) For purposes of this section, the term "Soviet-bloc Eastern European country" includes Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Poland, and Romania.

Mr. FORD. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. WARNER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I thank my friends, the majority and minority leaders. I particularly wish to thank my friend from Kentucky. He is a leader on this committee and he showed his strength today, although I did not agree with him on all matters.

Mr. FORD. Well, Mr. President, that is what makes this world go around. That is why we have a deliberative body.

I thank all staff and Members for their help and I appreciate the majority and minority leaders' pushing forward so we could get to reconciliation.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me thank the managers, both the Senators from Kentucky (Mr. FORD) and the Senator from Virginia (Mr. WARNER), for their efforts. I am pleased this matter is disposed of for another year—hopefully. I must say I think we have to be as careful with the taxpayers's money when we are dealing with our committee budgets as we are when considering every other aspect of the budget. I think both the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. WARNER) and the distinguished Senator from Kentucky (Mr. FORD) demonstrated that care today. I appreciate their efforts.

I appreciate the efforts of other Senators who have been involved in the debate—Senator STEVENS and Senator HUMPHREY.

Mr. President, I am now prepared to proceed to the next matter, which will be the Commodity Credit Corporation.

THE SERGEANT AT ARMS OFFICE

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, we just passed something that I understand allocates a million and half dollars extra.

Mr. DOLE. No, Mr. President, that amendment was defeated.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, if the majority leader will yield further, I have no quarrel about the extra $100,000 or $200,000, but I have difficulty—what is bothering me is that the Sergeant at Arms recently fired 22 people, something in that order, because of a cutback in expenses without any special provision for them. Some of them, I am told, had seniority of 17 years, 19 years, 21 years. That $300,000 could have gone a long way toward providing for them.

It bothers me, as a human being, that we fire people. I do not know what provision was made for them, I do not know what notice was given. I wonder if the majority leader is in a position to tell us what are the facts with respect to that precipitate kind of firing, while we could find an extra $300,000 here today?

Mr. President, I do not mean to embarrass the majority leader. I guess he may not even have been involved in the matter, but it does concern me. I thought he might shed some light on it for me.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I would be happy to provide that information for the record. I only know generally that, like everything else in the Federal Government, in the so-called mailing department, which handles the Senators' mail and other things, there were 440-some employees, about 4.5 per Senator. Many of us thought it was time we started reducing some of these overblown agencies in Government, including our own.

I would be glad to provide specific information for the record.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I would appreciate it, Mr. President, and I would like to know if the seniority of some of these people was taken into consideration. Some of them, I understand, worked for as long as 20 years. They are entitled to some kind of consideration.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I asked the Sergeant at Arms to be certain that he can justify every case. I shall be glad to submit that information for the record.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Senator.

URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on House Joint Resolution 534 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HECHT). The report will be stated.

The Assistant Legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 534) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have failed to agree.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, we have before us the conference report from the committee of conference on the urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending September 30. Senators will remember that an earlier emergency supplemental appropriations bill was approved by the Senate. This is the second bill which is needed to provide additional funds for reimbursement for net realized losses of the Commodity Credit Corporation. This bill will provide $5 billion for those purposes.

These funds are urgently needed in order to resume the price and income support programs of the CCC. Those activities were, in effect, shut down last Wednesday because the $25 billion statutory limitation on CCC obligations to the Treasury had been reached. It is estimated that this appropriation will allow CCC to administer its activities and programs, which are required by law, through at least the end of this summer. The resolution, as originally passed by the House, inlcuded language which would have limited the flexibility to operate certain programs which were authorized in the farm bill that was approved by Congress and signed by the President last year.

One of these provisions was the Conservation Reserve, which is designed to retire up to 45 million acres of fragile and erodible land from production by helping farmers to plant a ground cover on that land, and paying a rental fee for 10 years for that retired land. This program is to be operated on a bid basis, and because it is a new program with no participation history, there is no way to estimate the costs of the program. Therefore, it was determined during consideration of the farm bill that there should be authority for the use of funds from the Commodity Credit Corporation for the first 2 years of the program. Subsequently, it would be financed by annual appropriations.

The Senate, when it took action on the bill, struck the House provision by adopting an amendment that was offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. ABDNOR] in a meeting of the full Committee on Appropriations. The vote in committee, incidentally, was 14 to 2 to strike that language. It was the position taken in committee that the language added by the House would jeopardize farmer confidence in the Conservation Reserve, reduce participation, and undermine the intent of Congress regarding the operation of the program. The conferees agreed to the Senate position on that item. There was some language added, but the Senate position was sustained in the conference.

The House also included language when it passed its bill and sent it to the Senate that would make an appropriation necessary for the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation to borrow from the Commodity Credit Corporation.

Senators may remember that when the farm bill was passed, the Agriculture Committee included language which gave the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation authority to borrow from the Commodity Credit Corporation to pay claims to those insured by the Corporation if funds were not otherwise available. This, of course, was a provision in the farm bill that was thought at the time to be necessary and important so that the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation would not be in a position of defaulting on claims or other payments to commission agents or others including farmers, that it was required to make, simply because Congress might have been delayed in its consideration of a supplemental appropriations bill, as often occurs. The Corporation had run out of money four times in one year, and that was one of the reasons why the Agriculture Committee sought to make that change in the law.

So when the House sent this bill to the Senate, it added language that amended the farm bill, in effect, by taking away that borrowing authority.

Again, in the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. ABDNOR] in the Committee on Appropriations, the Senate Committee on Appropriations rejected the House language. So this was a matter at issue in conference. I am happy to report again to the Senate that the Senate conferees were able to sustain in conference the position of the Senate on that item. So there is no provision in this conference report relating to the borrowing authority of the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation.

The House did, however, insist on language relating to the insured loan program of the Farmers Home Administration.

In conference, during the discussion on these items I have referred to—availability of CCC funds for the conservation reserve program and the borrowing authority of the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation—the House insisted that language be provided to clearly state the insistance of the conferees that funds previously appropriated for the insured loan program of the Farmers Home Administration be made available until expended for the balance of this fiscal year.

Initially, the Senate conferees rejected that, but the House conferees insisted. Finally, after negotiation of whether or not it would be acceptable to have language in the statement of the managers, which the Senate suggested to the House conferees, it was finally agreed that a provision would be included in the resolution providing that funds for the insured operating loan program of the Farmers Home Administration shall be available at the level previously appropriated in the Continuing Resolution, Public Law 99-190, except as that level may be reduced by the terms of the sequester order implemented on March 1, 1986. That sequester order, of course, was implemented under the terms and provisions of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings measure.

This means, in effect, that it was the feeling of the conferees that approximately $2.6 billion will be available this year for operating loans administered by the Farmers Home Administration.

Let me say at this point, Mr. President, that Senators should be aware of the fact that, because of pressure on that loan account, the administration, on its own, has just announced in the last few days that it is making available an additional $700 million in addition to the approximately $1.7 billion that it previously indicated it would use for Farmers Home insured loans to help ease the credit crunch that is affecting so many farmers throughout the country. An additional $50 million in guaranteed loan funds is also being made available through a transfer.

I am saying that to explain to Senators that the action taken by this conference in specifying its view as to how much should be made available and used by the administration in this program is only about $300 million more than the administration has already expressed a willingness to use and is already programming for its Farmers Home to use throughout the country.

That is the conference report as it is pending before the Senate. I hope it can be approved by the Senate and sent to the President, so that it can be signed and these funds made available to the Commodity Credit Corporation, so that its programs can be administered and farmers can proceed with some certainty in the knowledge that the loan programs and the income support structure will be there, and funding will be made available to operate the programs.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, I rise in strong support of the conference report. The chairman of the Agriculture Appropriations Subcommittee has fully outlined the need for this funding, and I commend him for the work he has done in bringing the measure this far.

As I stated earlier when we consider this funding, the signup for the 1986 Farm Program has begun. Congress and the administration have promised the farmers that they can have 40 percent of their deficiency payments in advance in order to help them put in their crops. With the limited credit that is available to farmers this spring, many of them are counting on this money in order to put their crop in. Without it, they cannot farm.

So the farmers are at the mercy of Congress. We promise them something, but we don't deliver. That is why this measure has to be approved immediately.

I want to make it perfectly clear to my colleagues that this CCC funding is not, in any way, busting the budget. The farm bill that we passed last year dictates the amount of money we spend on our farm programs. We are simply reimbursing the CCC for the losses it incurs in the process. We are not increasing budget outlays or budget authority with this $5 billion.

Mr. President, regarding the provision which would have made the funding for the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation and the Conservation Reserve under the new farm bill subject to appropriations, I really question its usefulness. In my mind, these programs are intended to benefit the farmer. So the farmer should be the person we think of when dealing with and changing the programs.

It is unconscionable for the Government of the United States of America to make a promise in the form of a contract with our farmers and to renege on that contract. By making these programs subject to appropriations makes it very possible for the Government to do that. We have a lot of trouble around here getting appropriations passed in time to fund necessary programs. Last year we had continuing resolution after continuing resolution to fund vital programs for the beginning of fiscal year 1986. We see the Commodity Credit Corporation shut down because of lack of appropriations.

Mr. President, I question the validity of this approach. I am pleased that this provision was deleted by the Senate and agreed to in conference.

Mr. President, the conference report on the CCC supplemental appropriations reiterates that the amount of money to be used for direct operating loans through the Farmers Home Administration for 1986 will be the amount approved last year in the Appropriations Act.

We have a problem because there is a lower amount for these loans in the farm bill—lower by $1 billion. However, let the RECORD show that Congress passed the higher level of funding after it had approved the farm bill.

Because we knew that there would be another credit crisis this spring, we knew that we had to make adequate credit available for our farmers. And we were right. Several States have run out of direct operating loan funds. My State of North Dakota ran out of its first- and second-quarter funds on February 21—well over a month before the third-quarter funds were to be available. Then the third- and fourth-quarter funds were made available. This may come as a surprise to many of you, but those funds were exhausted on the same day that they were made available.

So my State has used up all of the money that has been made available for the entire year, and they are in the midst of the lending season. Spring planting has not even started.

In its wisdom, this administration has chosen to provide the lower level of funding provided in the farm bill, even though it has the authority to provide the higher level. Clearly, the intent of Congress was to provide the higher level since it approved the higher level more recently than it had approved the lower level. But this administration chose to ignore congressional intent, and instead followed the funding level in the farm bill. It justifies this action because the farm bill was signed after the appropriations bill. Well I submit that the reason for that was purely logistical and had nothing to do with the need of our farmers, the intent of Congress, or the goal of fairness.

So this conference report merely directs the administration to make the money available that was previously appropriated. The difference is $1 billion. It is not a new appropriation. It is desperately needed. And it is the only fair thing to do. It is fair because it is implicitly unfair to deny loans to farmers because of a lack of funding when other equally qualified farmers received the loans because they got their applications in first.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to approve this measure without further delay.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, when the distinguished chairman of our subcommittee, the Senator from Mississippi, brought this bill to the floor, he pointed out that it was the urgent supplemental. Mr. President, that is a terminology that we use for supplementals that have to be moved through in a rapid pace. But there is more than just terminology to this urgent supplemental. This is the funding for the farmers who are about to go into the field.

Mr. President, farmers have to operate according to the Lord's calendar. They cannot put their work off until some group of politicians decide they are going to get around to putting the money in the bank that should have been there in the first place.

Let us point out what this bill does. It puts $5 billion into CCC. That account is overdrawn, shall we say. You cannot overdraw it, but it is pushing to be overdrawn because there is no more money left.

When farmers come in to take a loan on their crops as they have been for the last 7 days, there has been no money there. The farmers cannot make loans under which they are entitled to by the law.

That is not right. That is not fair. It is a catch-22 situation.

So there is indeed and in fact, Mr. President, an urgent supplemental that needs to be addressed now. Quite frankly, it should have been addressed a week or 2 ago instead of running out and further jeopardizing the creditability of America's farmers.

The chairman also pointed out, Mr. President, that there is a supplemental, an addition or a statement within the bill that the appropriated level of Farmers Home funding should be looked at instead of the lower authorized level.

The appropriated level is a level again that is not going to open up some new program to the farmers. It is not going to qualify more for operating loans than are already qualified.

All it says, Mr. President, is that for those farmers who are now entitled to an operating loan, qualify, have the proper cash-flow, have their applications in and their applications approved, there is going to be money there so they can be funded so that they can put that crop in the ground.

Let me point out what happens if we do not do this on a timely basis: If you do not do it on a timely basis we throw more of a load on local banks that are unable to stretch their lending limits any further.

Let me point out another interesting thing, Mr. President, the unique characteristic of this fund. The $5 billion that is in the fund for normal CCC operation allows the farmers to take their advanced payments as they come up to sign for the farm program that this Congress has passed and if they are able, Mr. President, to pick up those advance payments there will be less demand on crop operating loans. There is a mention of a veto threat from the White House.

I wish, Mr. President, the President of the United States would look a little closer to what is going on in rural America. You know, not only do we have to work by the calendar, but there is a depression going on in rural America today. We are receiving less than 2 percent return on our investment.

Everyone is talking about the jeopardy farmers are in. One of the best ways to relieve the jeopardy is to make sure that funding is available for the farm bills we have already passed, imperfect though those bills might be.

Everyone is talking about the jeopardy farmers are in. One of the best ways to relieve the jeopardy is to make sure that funding is available for the farm bills we have already passed, imperfect though those bills might be.

So, Mr. President, tonight I would plead with my colleagues that we forget these mistaken statements about there is some technical glitch here and if we do not address it, it is going to cost us more money down the line. It will cost us more money down the line because it costs us more money in operating loans and other types of credit to America's farm families.

Let us not listen to that idea that somehow or another we can wait while we go through this process for yet another week, because that turns farmers away from their local ASCS offices.

This is a bill that makes sense. It is a bill that is in the best interest of the Nation. The President himself, and I think someone on his staff got through with the right message, then has already disbursed $700 million of the $1 billion that we add in this bill.

So why object to $1 billion when 2 days ago you have already done $700 million, recognizing that the need was there.

It would seem, Mr. President, that all of the facts indicate that we should move this bill as expeditiously as possible because, indeed and in fact, it is an urgent supplemental, one that makes sense, one that is needed by America's farmers, but even more important, let me close with a thought, Mr. President, it represents the fulfillment of a commitment already made by this Congress to those very same farmers, a commitment that they have been led to count on because all this money in this bill does is to make the bill that is now the law of the land operational. Without it, Congress has broken faith with America's farmers at one of the toughest economic times in the history of agriculture.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, pursuant to section 904, I move to waive section 311 of the Budget Act for the purpose of the House amendment to the Senate amendment, reported in disagreement.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. DENTON). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I have moved the waiver of section 311 under section 904 to assure that the House amendment to the Senate amendment reported in disagreement, which is in violation of budget requirements under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill, be voted on concerning the point of order that lies against it.

My concern, Mr. President, was that to simply raise the point of order under section 311 on the amendment and have the Chair rule in favor of that point of order, would set up a sequence of parliamentary maneuvers where someone might move to overturn the ruling of the Chair and thereby with 51 votes overrule the sustained point of order.

Waiving the point of order will require a three-fifths vote as provided for under the Balanced Budget Emergency Deficit Control Act.

Mr. President, the House amendment to the Senate amendment reported in disagreement provides for funds that are $919 million above the levels scored for the purposes of the budget and for the purposes of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill. I, therefore, have moved to waive the point of order so that Members might vote on whether to sustain the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill.

I urge my colleagues to join me and vote no on this motion to waive.

Mr. DOMENICI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, while some other procedure might have been used, the Senator from Texas has proposed to the Senate that Gramm-Rudman-Hollings be waived. I assume he has told the Senate that he does not favor his own motion, and that he did it for purposes of making sure that everyone knew that the amendment in disagreement which the House has asked our Appropriations Committee to bring before the Senate indeed violates the Budget Act of the U.S. Congress.

It does that because we are at a point in the budget cycle where this amendment, however worthy it is, adds about $900 million to the outlays for this year. And we are already in excess of the maximum allowed. It violates the Budget Act in that the total outlay ceiling for the year is already in violation, and so we add almost $1 billion there. And it is clearly subject to a point of order.

I urge that the Senator's motion be turned down. For us to waive will require 60 votes. In plain, simple language, if the Senate desires to vote 60 Senators in favor of this motion, they will be deciding on a piecemeal basis one bill at a time that the ceilings and mandates of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law which we just adopted are not applicable, and that we intend to violate it here tonight.

I do not think the Senate ought to do that. Frankly, I think we are taking a risk for the rest of the year, and in fact for the rest of 5 years if we waive it by 60 votes tonight. The risk is that there will be little or no enforcement left for those bills, resolutions or amendments which break the ceiling.

The ceiling is plenty high already. We will exceed the maximum by about $12 to $15 billion already by actions that preceded Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

There are other reasons why we should not pass the $1 billion amendment pending. If we fail to go along with the motion that is pending we will have effectively killed that amendment or at least it will not have been sent back to the House with the concurrence of the U.S. Senate.

There are some other reasons. For those who are worried about the farmers, the President has said he will veto the bill with this $1 billion on it. So, clearly, the CCC urgency will be worse, not better, if we adopt a bill with an additional $1 billion because, just as certain as we have a problem now, it will be bigger because the President will veto it.

If that is not enough, perhaps some would just say, "Let us let it happen."

The other thing that has happened is that the President has transferred $750 million from the emergency fund for this same purpose. For the exact same purpose for which this $1 billion can be used, the $750 million can be used. He had an emergency fund which has already been counted in the budget totals and, consequently, his moving that over and making it available does not breach the budget targets as does the $1 billion that is before us.

So it seems to me on all scores a bad precedent for the future under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings and its enforceability. The President will veto it so things will be worse rather than better. If we can pass a clean $5 billion CCC funding without the $1 billion addition, there is already $750 million which the President in a release today acknowledged he had told the Secretary of Agriculture to use on his behalf, and he has such authority.

So I urge the Senate not to support the motion made by the distinguished Senator and author of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, that we turn it down so that we can start down the road of enforcing its provisions. I yield the floor.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COCHRAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I think Senators are entitled to understand that one of the problems that we faced as we tried to determine the intention of Congress with respect to the levels of funding available to the Farmers Home Administration was the fact that the farm bill conference report, which prescribed authorized levels of funding, was passed by the Congress on December 18, 1985. The continuing resolution, which was also approved by Congress, provided funding to carry out the authorized programs under that farm bill, and it was approved on the following day, December 19, 1985.

The levels of funding in the continuing resolution were higher for this insured loan program of the Farmers Home Administration by about $1 billion, than the authorized level as contained in the farm bill for fiscal year 1986.

The continuing resolution was signed by the President; the farm bill was signed by the President.

The question before the Senate tonight is: Which act controls? The appropriations bill or the farm bill, the authorizing bill, both of which passed the Congress and both signed by the President?

I think a very strong argument can and should be made that the act of Congress that was adopted last is the controlling act of the Congress, and that the level of funding recommended by the Appropriations Committee, approved by the Senate, approved by the House and signed by the President should be given preference.

If so, then the language in this conference report, which simply states that the conferees insist that the previously appropriated level of funding be made available to the Farmers Home Administration until expended for this fiscal year, violates neither the Budget Act nor Gramm-Rudman. It specifically provides that it is subject to Gramm-Rudman and the sequester order dated March 1, 1986.

I am suggesting here that what we are seeing is an effort by those who are identified with the Budget Committee—and I have every bit of respect one can possibly have for the distinguished chairman of that committee, and the distinguished Senator from Texas as well—an effort being made simply to usurp the prerogatives of the Appropriations Committee and push the Senate to agree by using this mechanism to refuse to waive the Budget Act.

I say whether we waive the Budget Act or not, the controlling level of funding available to the Farmers Home Administration for this fiscal year is the amount in the continuing resolution that was passed by the Congress and signed by the President.

I do not know but what this is an empty gesture, an expression that Gramm-Rudman has been passed and the provisions of it are effective, that they have the force and effect of law. OK, so what? The Senate can still approve this conference report and send it to the President for his signature.

If he decides to veto it, that is up to him. I do not think he will veto it. I do not think he should veto it because they reprogrammed, taking money from other programs to add at least $700 million already to the Farmers Home insured operating loan account and $50 million to the guaranteed operating loan account.

We are suggesting that the full amount appropriated under the continuing resolution be used, subject to the sequester order.

Mr. HARKIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I wonder if the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Agriculture will yield for a couple of questions. I heard this on my office speaker, and I wanted to get here to be involved in this debate because this is a very important issue to the farmers all over this country, especially in my home State of Iowa.

I would like to ask the distinguished chairman—and he may have already answered this question, but I apologize if on the way over here I missed the answer—as I understand it, the continuing resolution that passed here in December contained $5.082 billion for the Farmers Home Administration direct and guaranteed operating and ownership loans. Is that correct?

Mr. COCHRAN. The Senator is correct. That is all of the loan accounts, both direct and guaranteed.

Mr. HARKIN. That was a continuing resolution? That was an appropriations measure?

Mr. COCHRAN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HARKIN. And we passed it.

Mr. COCHRAN. That is correct.

Mr. HARKIN. Then, after that, Mr. President, a day after that, the farm bill was passed setting the ceiling——

Mr. COCHRAN. The day before the continuing resolution was adopted by Congress, the farm bill conference report was adopted.

Mr. HARKIN. The day before.

Mr. COCHRAN. The day before. December 18, the farm bill was agreed to, and December 19, the continuing resolution was approved.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank the distinguished chairman for correcting me on that. I was not reading my notes right. That is correct.

The farm bill was an authorization, and we passed an authorization of $4 billion, but we passed an appropriation of $5.082 billion the day after in the Senate.

Mr. COCHRAN. That is correct.

Mr. HARKIN. I understand a point of order—well, a motion to waive the point of order is now raised.

Mr. COCHRAN. It is actually a motion to waive the Budget Act.

Mr. HARKIN. That is correct.

Now, let me ask the distinguished chairman if, on December 19, the day the continuing resolution was passed, would that not have been subject to the same motion at that time under the Budget Act?

Mr. COCHRAN. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. HARKIN. Well, I wonder, why was it not raised at that time? And why is it being raised now?

Mr. President, I submit that what is happening and what we may see happening right now is, again, a technicality. It is clear that the intention of this Chamber and of the other one was to fund this at the $5 billion level. That was appropriation, not authorization. And no point of order was raised against it here, on the Senate floor.

We have now this motion before us to waive the Budget Act, and I understand why it was done. I think the Senator from Texas clearly stated because it takes a three-fifths vote of the Senate to waive the Budget Act rather than just a mere majority if a point of order were raised.

Again, Mr. President, what we have is $1 billion being taken out of our farmers' pockets, $1 billion that is needed for direct and guaranteed operating and ownership loans.

Mr. President, last year, $5.4 billion was loaned under these programs, and the need this year is much greater than it was last year—much greater than it was last year. And last year, we loaned out $5.4 billion.

I submit that we are caught here again in a technicality. Understandably, we shall have to vote on that. But I want all Senators to understand that this is a substantive vote, to take $1 billion away from farmers that the Senate voted for on December 19 and now we are being asked to take it away at a time when farmers have to get in their fields and plant a crop. This loan money is needed and needed desperately, and because of a technicality, we are going to take $1 billion away.

Mr. President, we heard a lot of talk on the Senate floor last week when this Senator was involved with the distinguished majority leader in a little controversy about technicalities and about holding up a bill for a few days because of a "technicality." This is not just holding up a bill, Mr. President, this is taking a billion dollars out of a program that we voted to appropriate money for here on December 19 of last year.

I think it ought to be clear to every farmer out there who needs this loan money, who is going to walk into his Farmers Home office, who may be qualified for the loan, needs it, and is turned down because the money will not be there. Or to that young farmer who, maybe, could buy some of this land at now depressed prices so he could start farming, engage in farming, and he cannot get an ownership loan because this money is taken away.

I want all of those farmers to know who is raising this point, who is raising this little technicality here that is going to take a billion dollars away from them.

I hope the Senate will not adhere to a mere technicality, but will understand that we voted with our eyes open to appropriate $5 billion on December 19 of last year and no point of order was raised by the Senator from Texas, who is now raising this little parliamentary maneuver to try to take $1 billion away from this program. I am hopeful, Mr. President, that when we proceed to a vote on this, as I suppose we will, that Senators will adhere to the vote they cast on December 19 on appropriating this money, $5 billion.

This could not come at a worse time, Mr. President. If I use strong language, it is because I just saw yesterday about a 55-year-old farmer over in the Russell Building, standing in front of about 50 fellow farm bureau members break down and cry because he just lost 120 acres and his son just had to be forced out of farming. Now we are being asked to cut $1 billion out of needed farm operating and ownership loans.

Mr. President, I am hopeful that the Senate will sustain the position taken by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agricultural Appropriations and the chairman of the full Appropriations Committee. They brought this measure to the floor last December 19 in a continuing resolution and we voted for it.

Mr. HELMS and Mr. EXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina sought recognition first.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

Before we get too immersed in dates, let me say it is true enough that the farm bill passed on December 18 of last year and it is true that the continuing resolution passed on December 19. But if we are going to rest the case on dates, I must point out that the President signed the continuing resolution into law on December 19 and he signed the farm bill into law on December 23. I happen to think that the dates are irrelevent to the immediate question.

I also happen to think that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Budget stated the case accurately. It may be that those who are tuned into the Senate's proceedings on radio are confused at this point.

The distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. GRAMM] has offered a motion which he has stated very clearly that he will vote against and he has encouraged other Senators to do likewise. This is sometimes necessary to get the train moving around this place. It is a parliamentary move that I myself have used from time to time when a stalemate seemed to be in progress. But there is one thing that the American people need not be confused about in connection with this debate at this point. That is this: We are talking about a $913 million increase in the Federal deficit. Mr. President, I cannot support the level of appropriations for the Farmers Home Administration insured operating loan program contained in the supplemental.

Let me introduce just for the purposes of the RECORD so it will be clear, this bill is subject to a point of order under section 311(a) of the Budget Act, as amended by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, because it in fact increases the deficit by $913 million and the waiver of such a point of order requires a supermajority of the Senate—that is to say, 60 votes. In order that Senators may consider the assistance available to farmers already under Farmers Home, perhaps it would be relevant to review the programs.

This year, there is a total of $2.2 billion available in Direct Farm Operating Loans Program. This includes the $700 million that the President has transferred into operating loans from the Emergency Disaster Program earlier this week—$700 million. In addition, there is $1.7 billion available for guaranteed farm operating loans.

Then, Mr. President, to complement the Guaranteed Loan Program, there is a total of $490 million over a period of 3 years for an Interest Rate Buydown Program, $120 million of which will be used this year. Under this program, borrowers can receive up to a 4-percent reduction in their interest rates, dropping them to levels actually lower than the rates under the Farmers Home Program in most cases.

Also, I think it is worthy of note that about $4 billion in advanced deficiency and diversion payments will be paid to farmers in April and May of this year.

This is more than a 50-percent increase over the $2.6 billion paid out last year. Obviously, this will decrease the amount of credit needed by farmers this spring.

Mr. President, all of us should be aware that too much credit on easy term over the years is the reason many of our farmers are in trouble today. The Agriculture Committee held hearings recently at which there was testimony by the General Accounting Office and the USDA that the Farmers Home Administration is doing everything within reason to assist viable farm borrowers to remain in business.

Now, the key word here, of course, is "viable." I do not know whether we are going to proceed down that slippery slope of trying to extend more and more loans to farmers whom we know have no chance of showing a positive cash flow. I think we need to examine how fair that is to the taxpayers.

As a matter of fact, we must ask just how fair is it to the farmer to give him hope when there is no hope, when the debt is such that there is no possibility of his surviving as a viable businessman.

There is no doubt from the information available that all Farmers Home borrowers who can show a positive cash flow, a positive cash flow, Mr. President, will be helped by this agency.

So the bottom line—and I say this as one who is just as concerned about the farmers of America as anybody else—the bottom line is that the Farmers Home Administration does not need additional funding to provide necessary credit to eligible borrowers.

Now, if we are going to say eligible or ineligible, it does not matter. And that is a pretty interesting development in terms of the intent of this Senate.

Mr. President, I have to say that I thorougly agree with the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee, and I commend the Senator from Texas for proceeding with the motion against which he will vote himself and I shall join him.

I thank the Chair and I yield the floor.

Mr. EXON addressed the chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, this is a tremendously interesting vote and a vote that I am surprised hit us this early on Gramm-Rudman. It was at this desk when Gramm-Rudman was before this body that this Senator was up and he warned, he warned specifically what was going to happen at sometime in the future.

Frankly, Mr. President, I did not expect it would come in this form or under these terms. As has been explained by the distinguished Republican chairman of the Appropriations Committee, not generally known as a farm State Senator, and by the able chairman of agriculture appropriations, the able Senator from Mississippi, the junior Senator from Mississippi, another Republican, you are making a stand on Gramm-Rudman at a time that you do not need to make a stand on Gramm-Rudman unless you want to go out of your way to further punish the heartland of America that is in a depression.

Play with the numbers all that you will. I do not believe that the likes of MARK HATFIELD, the Senator from Oregon, or THAD COCHRAN, the Senator from Mississippi, would be standing on the floor of the U.S. Senate telling us that this does not violate the appropriations process and therefore Gramm-Rudman is not in order. They have made that point and they have made it clearly. This is not an appropriation bill, per se. This is a conference report. They have not gone beyond what the continuing resolution provided when we enacted it on December 19.

Now, those who are going through clever parliamentary procedures, not only to make a point of order, which would be the normal thing to do, but asking for waiver of the Gramm-Rudman Budget Act, are simply trying to get 10 more votes that we would need to set this aside.

You can explain this any way you want, but the bottom line is it is an antifarm vote. And every scorecard of every major farm organization will so indicate. So everyone who supports the motion from the junior Senator from Texas will be scored, I am sure, as an antifarm vote—probably even by the Farm Bureau, which would not normally do such a thing, but I think they will now.

Mr. President, as one of the 22 or 23 Members of this body who voted against Gramm-Rudman, I knew things like this were going to come up, and I knew that it would force cuts in the national defense far above what I think is necessary. I made that point very clear at that time. It is all coming home to roost earlier than I had anticipated.

After this Senator was 1 of the 22 or 23 Senators who voted against Gramm-Rudman, the 3 Members of the House delegation from Nebraska held a press conference the next day or so fully covered by television reporters, and those 3 farm State Congress people who supported Gramm-Rudman on the floor of the House of Representatives could not keep it to themselves. They attacked this Senator and my colleague, Senator ZORINSKY, for opposing Gramm-Rudman because we were not fiscally responsible. They further made the commitment at that time, they being the three Members of the House delegation from the farm State of Nebraska, that we should not worry; that Gramm-Rudman would have no effect, Gramm-Rudman would have no effect on agriculture.

At least the three Representatives from Nebraska were misinforming their constituents, or at best they did not know what they were doing when they voted for Gramm-Rudman. And here it is coming home to roost in the U.S. Senate. It seems to me, Mr. President, that some explanations are in order. At least I admire the junior Senator from Texas for standing up firmly for what he believes. He is entitled to do that. I do not agree with the junior Senator from Texas, but I believe the junior Senator from Texas is trying to protect the bill of which he was one of the main inventors. It became Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. He is sincere in his belief. I think he is wrong, but I at least give him credit for being sincere in his belief. If he is sincere in his belief, I suppose the right thing for him to have done was to ask for a waiver rather than a point of order, which would have required only 51 votes to override.

I do hope that sometime, though, the junior Senator from Texas can sit down with three Members of the House who represent the agricultural State of Nebraska and explain to them how Gramm-Rudman was not going to "hurt," in their words, agriculture. It is here right now, and it is with us right now.

Those who voted for the continuing resolution—I think it clearly indicates that this is not a violation of Gramm-Rudman, as explained in previous debate—those who supported that continuing resolution and voted for Gramm-Rudman have to ask themselves the question, which vote was right and which vote was wrong, because there is no way both can be right.

To put it another way, this is the "altar call" if you will, for those who voted for the continuing resolution and for Gramm-Rudman.

Among other reasons, Mr. President, that have been previously stated by my able colleague, the junior Senator from Iowa—another prime farm State—another reason why this is vitally needed now is this: This argument goes to the heart of the problem that I hope my colleagues are listening to. There are not a lot of them here on the floor of the U.S. Senate. I know that many of them are listening in their offices. I hope they will understand what this vote is all about. It is all about whether or not we are going to keep the commitment we made when we passed the continuing resolution, which was signed into law by the President of the United States, December last.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I was interested to hear the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, the Republican chairman of the Agriculture Committee, who has never been acceptable to anything for agriculture except tobacco—a very effective representative of tobacco, but he is not an effective spokesman for agriculture, which I suggest that the chairman of the Agriculture Committee should be.

Once again I say that he has every right to his opinion, but he is wrong. Why is he wrong? The chairman of the Agriculture Committee said a few moments ago, on the floor of the U.S. Senate, that much of the problem in agriculture today is too much credit on easy terms, and that is why the farmers are in trouble.

Mr. President, I would not disagree that some banks, the Farm Credit System, the Farmers Home Administration, and others, undoubtedly made some loans at sometime in the past that should not have been made, and may have inadvertently caused the demise of some of the farmers who are in difficulty today. But if ever there was a time to be a little bit lenient, it is right now.

The Senator from Iowa told of a farmer standing before a farm meeting in Washington, DC this week. I believe it was in Washington, DC. Yesterday, in my office, two prominent, well-respected, not fly-by-night farmers were in my office as part of the National Corn Growers meeting. I am not going to reveal their names, and I am not going to reveal in detail the story they told me.

I was amazed what these two men told me about their difficulties in arranging financing right now. They told me about a situation of another prominent member of the Nebraska Corn Growers, who, as of now, is not able to get a loan to put his crops in the ground for this 1986 year.

Mr. President, the tendency around here, it seems to me, is to indicate that every farmer who is in trouble is a ne'er-do-well of some type, who does not know how to farm, and should not be farming in the first place. Let us set the record straight on that. There may have been some of those farmers around before the Reagan administration, but they are all gone now, and they have been gone for 2 or 3 years.

We are now cutting into the core of the unrealistic farm programs that are not only causing a depression in rural America but also are making it difficult for a successful operator to meet the cash-flow that is necessary to get loans from the Farm Credit Administration, from the Farmers Home Administration, and from banks.

Here we are at a time when the Farmers Home Administration concedes that they are short of funds. Here we are considering not approving a modest recommendation that is not over the budget, as has been explained previously by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee and the junior Senator from Mississippi.

There is no other conclusion to be drawn: a profarm vote or an antifarm vote, and that should be clearly laid on the line.

In this particular case, Mr. President, someone or some group, not on this side of the aisle, has decided to make a case—the first important test of Gramm-Rudman—against the basic interests of the American farmer, at a time that could not possibly be worse. The vote we are going to cast on this measure is one that will be around a long, long, long time.

Mr. President, I also notice that there has been reference to the fact that the President—out of the goodness of his heart, I guess—released $750 million for additional, direct Farmers Home Administration loans. The President did that. I am delighted that he did.

About 3 weeks ago, this Senator was the first Member of the House of Representatives or the U.S. Senate to point out the fact that we did not have enough money to meet the needs of lenders and that we were way below the amount available, even compared with last year. So I salute the President for his "generosity," and I made the point that that was the right thing to do, but that is only a drop in the bucket.

Since others brought up this $750 million that was generally brought forth by the President of the United States, I thought it also should be said that this came about at a time, strangely enough, when the President was summoning down to the White House Members from farm States, to try to get them to go along with the $100 million donation to the Contras in Central America, wherever they are.

There have been newspaper stories, and there has been an awful lot on television, to indicate that maybe the President of the United States thought he could buy a few votes—of the 20 or 30 that he is supposedly short in the House of Representatives—for his 100 million dollars' worth of Contra aid by advancing some money to those farm State representatives, in attempting to buy their votes. I am not saying that is true, but the implication is clearly there.

Mr. President, I would hope we would have many Members of the Senate who want to stand up for the American farmer to come to the floor of the Senate and speak out. Whether they do or not when the vote is called, I would hope that my colleagues would have the courage whether they voted for Gramm-Rudman or not to recognize that is not the question here now.

As to those who invented the initial point of order that was expected to be raised and later the parliamentary technique of going to waiving the Gramm-Rudman proposal, which takes 60 votes, I would hope that when they vote for that they should understand that, despite the fact that the originators of this clever move are trying to use Gramm-Rudman to enforce something, that obviously is not necessary, as previously explained by those Senators who have previously referred to.

It is a clear case of someone or some group or somebody going clearly out of their way, Mr. President, clearly out of their way to punish the American food producer at a time when it is most inopportune.

There, Mr. President, I hope and I plead that the motion made by the junior Senator from Texas will be defeated when it comes to a vote.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I am inclined not to respond to personal attacks, but my father once told me that the best way to determine whether a stick is crooked or not is to lay a straight one beside it.

I must point out that I supported the conference report on the farm bill. It contained 19 titles with a total cost of $52 billion over 3 years and $110 billion over 5 years. The farm commodities covered included programs for wheat, feed grains, cotton, rice, soybeans, sugar, honey, wool, peanuts and dairy.

The bill provides for projected deficiency and diversion payments for 1986 crops that will exceed $12 billion, compared to $6.8 billion for 1985 crops. There will be between $4 billion and $5 billion in payments to wheat producers for 1986 crops, compared to about $2 billion for the 1985 wheat crop. Likewise, there is expected to be $8 billion paid to corn farmers for 1986, compared to about $4 billion for 1985. All in all, there will be $24.6 billion in net outlays from the Commodity Credit Corporation in fiscal year 1986 for all crops.

Mr. President, I further point out that tobacco was not even included in the farm bill. Certainly any reasonable person would conclude from this that any interests go beyond one crop.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Trible). The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I am very anxious to move to a vote. This is a terribly confusing issue that we are really facing with the author of Gramm-Rudman making a motion to waive something that he wants people now to vote against. He himself is going to vote against it, which is adding to the confusion. But the leadership of this supplemental, which includes the chairman of the Subcommittee on Agriculture, will probably vote that way or will not attempt to override the waiver. This will cause a lot of confusion, I am sure.

But I would like to just outline two points because if the scenario works out whereby the waiver is not voted that requires a three-fifths vote, we are still back with the basic instrument on the floor here, which is the supplemental as amended by the conference report.

I assume that at that point some will make a point of order against the bill, and I assume that that may then be challenged or the ruling of the Chair would sustain the point of order and then would be challenged with a call for the overrule of the Chair which then would put us at a 51-vote requirement to overrule the Chair and then adopt the report.

I am just saying this is a possible scenario. At that point the House would probably come back Tuesday and having agreed with the House we would send it down to the White House and the President would probably veto it with the amendment as the conference committee has reported it.

So you could say you know that everyone here involved in this particular issue will end winning if they want to look at it that way. The President won a point. The Gramm-Rudman supporters, the Budget Committee won a point. The Appropriations Committee or the farm group won a point.

But we really have not settled the issue. We will have to come back and regroup, probably, if that scenario works out that way. That is one point.

The second point is where the chairman of the Budget Committee, my dear and wonderful friend, Senator DOMENICI, commented that this was a violation of the Budget Act. It may be technical, but let us get that scenario also very clearly. When we passed, on December 19, the continuing resolution, which this figure now in its full form, the full vehicle that is now before us, did not violate, this level does not violate that continuing resolution. There was no point of order made against that continuing resolution because we were within our 311. We were within our 311. We were legitimate. That was the day we were legitimate.

Then the bean counters go back to their little beans and start counting their beans out again and because there has been money spent in other areas of the budget, not necessarily in the agricultural area, they decide that we are not longer legitimate. We are now illegitimate. That process is called bastardizing.

And I just want to point out that I do not want the impression somehow the Appropriations Committee has come out here with a budget or with appropriations supplemental deliberately setting forth to violate the Budget Act. That just simply is not so.

We came out with this resolution, and we have written into this supplemental report language that it is within and it was to be within budget responsibilities that we adopted in that continuing resolution on December 19.

So there are a lot of technicalities here. There are a lot of impressions and there is a lot of confusion, I am sure. It took me at least 1 hour to get unconfused about one simple point of it. But I just want to point out to the floor that we are in that constant game of changing goalposts. We never know where the ball game is to be played from the appropriations point of view.

We have done our best to work with the Budget Committee, and we still work with the Budget Committee, and we will continue to do so to be within the parameters, to be within the Budget Act, to be within 311 allocations.

I think anyone who is on that committee knows it, including the chairman himself of the Budget Committee, but then to be postured as though we had somehow conspiratorily almost come out here to do something to deliberately violate or that was a head-on violation, I want to clear that up.

That supplemental is within the 311 allocation as was determined by the continuing resolution passed and signed into law by the President of the United States. It was passed here on this floor the day after the farm bill that set a lower level was passed on this floor. I know the President signed them into law at a different sequence. The lawyers can get up here and say it is the last bill that is signed into law, and they are correct.

But with all of that, let us just make sure the Appropriations Committee has not played a game here to try to deliberately violate ceilings or budget acts or law, or anything else.

We are trying to play the game, but we get the goalpost constantly moved on the field, and it is very difficult to keep up with the bean counters.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I think the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee has stated his position. I will agree wholeheartedly with him that we are trying desperately to work together, and I have no complaints. We are trying to do our job. They are trying to do theirs. I compliment him for the diligent effort that he and his entire committee has been undertaking, especially under the very difficult ceilings that we have.

But maybe I am chairman of the bean counters. I do not think so. I just like to tell you my version of the bean counting.

Clearly nobody is accusing anyone when the budgets are broken of doing anything intentionally to violate a Budget Act or to violate mandatory ceilings.

But the truth of the matter is that we had two laws passed. We had an appropriations bill that on this subject had $1 billion more in it than an authorizing bill which mandated $1 billion less.

We passed both laws and it happens that the consensus opinion of those who interpret have told us, and apparently the President's Council on Agriculture agrees, that the law that is governing at this moment is the authorizing bill wherein we authorized in a mandated manner $1 billion less for this program.

At a given point in time all kinds of bills and measures are passing through this Congress, including entitlements and others. By the time the year ended and all the other expenditures were put into the pot, not only had we violated the budget resolution ceiling a little bit, we had violated it by $20 billion, and that $20 billion was assuming the lower level mandated.

That amount which was authorized, which was $1 billion less, was then figured in the total, and a baseline was drawn for the expenditures of our Government. If you add to it, you break the budget. What you have is two conflicting laws, and the lowest one is ruled to be the effective one, and now we are going back to the higher one of $1 billion.

Some will call that bean counting. Some will call it whatever they like. But it is very forthright—no question about it, and no question that this U.S. Senate can do what it wishes. But it will have to vote to do that. It will have to vote first to waive the Budget Act.

If we do not want to do that—and I do not think we will—then, obviously, a point of order is going to be sustained. Why? Because we just got through voting saying we do not want to waive the Budget Act for this provision. So the point of order is going to be made.

If somebody wants to appeal from it, then we can turn right around and say we all voted that we did not want to waive the Budget Act but for some other reason we are going to overrule the Chair.

I hope we do not do either. I think it is inconsistent to do that. But it does seem to me that $1 billion here is just like any other billion dollars that somebody is going to bring down here. They may not have these subtle little differences, but we can bring one down here tomorrow, and somebody can say it is a great cause. And I am not saying the Appropriations Committee will bring it down here. Somebody can bring it in, introduce it, put it in as an amendment, say it is bean counting, it is just $1 billion, nobody's business and we ought not to worry about it.

On the other hand, that is the same kind of billion dollars in terms of exceeding the totals that we set for ourselves, and we have not even come close to it. That is what the issue is about.

It appears to me that the distinguished Senator from Texas did it just exactly right. We are going to get to vote, if somebody wants to appeal the ruling of the Chair after we have decided not to waive the Budget Act. But I think we ought to all go on record that we do not want to waive the Budget Act. Then we can search our conscience, about 20 minutes later when we decide that we may want to overrule the Chair.

I think that is the scenario for the evening. From my standpoint, I am willing to bring all the numbers down here that anyone wants but I think that is basically the issue.

Mr. RUDMAN and Mr. COCHRAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee is exactly right in outlining for Senators the scenario for the evening. For my part, I am going to urge Senators to vote with the distinguished Senator from Texas, Mr. GRAMM, against his own motion to waive the Budget Act.

This Senator is not attempting to suggest to the Senate tonight that we waive the Budget Act, not violate the Budget Act. What we are suggesting to the Senate is that there is before the Senate a conference report that, by its very language, says the funds made available for the Farmers Home Administration in operating loan account shall remain available until expended except as that level may be reduced by the terms of the sequester order implemented on March 1, 1986.

It is the clear statement of the conferees that Gramm-Rudman ought to apply to this conference report as it is going to apply throughout the appropriations process this year.

The point the Senate ought to understand is there is a disagreement about whether or not this conference report does in fact violate Gramm-Rudman.

Those of us who were in this conference worked very hard to keep it within the bounds of the Budget Act, the previously appropriated levels of funding for the programs that are involved in this conference report, and we were successful. But just because somebody downtown decides that an authorization bill takes precedence over an appropriations bill for the purpose of establishing a target under Gramm-Rudman does not mean we have to agree with them. That is the issue. The issue tonight is whether the Senate agrees with that. We are going to get to vote on it.

So I am suggesting you do not have to violate Gramm-Rudman to make the decision on that issue. That is going to be before the Senate. We can consider it carefully, and we can make our decision. I am going to make the decision that this conference report is consistent with Gramm-Rudman, it does not violate the Budget Act, and it calls for the appropriation of funds that are desperately needed throughout this country for not only the operation of the Commodity Credit Corporation but the Farmers Home insured loan account which is mentioned in the report.

So I hope Senators will vote not to waive the Budget Act. That is the next thing we will do—is have a vote on that issue. It takes three-fifths to waive it. We are going to have a record vote. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

I hope we can go ahead and dispose of that vote. Then I presume we ask that the amendment in disagreement be approved, that there will be a point of order made. If the point of order is sustained, which the Parliamentarian is going to have to recommend be sustained because the CBO decides whether the targeted levels under Gramm-Rudman has been breached by this or not, and CBO says yes because that is the decision that has been made, the question then will be whether the point of order on the ruling of the Chair should be overturned.

This Senator will ask the Senate to vote to overturn the ruling of the Chair, and we will have a vote on that. I hope now we can proceed to a vote on the motion of the distinguished Senator from Texas to waive the Budget Act.

I urge Senators to vote against that motion.

Mr. RUDMAN and Mr. STENNIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. RUDMAN. Thank you, Mr. President, I will be brief.

I do not rise to join in some of the technical issues that have been raised here. There is an old saying amongst trial lawyers, particularly appellate lawyers, that hard cases make bad law. This is a very unique case. It is a unique case because of an interpretation by a general counselor of an executive department. It is a very hard case because you have two bills which sequentially appear to be in the wrong order. And I am not going to get involved in that argument. But I want to make an observation that we ought not to lose as far as the operation of this law. I hope it is not lost however the vote comes out.

We are dealing with fiscal year 1986 funds. The sequester for fiscal year 1986 has already been made. There will be no other sequester. But in the future, if we attempt this procedure—and assuming the point of order is in fact not sustained—let me point out to everybody in the room what will happen because what happens on this one is quite different because of the sequence and the fact this is the first year of the law.

If in fact this was fiscal year 1986 funds, it broke the budget ceiling, and you did not have a sequential problem with how these bills were signed, then when the sequester came the fact that this billion dollars was added would then cause a greater cut in education, in environment, in the FAA, in the FBI, and everything else.

It is very important that people recognize that this vote, because of the uniqueness of the time at which it comes and the nature in which it comes, cannot be affected by that.

I must say, however, that as far as the waiver is concerned, I do not think, with all due respect to my friend from Mississippi, the chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee, we ought to ignore what the CBO says, whether it happened intentionally or accidentally. CBO is the only basis that we can look at. They say this is $1 billion above what we have set as the sequestration levels.

I think we ought to sustain the waiver. We ought to refuse to grant it. We ought to certainly sustain what I anticipate will be the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. STENNIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The distinguished Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I shall not take much time.

I do want to remind the Senate that there is some confusion about the law here as to which rule applies, and just what is the right meaning of the rule. There are a great many book-type questions, and technical questions like that. But let us remember that is not the real problem before a great segment of our American people tonight that is related to this law; that is, we are dealing with people, and we are dealing with their way of making a living.

We are dealing with their growing food to provide the actual body needs for many additional millions of people. Whoever might have slipped up about the law or when it went into effect, or anything else, is a incidental question, so far as need is concerned.

We have adopted a system of financing a great part of our farm production through Federal financing. That is a system that the people have gotten accustomed to, and now we have a condition where that cannot be carried out. But time and nature do not wait to make it possible to make up for errors that have been made.

We have made errors, perhaps, in not supplying this essential way of growing American food for people to eat and other farm products.

I think we are compelled to look at it from the factual side, and remember that we are dealing with people, with human beings. We are not dealing with cattle. We are not dealing with animals. We are not dealing with encyclopedias of law, dictionaries, or anything of that kind. But we have a problem here which must be met and which must be met soon, the planting season will be over very soon.

The season for putting seed into the ground has already almost run out in some areas and is running out fast in all areas.

So we have to take a practical look at this problem and do something that will go into effect immediately, even if it is just for a very short time, to get by this demand of nature and the demand of people for their food and other products which go from this production.

I hope we will take that practical side. I have nothing against the new law, the Gramm-Rudman Act. I voted for it. I want to see it and any other act succeed. But the practical side, as I have previously related, means that now we have no choice but to make the practical decision of moving this bill along.

Mr. HATFIELD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, it seems to me that our subcommittee chairman has made a very clear statement that, in the opinion of the Appropriations Committee, we have not violated Gramm-Rudman in terms of the ceiling in this supplemental. We reject that argument.

It seems to me that the best way to get to the crux of this matter is, I would like to suggest the possibility to the author of the motion, the coauthor of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill, that we possibly consider a voice vote and subscribe to his position of voting no, eliminating the whole question of the waiver. I want to say I will urge everybody to vote no on it so that we can get that issue out of the way. That is really almost peripheral to the real issue before us, the supplemental to maintain the CCC Program.

At that point, our options are still open. We can either move to strike the amendment, we can move a point of order, or we can do any number of things at that point. But to clear the deck, to get down to the real issue here, we ought to get rid of this particular motion.

Mr. DOLE. Did you want a voice vote?

Mr. HATFIELD. I would say we could have a voice vote. If the yeas and nays have been ordered, they would have to be withdrawn. I would urge that we voice vote the motion and not waive the Gramm-Rudman.

Mr. HARKIN. If the distinguished Senator will yield, on the way to the floor, I encountered the individual who asked for the yeas and nays and he said that he wanted that vote on this. I feel we ought to be bound by that right now. I do not want to counter the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, for whom I have the greatest respect and he knows that. Senator BRADLEY is not here right now but I did speak with him as I got off the subway and he did want the yeas on this.

I do not want to speak for him, I just raise the point.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry. Can we do a standing vote or a show of hands? Have we alternatives to a rollcall in making this determination?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division vote could determine that.

Mr. EXON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I withdraw the suggestion, even though I think it might be the easiest way out. I now understand there are other complications. I would urge at this time if we go to a rollcall vote, which it seems we may be headed to, I would urge on the body a no vote on the motion made by the Senator from Texas to waive Gramm-Rudman. Once again, we in the Appropriations Committee do not believe this violates Gramm-Rudman to begin with. Therefore, we reject the argument on this issue. So I would hope that those who are supporting this bill as it is now constituted would vote no as well. Then we get to the point of the bill itself, to delete the bill, to pass the bill, or to raise a point of order. We have all of our options.

Mr. EXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, can we not expedite things once in a while in the Senate? I have heard from that side of the aisle that the motion that was made to waive was made without considering the full impact of that. Those of us on this side who want to get this approved see no particular reason to have a rollcall vote where everybody goes out and votes no.

It would seem to me that we could vitiate the order for the yeas and nays and have a voice vote, which as near as I can tell would be no. By vitiating the order for the yeas and nays that could be accomplished. Why can we not do that?

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. EXON. Yes.

Mr. DOLE. I thought it was a great idea but the Parliamentarian tells me it is hard to tell whether three-fifths voted no. This is like a cloture vote.

Mr. EXON. The Parliamentarian is not in charge of the operations of the U.S. Senate, as far as I know. It seems to me that if we ask for vitiating the order for the yeas and nays and had a voice vote, as near as I know everybody on the floor right now is going to be silent one way or the other and maybe the Chair would be able to make a determination in that event. What is wrong with that?

Mr. DOLE. One of the Members on that side has requested the yeas and nays. That is another problem. We would be finished almost with the vote now had we started.

Mr. EXON. But if the Member who made the motion is not here to protect his interest, I think we can request it. Mr. President, I move that we vitiate the order for the yeas and nays on the motion before us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such a motion is not in order.

Mr. BENTSEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. EXON. Yes.

Mr. BENTSEN. Would not the objective be accomplished by division? A division vote would establish the 60 percent, would it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The requirement is absolutely 60 votes, not 60 percent of the voting Senators.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I ask once again unanimous consent that the order for the yeas and nays be vitiated. Then we would be in a position, as I understand it, where the junior Senator from Texas could withdraw his motion.

Mr. COCHRAN. Reserving the right to object.

Mr. DOMENICI. Objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The question is on agreeing to the motion. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. LAXALT] is necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS] are absent on official business.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART], the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES] are necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 1, nays 92, as follows:

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was rejected.

Mr. HATFIELD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as I understand it, there will now be a point of order made and there will be an appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

I think we have pretty much had the debate, and I hope we will be able to dispose of these matters rather quickly.

It is still my hope to bring up reconciliation this evening. I do not think we will hit the water bill this evening, and we may not finish reconciliation, but we will at least start it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the majority leader that the question is on agreeing to the conference report. It must be disposed of first.

The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, for the purpose of further consideration of the matter before the Senate, there is an item in disagreement which we need to move.

I move to concur in the amendment of the House to Senate amendment No. 1.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I raise a point of order under section 311, as amended by the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act, that the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate will exceed the appropriate level of budget authority and outlays set forth in the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1986 and, therefore, is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. President, this appeal from the ruling of the Chair is made for the purpose of giving the Senate an opportunity to express its opinion and its decision as to the assertions by the chairman of the Budget Committee that this conference report and this specific amendment violate the provisions of the Budget Act.

Under the terms of the Budget Act, CBO has the authority to make certain scoring findings and to advise the Senate as to whether or not a spending target under the Budget Act has been or will be breached by the passage of an appropriations bill or some other action by the body.

I am suggesting to the Senate that the terms of this conference report clearly indicate the intention of conferees that the funding levels be subject to the Gramm-Rudman Act and that any funding that is available can be reduced by the terms of the sequester order implemented on March 1, 1986; and that is specifically stated in not only the conference report itself but also the statement of managers for emphasis.

The language we are considering in the amendment was urged by the House conferees to be included in the conference report, and it relates to the funding levels of the Farmers Home Direct Loan Program, providing operating money to farmers who cannot find credit elsewhere to plant a crop during this planting season.

To give the Senate some information about the status of funds in that account, the administration announced just a few days ago that it was making available an additional $750 million for the Farmers Home Administration to lend to farmers under that program. The reason why the additional funds were needed—in addition to those previously allocated—was that the current funding was being exhausted. The Appropriations Committee expected that that would occur when we were considering the continuing resolution last December, and it provided an additional amount, about $1 billion over and above the authorized level that had been provided in the farm bill for that loan program; and it was approved by the Senate, it was approved by the conference committee that worked on that appropriations bill, and it was signed by the President.

This conference report simply says that for that operating loan account, the funds made available by the appropriations bill that was passed back in December 1985 should remain available to the agency until expended and subject to the reductions that may be required under the sequester order of March 1, 1986.

CBO is now suggesting—and the General Counsel's Office of the Department of Agriculture—that that continuing appropriations bill is not effective to appropriate those funds; that the authorized level contained in the farm bill was the authorized level of funding; that for scorekeeping under the Budget Act, that was the targeted level of expenditure for that program; and that if any funds are spent over and above that authorized level, then it is a violation of the Budget Act and it is not authorized.

This action by the conferees is simply to reiterate the findings that were made in December when the continuing resolution was passed, that about $2.7 billion would be needed to operate that loan account and to provide funds for eligible farmers who qualified for loans under that program.

I hope the Senate will vote to overturn the ruling of the Chair and thereby express the decision of the Senate that the funds made available by this previously approved appropriations bill should remain available to this agency until expended, subject to the sequester order under Gramm-Rudman. That is the issue. It is not whether you agree with Gramm-Rudman or do not. We just voted not to waive the provisions of Gramm-Rudman. This Senator voted not to waive the provisions of Gramm-Rudman.

I am convinced that this conference report is consistent with Gramm-Rudman. It is consistent with the Budget Act. It is also consistent with the previously approved appropriations bill that provided the funds that we simply refer to as still being available to that agency.

I hope the Senate will support the committee that is managing this bill on the floor. These funds are desperately needed by farmers throughout the country. The $5 billion provided in the conference report for the Commodity Credit Corporation is urgently needed now.

If we overturn the ruling of the Chair, approve this conference report, and send it to the President, we have a chance to make those funds available now. If we do not, if we vote the other way, then this will continue to be an issue that is not resolved between the Senate and the other body. It will cause further delay and impose hardship throughout the country in the agricultural community.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I think we are down now to the first real vote on Gramm-Rudman.

Let me begin by saying that I wish we had a test case before us that did not involve a popular program. I wish we had tried to enforce the budget and budget powers under Gramm-Rudman on an unpopular program that had no constituency. It simply happened that it occurred on a program that spends more money in my State than any other State in the Union. Agriculture is popular. You can look at the budget level and see that agriculture is in trouble.

The issue here is the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings commitment to set out a process and make that process work. That is the issue. There is no other issue. This is not a popular test case, but it is a clear-cut test case.

First of all, in the Budget Act itself and Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, there is no doubt about who is and who is not the scorekeeper.

This discussion about measuring things one way and the Congressional Budget Office measuring now another way, is the same discussion that produced the $205 billion deficit.

We committed ourselves to one accountant and that accountant is the Congressional Budget Office, and there is no question about that. There is no ambiguity on that point. There is no vagueness in the Budget Act that existed before Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, and there is certainly no vagueness in the Budget Act that now exists after Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

Second, while there are differences between authorizations and appropriations bills, these differences are irrelevant to this debate. The 311 point of order says nothing about agriculture, even though agriculture exceeds the concurrent budget resolution more than any other element in the budget. We are not over the 311 aggregate target because there is another offending program. We are over because agriculture exceeds appropriate levels more than any other area of the budget—but that is not the point.

The point is that the 311 target is set in the aggregate level of spending and this add-on, as an amendment in disagreement out of conference from the House of Representatives, takes us over that target by $913 million. There are no if's, and's, but's, or gray area about that. This add-on amendment in disagreement violates the Budget Act, violates the 311 target and violates Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. There is no question about that fact.

Now, let me make a couple of additional points.

We are talking about helping farmers. We all know that if we violate Gramm-Rudman-Hollings and throw it out the window—on its first real test—the President is going to veto this bill since it is $1 billion over aggregate targets. We have already received letters to that effect.

Is that going to help the farmer? Is it going to help the farmer to play a political charade? If vetoed, the bill will go back to the House and in all likelihood, the House will vote to override the President's veto. It is not going to happen here. Then we are going to have to go back, repeat the whole process and spend 2 or 3 or 4 weeks to resolve this issue. Is that going to help the farmer? No.

In fact, if your objective is to get $5 billion to the farmer, then you want to vote to sustain this point of order under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, strip off the offending $1 billion and then join me in voting for the passage of the conference report without the offending add-on.

Do not believe for a moment that you are going to help the farmer by voting to violate Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. The truth is you are going to hurt the farmer because you are going to delay the farmer getting $5 billion for 2 or 3 weeks while we fool around here and play politics.

Now, the key issue is a straightforward and simple issue.

You can debate about who you want to do the scorekeeping, but we have already agreed on that. The Congressional Budget Office is going to do the scorekeeping. We said it in the Budget Act; we said it in Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. You may not like it. We would all like to do our own scoring. I would score my own programs, and you would score your own programs. Then we would each use our own scoring methods and talk about other people shifting beans and changing the rules. But we have already agreed on the rules, and this add-on from the House, as an amendment is disagreement, violates those rules.

The vote we are about to take is not about agriculture. The farmer is not going to get this $1 billion because the President is going to veto this bill. What we are really going to do is to delay the farmers getting $5 billion for 2 or 3 weeks.

This vote is about overruling the Chair where the Chair has ruled under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings that this add-on House amendment in disagreement was in violation of 311 of the Budget Act.

We had some long and heated debates in adopting Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. If you voted for it, this is the opportunity to show that you were shooting with real bullets.

The issue is clear cut. Do we or don't we want to enforce a procedure we set out? When the first real test case comes along on such a popular issue as agriculture and helping farmers, and I have more farmers than any other Senator, do we want to say we are for balancing the budget except for now? Or do we want to stand up and be counted when it does involve a difficult issue that affects a popular constituency?

This is a vote on Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, and I urge my colleagues if they voted for Gramm-Rudman-Hollings to vote to sustain the Chair. If you voted against Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, but believe the Senate made a commitment and that we ought not to break that commitment and run when the first popular program comes over the dam, I urge you to vote to sustain the Chair. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I know it is late and we have had a lot of discussion and I will try my very best to be brief.

But I would like to make a couple of points. First, I hope everybody understood that there is a letter here from the President. This letter says that if we send the President the $5 billion CCC bill with an additional $1 billion, he will veto it. Yesterday he directed the Secretary to transfer funds out of the Emergency Disaster Loan Program into the Operating Loan Program to provide $750 million of the $1 billion we are arguing about.

It seems to me if you are worried about farmers, and I am, that the quickest way to help them is to take this amendment off, pass the $5 billion CCC and get the House to pass it. That way nothing gets vetoed, and farmers get the $750 million out of the emergency disaster fund.

Having said that, it would seem to me that it is what we should have done from the very beginning. We did not. We are here because the House forced this additional $1 billion on our conferees. It was not here when we passed it, it was not there when they passed it. They found out about it afterwards.

I assume if we waited another 3 or 4 weeks, maybe the House would find three or four more billion dollar add-ons after both Houses have passed a bill like they want to put on today.

So, just on the merits, we ought not do it but we will give a procedural way shortly not to do it, because clearly it is subject to a point of order.

I wish we were not here on this issue as far as the point of order, because I have the greatest respect for the Appropriations Committee, for the distinguished subcommittee chairman. But I want to tell you something: Do not think that this is PETE DOMENICI, chairman of the Budget Committee, that is telling you this is a billion dollars over and you just ought not agree with him, that you ought to exercise your collective privileges and say that is not the case.

We are not going to wish away the $1 billion. My friends, if there is not some degree of consistency in the evaluating of the complicated programs of this country, and what they cost, then I guarantee you that every committee that does not like the way they are charged for breaking the budget of the United States will be down here. They will be down here just like tonight, and they will say this is kind of complicated, there is a legal opinion here, and actually CBO just flat made a mistake and, you Senate, under a point of order you ought to decide how to charge the cost under a bill.

I will acknowledge that these are complicated, sometimes subtle rules, but there is not any question about this one. The lawyers have ruled, the CBO has taken their interpretation, and they have just said you are in excess of the budget. The limit for this program was by a mandate of a valid authorizing committee. The argument that the appropriation bill was the last act of Congress, and that the appropriators had appropriated more before and they now like to say let us give the $1 billion that the authorizers took away from us is not a valid argument.

I do not like to come down here and say CBO says that is another $1 billion. I wish I could wish it away. But you can bet that it is going to get worse. You might vote tonight and say this is for the farmers or it is just a close call. But I guarantee you any committee and any subcommittee that does not like the scoring, the amount that they are charged against a budget, are going to come down here and say it really is not real. They just do not know how to charge this stuff. They are just doing it wrong.

I tell you we had enough of that confusion and in this last Budget Act we cleared it up and we said it is going to be CBO. It is CBO, the Congressional Budget Office.

And CBO is who says this violates Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. I submit to you that the best way to help the farmers is to take this amendment off this bill, give them the $5 billion that they need for the CCC. The President has already given them $750 million for operating loans.

So everyone will understand, we are going to have a procedural vote here.

The Senator from New Mexico is going to move to table. I am going to move to table the pending motion to override the Chair and so you are going to have an opportunity to vote on the tabling motion. You will not have to worry about whether you voted for anybody or against anybody. You can just say, "It was just not the right thing to do. We ought not be overruling the Chair on this kind of thing, so we all voted to table it." And you can tell everybody out there that that was the procedure. You can also tell them that you are more apt to get them their money if you do not put this billion dollars on it than if you do. That ought to be enough to satisfy everyone.

I yield the floor.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I hope nobody is confused by these figures. The $991 million that was mentioned by the Senator from Texas, Senator GRAMM, and the billion dollars that was just mentioned by my good friend from New Mexico, the chairman of the Budget Committee, of which $1 billion, $750 million from somewhere, we assume it is out of the same billion dollars, was declared by the President to be available for Farmers Home Administration immediately.

I do not want any of us to be confused by these figures. What I would like the Senate to think about is a real issue and that is the issue of need. A few moments ago, the senior Senator from Mississippi made a very poignant point. He said we are not talking about animals, we are not talking about inanimate things, we are talking about the very lives of people. And I think that is what the Senate was thinking about on December 19 of last year when it made the money available through the appropriations process.

Now, making the money available to the Farmers Home Administration does not mean that it will be expended unless there is a need. That is what the Senate decided in December of last year, that there was a need. And we were correct. There is a need.

But the Farmers Home Administration must have applications from people who are credit worthy—credit worthy. If the money does not look like it can be repaid, then, unfortunately, those people not being credit worthy will not get the loan.

If they are credit worthy and get the loan, we have got almost a 90- to 95-percent chance of every last dollar of it, with interest, being repaid. And at the rate of interest they charge under the law, there is a profit to the Government. There is a profit to the Government.

There is only one impediment to doing the right thing here to try to meet part of the need so that the Government can put out some money at low risk and make a profit off of the interest repaid. And that single impediment is the determination by the Senate again this evening to say that, yes, there is a need and the money that was appropriated last December will be there and remain available if that need is to be met and the applicants are found to be credit worthy.

The conditions are tight enough. For, indeed, that need for people to retain their chance for a livelihood on their land is truly a cause that we should not turn our backs on but should again reaffirm that to this limited extent we will allow the applications to be made to the Farmers Home Administration and, if they are credit worthy, to get the help that can be provided by the loan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I think we have had the debate. Just let me see if I can try and straighten out any misunderstanding on what the situation is right now. I am not going to try and explain this to the people of America listening on radio. I think that if anyone is listening they must be thoroughly confused by what is going on here.

First, we had the main introducer of Gramm-Rudman make a motion on the floor of the U.S. Senate to waive the Gramm-Rudman amendment. Now, anybody that might be listening must have thought that is awful strange. They must have thought it was awfully strange also when the main introducer of the Gramm-Rudman amendment then voted no on his own motion to waive the Gramm-Rudman amendment which he supports.

Then we had a totally meaningless vote, where there were 92 votes one way and I the other, against the motion of the junior Senator from Texas. And I wonder if that did not confuse people.

Then, after that was disposed of, after this Senator tried in vain to have a voice vote to accommodate that meaningless gesture, we had the point of order that was made on the motion by the Senator from Mississippi to proceed in an orderly fashion to provide the money. Then there was a point of order raised by the junior Senator from Texas on that, which was his right.

Now, it has been further complicated by the Budget Committee chairman. To give somebody a technical out if they do not want to vote against the farmers, they can vote to table, which he is about to do, as I understand it.

I hope, though, after the tabling motion is made that the Senator from Mississippi, the manager of the bill would rise to explain what the vote should be if you are supporting the farmers and supporting the Appropriations Committee, both for the advice of the Senators and the confused public at large that might be tuned into these shenanigans across the United States.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I was going to move to table, but I am not in a hurry if someone wishes to speak.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I want to associate myself with the comments of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi and also the distinguished Senator from Montana.

I want to point out to the Senators in the Chamber and anyone else that is listening that the junior Senator from Texas and the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee could not be more wrong. This is not the first test of Gramm-Rudman. How short our memories are. And I would be glad to yield to the chairman of the Budget Committee for an answer to this question.

But is it not true that the farm bill itself that we passed last December was subject to Gramm-Rudman because it was $2½ billion over budget for fiscal year 1986? I am informed by the Budget Committee that is true. I would like to ask either the chairman of the Budget Committee or perhaps the distinguished junior Senator from Texas why a point of order was not raised at that time against the farm bill? It was $2½ billion over the budget.

I want to refresh your memory. The Senator from Ohio, Senator METZENBAUM, stood here that evening and talked about raising a point of order about it.

This Senator took the floor, said that I thought I might raise a point of order because I was not in favor of the farm bill, and I said I would not. I would not raise a point of order. A lot of people were very scared that I was going to raise a point of order that the farm bill was $2.5 billion over, and I said I was not going to do it. I will now quote for you from page S17925 of the December 18, 1985, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a question posed by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM]:

> I pose a parliamentary inquiry without raising the point, but as a parliamentary inquiry, I ask of the Chair whether or not this bill violates section 311 of the Budget Act as amended by Gramm-Rudman and therefore, if raised, would be subject to a point of order.
> The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Again, I would like to ask why? Where was the chairman of the Budget Committee? Where was the junior Senator from Texas at that time to raise a point of order against the farm bill itself which at that time he did indeed say it was subject to a point of order under section 311.

I would be glad to yield for an answer only, but I do not see that anyone wants to answer that question.

Mr. DOMENICI. It was not subject to a point of order, or I would have raised it. That is the answer.

Mr. HARKIN. Again, I would encourage the chairman to check the RECORD. We checked with the Parliamentarian, and it was subject to a point of order under Gramm-Rudman. A lot of people were very concerned that the Senator from Ohio, Senator METZENBAUM, might raise that, and he decided not to. I spoke on the floor at length about the possibility of raising that point of order.

Mr. EXON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HARKIN. I will yield for a question only without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. EXON. If I remember correctly, it was the same evening that this Senator from Nebraska went to the Senator from Iowa, and the Senator from Iowa told me that he was considering making the motion that he just outlined in great detail. Is it not true that at that time the Senator from Nebraska appealed to my friend from Iowa with whom I worked very closely in support of legislation beneficial to him not to do that because if he did, we would end up very likely at that time reducing the amount of money in the Farm Program rather than to get more as the two of us thought was in order? Is that correct?

Mr. HARKIN. My friend from Nebraska is absolutely right. I might add he was not the only one that appealed to me not to raise the point of order that night. I had a lot of people asking me, "Please do not raise the point of order because of the amount of cuts that would come in agriculture."

But as sure as this Senator is standing here tonight, the RECORD is clear. The farm bill was subject to Gramm-Rudman. It was subject to a point of order, and no point of order was raised at that time. No one can deny that.

They say this is the first real test. That was the first real test. But now why do I point this out in detail? I point it out because the farm bill goes to a lot of farmers. It goes to the rich as well as the poor, and to the big as well as the small. What we are talking about here goes to those farmers least able to get the credit that they need. This goes to the small farmer. This goes to the poor farmer.

If I have ever seen a class-conscious attempt in this body, this is it. This goes right at those small farmers that need this kind of help at this time. The rich farmers will be getting their payments. They do not need this. They do not go to Farmers Home for loans anyway. The big farmers are not going to Farmers Home. Farmers Home is a lender of last resort. It is those small farmers that need this kind of credit, and the senior Senator from Mississippi is absolutely right. These are people's lives we are talking about. They are not bad farmers. They may not necessarily even be going out of business. But they may be some of our smaller farmers who just need this help at this time. That is where this $900 million goes.

Mr. NICKLES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARKIN. I am delighted to yield to the Senator for a question only without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. NICKLES. The Senator made a comment, and said that the farmers were receiving their deficiency payments. My understanding is farmers are not going to receive their deficiency payments if we do not pass this bill. That concerns me. I wanted to make sure we are on the same wave length.

Mr. HARKIN. I am getting to that.

Mr. NICKLES. One final question: The Senator is talking about money going to FmHA, and talking about $900 million. The President today on this $750 million—that went to FmHA. So are we not talking really about a difference of $150 million?

Mr. HARKIN. No, the $750 million, to respond to my friend from Oklahoma, was a shift from the Guaranteed Loan Program. Under the provision of the law, up to 25 percent of the unused portion of the Emergency Loan Program can be shifted over into the Operating Loan Program.

So this was not any new money or additional money. It was money unused in one account just being shifted over. That is all that happened. I am not saying it was not needed, and that it is not going to be of use and benefit.

I want to compliment the President for doing that. I am glad he did that. It is going to help. There is no doubt about that.

The point is we have here, talking about almost $1 billion—$1 billion that is going to go to people, as the Senator from Montana said, who have to be credit worthy. They have to be credit worthy which means they have to have the collateral and the means to repay it.

These are operating loans and some ownership loans. But these are loans that are needed right now by the smaller farmer. Perhaps I would not want to say the poor farmers, but those that are not as big, and are not as rich as some of the others.

The Senator from Oklahoma is right. It is necessary to get this bill through, the $5 billion in CCC, because we do have to get the advanced deficiency payments to these farmers so they can buy the seed, fertilizer, repair the machinery, and buy the fuel they need to get the crops in the ground.

I understand that the House of Representatives is out, and will not be back until next Tuesday. So nothing is going to happen on this thing today or tomorrow anyway. We are going to have to wait for the House to act. It is clear that the House supports the addition of this money. I should not say the addition. That is the wrong choice of words. The House supports the action taken by the Appropriations Committee, and in the continuing resolution. There is no problem there.

If we keep this provision in there, it will go to the House—and I would yield to the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee to maybe clarify this point. But am I not correct that if we keep this provision in, if we support the Senator's motion in appealing the ruling of the Chair, the House will support that action?

Mr. COCHRAN. If the Senator will yield, the House has already voted in favor of this language, and has approved the conference report. If the Senate votes tonight to overrule the Chair, the measure goes directly to the President. So funding can be made available, if the President signs this bill immediately, to the Farmers Home Administration and to the Commodity Credit Corporation.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank my distinguished chairman for clarifying that point.

I hope the Senator from Oklahoma caught that. If you want to get the $5 billion in CCC and deficiency payments out, support this motion of the Senator from Mississippi to appeal the ruling of the Chair. That means it will go to the President immediately, he can sign it tomorrow, that is the end of it, and we will get the deficiency payments out there. If we take the route advocated by the chairman of the Budget Committee or the junior Senator from Texas, we will be involved in this mess for the next 2 or 3 weeks.

So if you want to get the $5 billion out to the farmers, support the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to appeal the ruling of the Chair.

Once more, Mr. President, I want to make this point as clearly, as positively, as I can. This is not the first test. The first test was the farm bill. It was $2.5 billion over budget.

No one raised a point of order at that time.

Now, when we are at the last minute, when we need the $5 billion in the CCC revolving fund so that we can get the advance deficiency payments out, when we have already appropriated the money, slightly over $5 billion, now a point of order is being raised.

Again, I do not want to question anyone's motives. I would not do that. But I want Senators to know that the money we are talking about here goes to the poorer farmers, the smaller farmers, those who really depend upon this so that they, too, can plant a crop this year; so that they, too, can make a living.

The farm bill goes to the big farmers, to the rich farmers. I do not have a problem with that. That is why I did not raise a point of order.

But for crying out loud, let us not put a pitchfork in the back of the farmers out there who really need this money at this time.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. A pitchfork in the back of the farmers? Come on. I have heard all kinds of nonsense here.

We are about to get off the wagon and go back to drinking that old deficit barleycorn. It has all been going on for 4 years, and I think the President described it best, Mr. President. He said last fall how the Speaker—we were over there, Senator DOMENICI and several others on a Wednesday morning meeting about the budget and the deficit—and the President said, "You know, your Speaker came over last evening and we had a little toddy and we went out underneath the oak tree. The Speaker turned to me and said, 'Mr. President, I will take your defense if you will take my Social Security.'"

The President said, "Fine, and we won't pay for it."

Old TIP says, "That suits me. I am against those taxes, too."

So we have been on a binge for the last 4 years on that deficit barleycorn. We have been increasing entitlements, increasing defense, and, decreasing revenues. We have been buying the vote with the fruits of the next generation. And when we went home last fall, we were embarrassed to face our own people. The President was talking about tax reform being a priority; and media were headlining arms control. But the people said, "You ought to be ashamed of yourselves. You better get back up there and start paying the bills."

We know as politicians what we wanted. We already passed the budget, like the Senator from Iowa said. We were ready to go to the football games, to go home for Thanksgiving dinner.

But we decided after facing the people after 4 years of this drunk, this binge on old deficit barleycorn, that we would go on the wagon and we would cut out the charade. We would swear off and start doing our job of fiscal responsibility.

There are those around here who never did swear off.

They say a man convinced against his will is of the same opinion still.

The Senator from Iowa said he never did quit drinking. He is not the first to say. There are others. They opposed Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

I am not a bit surprised the Senator from Mississippi has come back from the House with this little act. They get it both ways. They put the money in and they know the President is going to veto it so they can say, "Well, look, we were helping the poor little farmers from having the pitchfork in their back, and now the President has vetoed it. We tried to help."

I am a little surprised that the erudite Senator from Mississippi went along with that.

But this is the real test. The Members should know the hand work being done to fashion a discipline.

In all candor, the Senator from New Mexico, chairman of our Budget Committee, has gotten together with the chairman of the House Budget Committee, and they have agreed on a discipline. They have agreed on Congressional Budget Office figures.

This Senate and this House have agreed on the discipline of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. Anyone could have introduced a resolution against the cuts. There was not a single resolution. We saved $12 billion last month and we are now working—Senator CHILES, Senator DOMENICI, and many of us—on a bipartisan budget to fashion a discipline to stay on the wagon.

To those who come around with this nonsensical talk of pitchforking the poor farmer in the back, the poor little farmer and the rich farmer talk, the truth of it is we are going to provide the best for the farmers.

Senator, you know that and I know that.

And you can do it within the rules of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. But this is not the way to do it. What you are saying if you vote to overrule the Chair is that every appropriations subcommittee chairman has to say, "Forget about the bloomin' thing. COCHRAN got away with adding a billion, why can you not go along and add a billion?"

The discipline breaks and we go back to drinking old deficit barleycorn again. That is the issue. There is no question about it.

I know some never did agree to it.

The Senator from Montana is right. He can prove a need. Any fellow who wants to go back to drink, he will quickly prove that need to himself. He can easily convince himself.

But I would hope that Members see it as a clear-cut call—of the Congressional Budget Office, a clear call under the statute of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings—a clear call, not a marginal call in this case. It is beyond the amount. It was not in the House, it was not in the Senate. It is included in a divided report at the last minute and brought with the very, very persuasive plea about putting the pitchfork in the small farmer.

The way the Senator from Iowa described that I can see the small farmer wriggling now with the fork in his back.

I want to help that farmer and take the fork out of the back because that is how he got down—because of the deficit spending. If there is one element of the economy that has impacted the farmer adversely it is the overvalued dollar caused by this deficit binge. The poor American farmer with the deficit fork in his back has not been able to sell anything overseas. All because of this deficit barleycorn.

You and I have been on the wagon. Now you want to get off the wagon tonight. Some never did quit drinking. Last December, you never did join us. The rest of us did join. We do not want to get off the wagon. Tonight is not the time to break ranks and go back to drinking again.

Mr. HARKIN. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, may I say briefly that not only will this year's deficiency payments not be paid but the last half of last year's deficiency payments will not be paid if this is vetoed. I would question my friend from Iowa as to what farmers can or cannot apply to the FmHA, can or cannot apply for what is being proffered by the Senator from Mississippi. I would say that 98 percent of the farmers can apply and get loans from the FmHA, or at least qualify.

So this is not just the money for the small farmer because that is just not the case.

I strongly support agriculture, Mr. President, and I strongly support helping farmers with credit problems. So I have introduced legislation to do that. I have been joined by many of my colleagues. Indeed, my colleague from the State of Iowa has joined me.

We buy down interest in that bill so we pay 2 percent rather than making the entire loan which is 100 cents on the dollar. That is the way to make the budget balance.

Voting against this appeal is not against farmers. Farmers do not want the Senate to bust the budget any more than anybody else does.

The Chair just ruled that this amendment violates Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. It does exactly that. This is a bill to do that.

That is the wrong way to help the farmers, in my judgment. We can help them in the future by providing an offset so that this appropriation would not become necessary.

I urge my colleagues to vote against overturning the Chair's ruling that this amendment violates Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. We can in the near future provide credit to help the farmers without busting the budget.

Mr. DOMENICI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I hope all Senators who discussed this have enjoyed the evening. It was a difficult kind of discussion but I think we made some sense of it. I think we all know what we are voting on.

In a moment, I will move to table the appeal. That means that if you support me the appeal will be tabled, it is gone. That means that the amendment will be out of order and we will be on with passing the CCC bill. We will have rid ourselves of this particular problem.

Mr. President, I move to table the appeal and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Mexico. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. LAXALT] is necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS], are absent on official business.

Mr. CRANSTON: I announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART], the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN], are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PRESSLER). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 61, nays 33—as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 38 Leg.]

NOT VOTING—6

Goldwater	Inouye	Mathias
Hart	Laxalt	Nunn

So the motion to table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCHRAN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order for the Senate to consider the message from the House on H.J. Res. 534 for the purpose of offering an amendment to the House amendment to Senate amendment No. 1, to strike the language in the House amendment which creates a point of order under section 311 of the Budget Act, and that no other amendment be in order.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me ask the Senator from Mississippi this question: If the motion he has just made is accepted, would that in effect send this measure back to the House of Representatives stripped of the amendment in controversy here?

Mr. COCHRAN. Let me respond by saying that if this unanimous-consent request is agreed to, it would be the intention of the Senator from Mississippi to send to the desk an amendment that states simply, "Strike the last paragraph of the House amendment to Senate amendment No. 1."

If that amendment is agreed to, the offending language in the conference report that was subject to the point of order is stricken, and the conference report, absent that language, would go back to the House.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, under the circumstances, since I think the Senate perhaps might better reflect a little on its vote tonight, since the House of Representatives is not in session and will not be back in session until Tuesday, we might best wait until Tuesday to act on this matter in the U.S. Senate, and therefore I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I believe it is important that this bill passes the Senate as submitted by the conference committee.

My farmers in Iowa are hurting. Everyday my phones are ringing off the wall with farmers who need financial help. This bill gives some money to help these farmers.

This bill merely says that the amount which has already been appropriated which means passed by the Congress and signed by the President, be used for this Farmers Home Administration Program.

I know that some Senators are concerned about the President vetoing this bill. I strongly encourage the President not to do that. But I cannot change my mind on an issue this important just because I am concerned about something that the President might do.

There are farmers out there today who need a Farmers Home Administration operating loan. They have applied. They do qualify. And may have even been accepted. But they will not get a loan because the FmHA is going to run out of money. Some other farmer who just so happens to have gotten in the program sooner will get his loan. Not because he is a better farmer or a smarter farmer but because he was first.

We talk in this body about $1 billion as if it is no big deal to take that away from our farmers. Let me tell you that $1 billion is a lot of money to my farmers.

Many act as if farmers who don't have credit are at fault for their own problems. They forget about all our long-term Government policies which have punished our farmers by taking away their markets.

They forget about the fact that we passed a farm bill that has badly hurt our farmers' cash-flow and profitability. That same farm bill cut these FmHA loan programs. I voted against that farm bill and would like to see this part of that bill corrected just as we have corrected other parts of that bill in the last few weeks.

We in this body have a responsibility for the shortage of credit. Both lenders and farmers have been unable to figure out cash-flows because they have not known what the program was going to be. In fact, they still don't know. We need to act responsibly and help these farmers by giving them the money we have already appropriated. Through the continuing resolution last December.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I did not support Gramm-Rudman because the March 1 date did not allow selectivity. This is a vote in favor of budgetary restraint. It is selective.

However, it is not a vote against the farmers. Right now, farmers need this CCC supplemental. It allows for regular commodity loans that maintain the price support system. It is essential that this supplemental pass and not be vetoed as a budget buster. That threat is imminent.

The question is not whether or not we want to help farmers. The question is, is there enough money available under the farm bill and with the President's transfer of $700 million to meet the spring credit needs of American farmers?

Right now, FmHA has $2.2 billion for direct operating loans; $1.7 billion available for guaranteed loans. The only place where me may, and I repeat may, have a shortfall is in the Emergency Disaster Loan Program. But we do not know how much we will need for emergency loans. And this body needs to be prepared to meet that problem when it arises.

But this is high politics for the national radio audience. Right now, $4 billion is available to meet the credit needs. What do you think the American public thinks of all this?

This is a nonissue as far as farmers are concerned; it is a budget issue that concerns everyone.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the status of the conference report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report was agreed to. The House message is no longer before the Senate.

The matter before the Senate is now the balanced budget amendment.

Mr. DOLE. Pardon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The matter before the Senate is the balanced budget amendment.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me announce to my colleagues that there will be no more votes tonight. There will be votes tomorrow.

What we intend to do now is lay down the reconciliation message from the House, and there will be a Senate amendment. We hope to be on reconciliation by 10 a.m. tomorrow. I have been alerting Members all week to expect votes on Thursday and Friday, and tomorrow is Friday.

We have a recess coming up in 10 days—about a 10-day recess. The reconciliation measure is important to many Senators on both sides of the aisle, so far as the farm program, the OCS programs, and other programs that will be impacted are concerned unless there is some agreement.

I believe there is a possibility that with the amendment to be offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI], we may have fairly quick agreement on reconciliation, unless there are a number of amendments this Senator is not aware of. I know of two amendments. I have heard that the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Pennsylvania may each have an amendment.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. And the Senator from New York.

Mr. DOLE. And the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. BURDICK. What is the majority leader's plan regarding the water bill?

Mr. DOLE. The water bill will follow reconciliation. If we can dispose of the reconciliation bill in the morning—and I hope we can do so by 1 o'clock—we will lay down the water resources bill for opening statements and take care of amendments that do not require votes, but have no votes on the water bill tomorrow.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. METZENBAUM. It is my understanding that an agreement has been reached with respect to a unanimous-consent matter pertaining to the constitutional amendment. I wonder if the majority leader would get that behind us.

Mr. DOLE. We intend to do that.

Let me indicate that there may not be any votes. Maybe everything will be handled by a voice vote. But I believe that on reconciliation there are at least four amendments indicated for tomorrow, a couple from each side, and probably a couple will require roll-call votes. I hope that is not the case.

I do not want to mislead my colleagues. We will be on that measure at 10 o'clock, and we will try to take up amendments as expeditiously as we can and complete action on reconciliation by 1:30 tomorrow afternoon.

So there will be no further votes tonight.

Mr. President, I have asked the distinguished majority whip to wrap up the proceedings, and he will make that request.

PLIGHT OF THE SOVIET JEWS

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I rise today to speak out on behalf of a people who are not able to speak out for themselves, the Jews in the Soviet Union. They are prisoners of a system that is totally alien to Americans and all people who respect human life and dignity. Unwelcome within the Soviet state, Jews also experience great difficulty in emigrating. The situation is intolerable from a humanitarian perspective; it is intolerable from a diplomatic perspective, and it must change for the better.

The Soviet system is not known for compassion or respect for individual rights and freedoms. This is what sets our two nations apart. The arms race and competition for status in the international community are only symptoms of a problem and not the reason for United States-Soviet tensions. What is at the root of these tensions is a differing perspective on the importance and value of the individual. To us, nothing is placed above individual rights and freedoms; in the Soviet Union nothing seems to be of lower priority. The mistreatment of the Soviet Jews is a sad testimony to this and it is inexcusable. It is a problem of a strictly humanitarian nature above any politics. Continual Soviet statements that the plight of the Soviet Jews is an "internal matter" for the Soviet elite to handle have no standing in this body and this great Nation. No free people can stand by idly while others remain in chains.

About 1,000 miles from Moscow is the little village of Ilyinka, a community of about 130 religious Jewish families who live and work on a collective farm. The Ilyinka Jews have held fast to the traditions of their religion and life on a farm. What should be an ideal, peaceful and prosperous rural life is instead a hellish nightmare for its people. In those few situations in which emigration to Israel was permitted by the Soviet authorities, relatives of those that were allowed to leave have been continually harassed. In all ways possible, the Soviet officials have made it clear they have no sympathy for the desires of these harmless people. Indeed, the Soviet officials have done everything possible to isolate Ilyinka from the rest of the world. Who can these peaceful people count on if not us?

The Soviet Union desperately seeks to be a great power and leader in the world. Yet it refuses to act responsibly and in a humanitarian manner when it imposes such hardships on a minority people who pose no challenge to the state. Despite being a party to the Helsinki accords of 1975, the Soviets continue to defy the international community by making Jewish emigration virtually impossible. Is this the behavior of a respectable state? I submit not. It is, however, another tragic example of the contradiction of Soviet goals and realities.

As long as the Soviets continue to persecute the Jews in that nation, United States-Soviet ties will remain strained. Until the harassment of Soviet Jews ends and emigration is again made realistically possible, the United States should speak loudly and at every opportunity to denounce the Soviet policy. Furthermore, the United States cannot ignore the mistreatment of Soviet Jews when it considers matters of trade and technological assistance with the Soviet Union. Appeals on a humanitarian basis appear to have little impact upon the Soviet leadership. Perhaps a denial of items and technology of special interest to the Soviet leadership would be more influential. At the very least, we should ensure that our policies do not reward the Soviets for their intransigence on this issue.

Mr. President, I call upon the Soviet leaders to end their oppression of Soviet Jews. As the Soviets seek to modernize their society under their new leader, Premier Gorbachev, I urge them to remember that a modern, respectable nation values all its people and respects their desires. Ending the plight of the Soviet Jews would be a meaningful sign that the Soviet Union is serious in improving its ties with and respectability among the international community. And it would be the humanitarian thing to do.

PROPORTIONATE RESPONSES TO SOVIET SALT VIOLATIONS

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, on June 10, 1985, President Reagan issued a factsheet on building an interim framework for true mutual restraint regarding U.S. unilateral compliance with the SALT II Treaty. I would like to recapitulate some of the most important highlights of this Presidential statement.

First, President Reagan stated that he had "serious reservations about the inequities of the SALT I agreement and the serious flaws of the SALT II agreement." I strongly agree with President Reagan's critique of SALT I and II, which he repeatedly termed "fatally flawed" in 1980.

Second, President Reagan states:

The pattern of Soviet violations increasingly affects our national security and raises uncertainty about the forces the United States will require in the future. * * * Soviet preparations for a prohibited territorial ABM defense * * * would have profound implications for the vital East-West balance.

I also strongly agree with President Reagan's assessment of the risks to American national security resulting from the Soviet SALT violations. The Soviets are, in fact, building a nationwide, territorial ABM defense, according to General Abrahamson.

Third, President Reagan stated:

* * * Soviet violations have continued and expanded as the Soviets have continued to build their strategic forces. Consequently, the Soviet Union has not been, and is not now, exercising the equal restraint upon which our interim restraint policy has been conditioned.

I strongly agree with President Reagan's assessment of the expanding pattern of Soviet SALT breakout violations.

Fourth, President Reagan stated:

* * * We cannot impose upon ourselves a double standard that amounts to unilateral treaty compliance and, in effect, unilateral disarmament. As a minimum, in the case of irreversible Soviet violations, we must make appropriate and proportionate response that deny the military benefits of these violations to the Soviet Union.

Again, I strongly agree with President Reagan that the United States must not engage in unilateral compliance and unilateral disarmament, and that the United States must make appropriate and proportionate responses. Indeed, I authored the proportionate response language in the fiscal year 1986 defense authorization bill that the President was referring to.

Fifth, the President pledged:

* * * the United States will develop and, as needed, implement appropriate and proportionate responses to Soviet noncompliance as necessary to ensure the security of the United States and its allies.* * *

Again, I strongly agree with President Reagan on the necessity of enacting proportionate responses.

Sixth, since June 10, 1985, President Reagan has gone the extra mile in terms of giving the Soviets the chance to reverse their SALT violations. Instead, the Soviets have expanded the pattern of their SALT breakout violations. The President's December 23, 1985, report to Congress on Soviet SALT violations contained seven newly confirmed violations. Just recently there are reports confirming Soviet deployment of a nationwide, territorial ABM system, in complete violation of the ABM Treaty. So the extra mile since June 10, 1985, has not seen any improvement in Soviet noncompliance. Indeed, the Soviets are thumbing their noses at us as their violations expand at an accelerating pace.

Seventh, President Reagan stated:

The Department of Defense will conduct a comprehensive assessment aimed at identifying specific actions which the United States could take to accelerate or augment as necessary the U.S. strategic modernization program in proportionate response to * * * those Soviet violations of existing arms agreements which the Soviets fail to correct. * * * The results of this review will be provided for the President's consideration by November 15, 1985.

I strongly commend the President for ordering this Defense Department assessment.

I therefore ask unanimous consent that the following memorandum for the President, dated November 15, 1985, by Defense Secretary Weinberger, entitled "Responding to Soviet Violations Policy (RSVP) Study," be printed in the RECORD. The executive branch has invoked executive privilege regarding release to Congress of this unclassified document, and refuses to share it with Congress. But I strongly believe that in order to support the President's policy of proportionate responses, we must have this document available to the Congress. Indeed, excerpts from this document have already appeared in the New York Times and the Washington Post and other newspapers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD these various documents to which I have made reference.

There being no objection, the documents were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, DC.

Memorandum for the President.

Subject: Responding to Soviet Violations Policy (RSVP) Study.

This memorandum responds to the several issues on which you requested comment in National Security Decision Directive 173. It is an executive summary to which is attached the full report. As I mentioned in my cover letter to you of today. I will be glad to discuss with you some specific things we might do to respond to these violations. The most important thing we can do is press for full funding for SDI in the Congress. The report is an analysis of the pattern and significance of Soviet violations, the prospects for reversing them in Geneva, and some lessons of the past and for the future.

First, if I might be permitted, a preliminary word about history, Soviet violations, and what they mean to us. The full report makes clear that the Soviet Union has been violating with impunity its principal arms control agreements with the United States. From the beginning, many felt that the Soviets used the arms control process to obscure their planned offensive buildup, weaving into the fabric of the SALT I and ABM Treaty the loopholes and ambiguities that they would later rely on to becloud or extenuate their violations. That pattern of Soviet behavior continues to this day.

LESSONS

The lessons that I believe emerge from our analysis are as follows:

First, our original assumptions that the Soviets would not violate agreements, because the political repercussions would not be worth any possible gain, have been proved false. The Soviets have, in many cases, violated treaty provisions for small, even marginal gains. The deployment of several dozen SS-16 missiles at a test facility is a case in point. So is the insignificant number by which the Soviets have exceeded the SALT II ceiling on strategic nuclear delivery vehicles and the protracted delays in dismantling systems as required by the Treaty.

Second, there will always be very strong pressure to ignore violations rather than abandon treaties—or even to respond proportionally, and the Soviet know this.

Third, a failure to respond immediately to small infractions often encourages larger ones.

Fourth, verification is not a substitute for compliance. It is vital to know what the Soviets are doing and to be able to judge when violations take place. But verification does not guarantee compliance. Some of the most troubling violations are also the most easily verified. The Krasnoyarak radar and the SS-25 are examples of violations that the Soviets must have known we would detect.

Fifth, the Standing Consultative Commission, the body assigned to deal with violations, has failed to gain Soviet compliance and will continue to do so. Indeed, it has, I think, generally discouraged more effective measures to gain Soviet compliance by pushing compliance issues into the recesses of a languid, confidential and ineffective forum.

Sixth, as we attempt to negotiate deep reductions in offensive forces the advantages to be gained by cheating will become proportionally greater.

Seventh, it is essential to recognize that the Soviets will exploit loopholes and ambiguities and that their presence in even carefully drafted agreements is unavoidable. This is because the Soviets resist precision and we have a history of acquiescing when they do so.

Eighth, it is easier to fall into a double standard of compliance than to avoid it. Without fear of contradiction at home the Soviets are able to deny violations. We are not. As a democracy we are rightly unwilling (and unable) surreptitiously to violate agreements. Even the decision to make a response proportional to Soviet violations requires great political courage, particularly if violations are not challenged early. Indeed, you are the first President to decide to do so and you can expect considerable controversy over any specific proportional response that you choose to make.

Ninth, violations can only be deterred by responding to them in ways that are more costly to the Soviets than the gains they expect to achieve through cheating. Establishing that we will respond, that we will impose costs at least equal to the benefits of Soviet violations, has been made more difficult by years of indifference and Congressional preoccupation with defense cuts. None of this is to say we should not try urgently and patiently to get the arms reductions agreements you and others want. It is to say there are many problems ahead.

SOVIET VIOLATIONS IN PERSPECTIVE

Following is a more detailed summary of the report itself, which, while long, is so because it traces the history of our arms negotiations relationships with the Soviets, and it does provide, I believe, useful background for any new set of negotiations. I hope you will not consider it too negative, or too lacking in hope. I have great hopes myself, based on my certain knowledge of how much you want agreements that will reduce arms.

Your Veteran's Day address at Arlington was a most eloquent statement of why we must continue to try to secure agreements for real and deep reductions that preserve our ability to maintain deterrence at much lower levels, and leave us free to pursue your better way to peace—the SDI—and, above all, agreements that are truly verifiable.

This is a noble quest and you are rightfully pursuing it with my total support. But it is essential, I believe, that we all be aware of how many pitfalls there are, based on the history of Soviet past behavior. We have called attention to their behavior, trying (with only moderate success) to stimulate interest and understanding on the part of Congress, the American people, and the allies, and urging (with no success) the Soviet government to cease and desist.

In our current negotiations with the Soviets, we have worked to devise positions that take account of the verification and compliance problems we have faced in connection with existing treaties. But these steps, however sensible, cannot impose a substantial cost on the Soviet Union for its violations; even more important, they have not negated the special military advantages the Soviets have created for themselves through their violations.

A failure on the part of the United States to respond strongly to the Soviet Union's policy of treaty violation would damage our interests in various significant ways. It would signal the kind of uncertainty and political weakness that invites adversaries to put one further to the test, and it could be taken as recantation of our findings of violation, thereby undermining our credibility. A more tangible ill effect would be the consolidation of the military gains the violations have afforded the Soviet Union in fields such as offensive strategic weaponry, strategic defense, and biological warfare.

Moreover, a less than forceful response to the violations would undermine any serious diplomatic endeavor to improve the U.S.-USSR relationship, in the arms control and other arenas.

It may appear paradoxical that the key to improve U.S.-Soviet relations is a vigorous response by us to Soviet treaty violations. But it is no more so than the observation that the key to domestic peace is a police force ready to exert itself to preserve the law.

THE PAST AS PRELUDE

History has repeatedly demonstrated that violations of international obligations feed on themselves; the violator tests and judges the reaction to each violation before moving on to the next. This was certainly the experience of the Allied Powers in the period between the wars as Hitler probed to its abject limit the unwillingness of France and Britain to respond to a widening pattern of German treaty violations.

Thus was massive German rearmament permitted to take place, on the land, at sea and in the air, in violation of legally binding treaties. From small German violations great battleships grew.

The failure of the democracies in the 1930s had little to do with the verification of illegal Nazi rearmament. The transformations of Boy Scout troops and police precinct units into Wehrmacht divisions, or the conversion of flying clubs into Luftwaffe squadrons, were not deceptions put over on an unsuspecting allied intelligence establishment. They were, on the contrary, clever devices to give those bent on appeasing the Nazis a pretext for inaction.

To those, like Churchill, who saw the consequences of acquiescing in German rearmament, the evidence was clear enough. But for those who were not prepared to act because action required sacrifice and large defense expenditures, always unpopular in democracies there was ample scope for inconclusive debate over the interpretation of law and intelligence.

And so there is today failure to object or respond to violations will invite further violations, many of which are already foreshadowed by national intelligence estimates.

THE PATTERN OF SOVIET VIOLATIONS AND U.S. RESPONSES

The failure of the Johnson,[1] Nixon, Ford and Carter Administrations to respond seriously to the many Soviet violations that took place during their tenures led to the situation you confronted when, in 1984, you became the first President in five Administrations to find the Soviets in violation of a number of important provisions of several arms control agreements, many of which had gone on for years before you called attention to them.

The Unites States might not be faced with the Krasnoyarsk radar today if, more than a decade ago, we had effectively protested the construction, also illegal under the ABM Treaty, of a Soviet radar at Kamchatka. Although the two violations are quite different in nature (Kamchatka was not nearly so serious militarily), it is likely that the ease with which the U.S. Government acquiesed in the Kamchatka violation in 1975 emboldened the Soviets to approve the Krasnoyarsk project probably in 1977 or 1978.

In concluding and implementing treaties with friends and allies we assume good faith. Our friends and allies rarely craft loopholes, ambiguities, or definitional imprecision as devices to distort the plain intent of the parties and recapture concessions apparently made by them during the negotiating process. Disputes, when they do arise, are generally settled by negotiation in which the original intent of the parties is a crucial factor in the resolution.

In dealing with the Soviets, however, our experience has been quite different. In SALT I and II and the ABM Treaty, the Soviets insisted on formulations calculated to excuse subsequent actions of precisely the sort the agreements were understood to curtail. And since the agreements were signed, the Soviets have made prodigious use of the loopholes and ambiguities they argued for.

None of this is to say that it will never be possible to get a good arms reduction agreement with the Soviets that is in our interest. Indeed, I think you are in a better position to do this than any previous American President because we are strong and the Soviets know you are perfectly able and willing to work for good agreements and not be pressured into bad ones.

EXPLOITING LOOPHOLES AND AMBIGUITIES

The most important example of Soviet exploitation of loopholes, drawn from SALT I, has to do with the deployment of the SS-19, a large, MIRVed Soviet ICBM. Central to the SALT I agreement was a prohibition on the conversion of launchers for light missiles into launchers for heavy missiles. The Soviets successfully resisted U.S. efforts to nail down the definition of the terms "light" and "heavy," claiming that the distinction was "obvious to everyone." Because there then existed one missile, the SS-9, vastly larger than any other deployed on either side, the Soviets encouraged the view that since both sides understood the SS-9 to be "heavy" and the several small missiles then deployed to be "light," there would be no problem of distinguishing the two types during the period of the Interim Agreement.

While this issue was under discussion the Soviets delayed (in order to conceal it from the U.S.) the flight test and silo construction program of a new ICBM. Once the agreement was signed, the Soviets launched the first test flights of the SS-19, which turned out to have three times the destructive potential (throw-weight) of either side's largest "light" missile. It was as if one party to an agreement limiting the sides to specified numbers of feathers and bricks secretly piled up stones and then argued that because stones are not bricks they must be counted as feathers. We now know that the aura of good faith with which the Soviets enveloped the American negotiators was intended to allay the sort of skepticism that might have led us to insist on precise definitions of such terms as "light" and "heavy."

In building a loophole large enough for the SS-19, the Soviets calculated that the U.S. would eventually acquiesce in a fait accompli. They could not have anticipated how scant a protest we would make or how readily the Nixon Administration would plead the Soviet case in order to contain the complaints of Senators who had been told in hearings that the United States would regard as "heavy" any missile larger than the "light" missiles deployed when the agreement was signed.

Looking back on the deployment of the SS-19 in 1975, it would be hard to fault the Soviets for concluding that the United States would accept without effective protest any Soviet action that could be excused, however disingenuously, by invoking a convenient loophole or ambiguity. And if one can call a rock a feather and get away with it, why not say an early warning radar with a substantial ABM potential is a radar for space tracking and build it at Krasnoyarsk? Such has been the evolution of Soviet noncompliance.[2]

[1] During the Johnson Administration the Soviets began the practice of conducting underground nuclear tests in a manner that frequently caused venting of radioactive material into the atmosphere in violation of the Limited Test Ban Treaty. American protests, some 32 of which have been lodged with the Soviets since 1965, became a secret ritual scorned by the Soviets. The most recent such Soviet violation of the LTBT took place on October 27, 1984. Twenty years passed from the time of the first unequivocal evidence of Soviet venting before you, in February 1985, publicly disclosed these chronic violations.

VIOLATIONS THAT EXPLOIT U.S. INTELLIGENCE LIMITATIONS

In 1985, the Soviet Union commenced deployment of the mobile SS-25 and thereby violated a provision of the SALT II Treaty limiting each side to the deployment of only one new type of ICBM.[3] Despite massive encryption of data during the SS-25 flight test program, we have convincing evidence the Soviet claim that the SS-25 is a permitted modernization of an older ICBM (SS-13) is false. The SS-25 is a new type of ICBM in every respect, including measurable characteristics by which the Treaty defines new types. Particularly troubling is the technical argument by which the Soviets sought to justify the SS-25 since it is likely to be applied to additional new types of ICBMs identified by U.S. intelligence but not yet flight tested. For this reason, a failure to respond effectively to this violation will almost certainly invite additional violations in the future.

In 1979, proponents of the SALT II Treaty stressed the importance of the new-type limit on modernization. They argued that, with the Treaty, the Soviets would be limited to one new type of ICBM while, without a Treaty, several were expected. A third possibility—that the Soviets would sign the Treaty, violate it and wind up with several new types nonetheless—never figured in the ratification debate, although there was a good deal of discussion about whether the new-type limitation was verifiable.

The evolution of the one-new-type limitation in the SALT II negotiations is instructive. The United States proposed banning all types of ICBMs. The Soviets insisted that one be permitted and that provision be made for the modification of older types. We conceded both points. There followed a lengthy negotiation aimed at defining the sort of modification that would be allowed for older types of ICBMs.

The constraints finally agreed to under Soviet pressure were narrowly defined. All along, our intent for the one-new-type limit and the associated rules covering allowable modification was to restrict severely the Soviet freedom to bring out a new missile in the guise of modifying an old one. In the end, the Soviets twisted the Treaty's intent and then violated it so as to permit the development of at least two new types. What had begun as a cul de sac ended up a superhighway leading to the development of a whole generation of new and substantially more capable intercontinental ballistic missiles.

VIOLATIONS EXACERBATING U.S. INTELLIGENCE LIMITATIONS

We think U.S. efforts to obtain a Soviet pledge to refrain from the encryption of test data telemetry almost certainly alerted Moscow to the importance of telemetry as a source of intelligence about Soviet military programs. The Soviets seldom denied us missile test data before we proposed that they undertake not to do so; agreement on prohibiting encryption necessary for verification purposes, however, was followed immediately by extensive Soviet encryption.

Newly aware of our requirement for test data, the Soviets set about denying it to us. And they have never looked back: encryption, in addition to other concealment and deception measures, has spread like a range fire ever since. In some cases, it is now nearly total. And the Treaty provisions restricting encryption, which SALT II proponents highlighted as a guarantee that the U.S. would have unencumbered access to information necessary for verification and intelligence, are now chronically violated.

During the SALT II ratification debate, the Senate was particularly forceful in asserting the importance it attached to Soviet compliance with the limitations on telemetry encryption. The report of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the Treaty included the following statement:

"Any practice with regard to the transmission of telemetric information during the testing of strategic arms limited by the Treaty, including but not limited to the failure to transmit relevant telemetric information, which results in impeding of verification by United States national technical means of any provision of the Treaty, will be raised by the United States in the Standing Consultative Commission and if the issue is not resolved to the satisfaction of the United States, the United States reserves the right to exercise all other available remedies, including, but not limited to, the right to withdraw from the Treaty."

The Administration and Congress alike understood that a violation of the encryption provision would have profound consequences for U.S. intelligence and could undermine the many Treaty provisions whose verification depended on access to Soviet test data. Here again we are faced with a violation which, unless reversed, is certain to diminish still further our ability to monitor Soviet activities and to verify their compliance with Treaty obligations.

KRASNOYARSK AND TERRITORIAL DEFENSE

Of the many violations of the USSR's arms control obligations, the most serious includes, but is not limited to, the large Soviet phased-array radar under construction near Krasnoyarsk. For associated with that radar is a variety of other violations, some of the spirit or intent, others of the letter, of the complex constraints in the ABM Treaty aimed at preventing the deployment of a territorial defense involving a nation-wide anti-ballistic missile system.

While the evidence is not conclusive there is good reason to be alarmed at the combination of Soviet development of readily-transportable radars, significant upgrading of the Moscow ABM system, the testing of air-defense components in an ABM mode, the development (and testing) of air-defense missiles capable of intercepting ballistic missile warheads and the completion of a network of large phased-array radars of which the radar at Krasnoyarsk is a part. Taken together, these activities, some reaching back into the early and mid-1970s, could indicate the beginning of Soviet territorial defense against ballistic missiles.

The central restriction of the ABM Treaty is the limit it places on the deployment of large phased-array radars. Because they typically take five-to-seven years to build and are the pacing element in an integrated defense system, these highly visible large radars were severely constrained in the 1972 Treaty. Once deployed, these radars form the essential infrastructure to which interceptors and smaller radars might be added, expanding incrementally the capacity of the system as a whole to detect, track and intercept U.S. or allied warheads launched in retaliation against Soviet targets.

That the Soviets are today poised for such a development is a consequence of a pattern of violations, many of which must have been planned during and in the period immediately following the ABM Treaty negotiations. It is likely that the Soviets will continue further to refine the air defense components and transportable radars' necessary to make full use of the large phased-array radar base that is now nearing completion—a base that greatly exceeds that planned by the United States for deployment of the Safeguard ABM system abandoned in the aftermath of the ABM Treaty.

THE STANDING CONSULTATIVE COMMISSION

SALT I and II and the ABM Treaty all provided for a Standing Consultative Commission (SCC) for the drafting of technical implementing agreements and the resolution of compliance issues. It consists of representatives of the U.S. and Soviet Union who negotiate on the occasion of their meetings. Its deliberations are secret.

Contrary to the claims often made for it, the SCC has failed to resolve any significant compliance issue in the approximately 1,500 days that it has been in sesssion over the last 13 years. A less productive forum for the resolution of disputes would be difficult to find.

Far from resolving disputes over compliance, the SCC has become a diplomatic carpet under which Soviet violations have been continuously swept, an Orwellian memory-hole into which our concerns have been dumped like yesterday's trash. Unwilling to face up to a mounting record of Soviet violations, successive administrations have consigned our concerns to the SCC where they have been "discussed," often for years on end, with wholly unsatisfactory results.

Violations raised by the U.S. in the SCC were dealt with in slow motion while they continued and until they had run their course, at which time they were declared to have been resolved. A good case in point is the Soviet program for testing air defense components in an "ABM mode" in violation of the ABM Treaty. Well over 100 suspicious tests were conducted over twelve years while the SCC painted an attenuated arabesque that served to obscure their continuation. When their tests were completed the Soviets announced, and the United States gratefully received, the news that they would cease. Even this dismal result proved ephemeral; after a brief interval, the Soviets resumed the prohibited tests—and back we went to the SCC.

Our Administration has been the first to acknowledge the ineffectiveness of the SCC, and the first one willing to report publicly Soviet violations.

There are those who believe that the inadequacies of the SCC can be overcome by a redoubled effort. I believe this misses the essential point about the SCC. If the Soviets comply with agreements, the issue of violations will not arise in the SCC or anywhere else. If they wish to violate them, they will not be deterred by semi-annual meetings of the SCC. The SCC is merely a forum for discussion, a date and place and list of atten-

[2] A new CIA report confirms that the Krasnoyarsk radar is not suited for the purposes claimed for it by the Soviet but is indeed an early warning radar.

[3] The Soviets had earlier formally notified us that the SS-X-24 was to be their one permitted new type of ICBM.

dees. While, in theory, it could be used to dispel misunderstandings, misunderstanding is not the source of Soviet behavior; rather, Soviet behavior is motivated by a desire to gain advantage and the SCC is powerless to affect it.

A constituency has developed around the SCC composed, as is the SCC itself, of Soviets and Americans who believe that violations of agreements must not be permitted to become prominent features of the arms control dialogue. Only a clear declaration from the President that the SCC has failed offers any prospect that we will find the will and opportunity to make the appropriate responses that will create incentives for Soviet compliance and disincentives to Soviet violations.

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE PATTERN OF VIOLATIONS

The current and future Soviet violations pose real risks to our security and to the process of arms control itself.

The Krasnoyarsk radar together with other indications suggesting a possible future territorial defense could have a profound impact on our strategic deterrent forces. Even a probable territorial defense would require us to increase the number of our offensive forces and their ability to penetrate Soviet defenses to assure that our operational plans could be executed. The deployment in significant numbers of the SS-25 (which is now well underway) will erode deterrence by allowing the Soviets to contemplate a first-strike using their fixed ICBMs, while retaining intact a reserve force of mobile systems resiliant to counterattack. On-going encryption of flight-test telemetry will continue to rob us of valuable intelligence and diminish further our ability to verify Soviet compliance with arms control agreements. Other Soviet concealment practices will have a similar effect.

These few examples are illustrative. For each of the violations that you have reported to the Congress there are associated risks to our security. When violations of the spirit of past agreements are added to the list—the deployment of the SS-19, the conversion of ballistic missile launching submarines to cruise missile launching submarines, and the like—the cumulative impact on our security is deeply troubling.

We believe modernized strategic and conventional forces and vigorous SDI research present the strongest message to the Soviets in response to their treaty violations. Such US forces and research also provide the best hedge against future Soviet threats. There are a number of military programs which have been cancelled or reduced due to budget constraints. These reductions could have a significant effect on our deterrent capability. Thus, our priority response should be to implement fully these programs. I will be prepared to discuss our options for proportionate responses upon your return from Geneva.

I think it is still possible to obtain, by patent negotiation with the Soviets, verifiable agreements that make sharp reductions, down to parity, in the nuclear arsenals. Both powers' strategic defense remains, however, as the greatest single long-range hope of mankind.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting a treaty which was referred to the appropriate committees.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

At 11:31 a.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled bill:

S. 1396. An act to settle unresolved claims relating to certain allotted Indian lands on the White Earth Indian Reservation, to remove clouds from the titles to certain lands, and for other purposes.

The enrolled bill was subsequently signed by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

At 1:51 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 534) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and agrees thereto, with an amendment, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House has passed the following joint resolution, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.J. Res. 563. Joint resolution to provide for the temporary extension of certain programs relating to housing and community development, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that pursuant to section 204 of Public Law 98-459, the Speaker appoints as members of the Federal Council on the Aging the following persons from private life: Ms. Tessa Macaulay of Miami, FL, and Mrs. Josephine K. Oblinger of Springfield, IL.

The message also announced that pursuant to the provisions of section 276a-1 of title 22 of the United States Code, the Speaker appoints as members of the delegation to attend the conference of the Interparliamentary Union, to be held in Mexico City, Mexico, on April 7 through April 12, 1986, the following Members on the part of the House: Mr. PEPPER, chairman, Mr. HAMILTON, vice chairman, Mr. UDALL, Mr. DE LA GARZA, Mr. STOKES, Mr. BEDELL, Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT, Mr. VANDER JAGT, and Mr. HYDE.

At 3:49 p.m. a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the following bill, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 1524. An act to prevent the denial of employment opportunities by prohibiting the use of lie detectors by employers involved in or affecting interstate commerce.

MEASURES REFERRED

The following bill was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated.

H.R. 1524. An act to prevent the denial of employment opportunities by prohibiting the use of lie detectors by employers involved in or affecting interstate commerce; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

MEASURE HELD AT THE DESK

The following bill was ordered held at the desk by unanimous consent pending further disposition.

H.J. Res. 563. Joint resolution to provide for the temporary extension of certain programs relating to housing and community development, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

The Secretary of the Senate reported that on today, March 13, 1986, she had presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bill:

S. 1396. An act to settle unresolved claims relating to certain allotted Indian lands on the White Earth Indian Reservation, to remove clouds from the titles to certain lands, and for other purposes.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. THURMOND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, without amendment:

S. 412. A bill to clarify the circumstances under which territorial provisions in licenses to distribute and sell trademarked malt beverage products are lawful under the antitrust laws (Rept. No. 99-259).

By Mr. GARN, from the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs:

Special Report on the Tax Reform Act of 1985 (Rept. No. 99-260).

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following executive reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. DANFORTH, from the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

Daniel Oliver, of Connecticut, to be a Federal Trade Commissioner for the unexpired term of seven years from September 26, 1981;

Andrew John Strenio, of Maryland, to be a Federal Trade Commissioner for the unexpired term of seven years from September 26, 1981;

Paul H. Lamboley, of Nevada, to be a Member of the Interstate Commerce Commission for a term expiring December 31, 1989;

J.J. Simmons III, of Oklahoma, to be a Member of the Interstate Commerce Commission for a term expiring December 31, 1990;

Janet Hale, of Massachusetts, to be an Assistant Secretary of Transportation;

Alfred C. Sikes, of Missouri, to be Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Communications and Information;

The following officers of the United States Coast Guard for appointment to the grade of rear admiral: Edward Nelson, Jr., Clyde E. Robbins, Theodore J. Wojnar, Arnold M. Danielsen; and Howard B. Thorsen.

(The following nominations were reported with the recommendation that they be confirmed, subject to the nominees' commitment to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.)

Mr. DANFORTH. For the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, I also report favorably two lists of Coast Guard nominations which appeared in full in the RECORD of February 17, 1986, and, to save the expense of reprinting them on the Executive Calendar, ask that they lie on the Secretary's desk for the information of Senators:

Philip D. Winn, of Colorado, to be a Member of the Board of Directors of the National Institute of Building Sciences for a term expiring September 7, 1986;

Frank B. Sollars, of Ohio, to be a Member of the Board of Directors of the National Consumer Cooperative Bank for a term of three years;

John A. Bohn, Jr., of Virginia, to be President of the Export-Import Bank of the United States for a term of four years; and Richard H. Francis, of Virginia, to be President of the Solar Energy and Energy Conservation Bank.

(The above nominations were reported from the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs with the recommendation that they be confirmed, subject to the nominees' commitment to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.)

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. BYRD:

S. 2188. A bill to provide for the development of additional electric generation and industrial energy capacity; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. STAFFORD (by request):

S. 2189. A bill to authorize appropriations for certain highways in accordance with title 23, United States Code, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. SARBANES:

S. 2190. A bill to provide that the full cost-of-living adjustment in benefits payable under certain Federal programs shall be made for 1987; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

By Mr. ROTH (for himself, Mr. COHEN, Mr. CHILES, Mr. LEVIN, and Mr. SIMON):

S. 2191. A bill to amend the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 so as to prohibit reprisals against certain officers, employees, or contractors of air carriers; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

By Mr. HATFIELD:

S. 2192. A bill to reform and simplify the Federal individual income tax; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. BOREN:

S. 2193. A bill to change the basis for computation of emergency compensation whenever the Secretary of Agriculture adjusts the level of loans and purchases for the 1986 through 1990 crops of wheat under the Agricultural Act of 1949; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

By Mr. DANFORTH (for himself, Mr. DOLE, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. SIMON, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. EAGLETON, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. GORE, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. NUNN, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. WARNER, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. PELL, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. KERRY, Mr. COHEN, and Mr. HATCH):

S.J. Res. 296. A joint resolution to designate October 16, 1986, as "World Food Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SUBMISSION OF CONCURRENT AND SENATE RESOLUTIONS

The following concurrent resolutions and Senate resolutions were read, and referred (or acted upon), as indicated:

By Mr. HUMPHREY:

S. Res. 366. A resolution expressing the sense of the Senate that the deduction for State and local taxes be repealed; to the Committee on Finance.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. BYRD:

S. 2188. A bill to provide for the development of additional electric generation and industrial energy capacity; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

(The remarks of Mr. BYRD and the text of the legislation appear earlier in today's RECORD.)

By Mr. STAFFORD (by request):

S. 2189. A bill to authorize appropriations for certain highways in accordance with title 23, United States Code, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

SURFACE TRANSPORTATION REAUTHORIZATION ACT

● Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, today I am introducing by request a bill transmitted by the Secretary of Transportation entitled the "Surface Transportation Reauthorization Act of 1986." This bill provides authorizations for the Federal-aid Highway Program and the urban mass transit program for fiscal years 1987 through 1990 and extends the Highway Trust Fund through 1992. I am pleased to introduce this legislation by request in order to bring it before the Senate for our consideration.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of Transportation's transmittal letter, the summary of major provisions, and the section-by-section analysis be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF TRANSPORTATION,
Washington, DC, February 5, 1986.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am submitting for your consideration a draft bill entitled the "Surface Transportation Reauthorization Act of 1986".

The purpose of this legislation is to redefine the role of Federal, state and local governments in carrying out surface transportation projects involving highway construction, highway safety and transit. This bill would provide a total of approximately $57 billion in authorizations for these programs over the four-year period from FY 1987 to FY 1990. All of this funding will come from user fees paid into the Highway Trust Fund.

The bill would provide more flexibility to states by combining the Federal-aid primary, the Interstate reconstruction (4R), and the Interstate construction programs into a single combined program authorized at $7.8 billion per year. The formula for this combined program would be based on the formulas of the programs being consolidated thus retaining the relative distribution of these funds for the various states, but the states would decide whether new construction or rehabilitation of existing major highways is the highest priority. We expect that high priority Interstate segments that are not yet built (especially gaps between major urbanized areas) will be built by the states under this combined program.

The bill would enhance local decision-making and increase state flexibility by creating a block grant for other highway programs and for the transit program. This streamlined program would be authorized at a level of $3.3 billion per year. Detailed Federal reviews will be replaced by assurances from the states, thus providing a simpler, more efficient mechanism for delivery of these funds. The bill would repeal the current operating assistance program for large urbanized areas, but would allow the states the discretion to fund an operating assistance program for rural and small urbanized areas using their block grant funds.

The bill contains a number of provisions designed to enhance competition and the role of the private sector in the provision of transit services. Studies show that major savings may be possible through such competition.

Substantial funding would continue to be made available for reconstruction of bridges on the primary system. Because of the continued need to improve safety on the nation's highways, the hazard elimination and highway-railroad grade crossings programs will be retained as separate programs. The bill also would strengthen the Department of Transportation's safety efforts by continuing our highway safety program while eliminating Federal earmarking of funds. It would increase the funding for the commercial motor vehicles safety program and permit states to use other apportioned funds for these purposes.

The Department believes user fee levels should not be increased and, therefore, the bill continues the current highway user fee tax levels. However, we have included provisions to end certain exemptions which we believe are not warranted. The amount made available annually to the states by this bill for highway construction, highway safety, and transit programs equals the amount projected to be paid annually into the Highway Trust Fund. The bill proposes this equality between receipts and payments to ensure that the legislation is "deficit neutral"; that is, it does not increase or decrease the annual deficit. While this results in a lower total program level than in past years, the spending levels are in response to the decision by the President and the Congress to take steps that are necessary to reduce the Federal deficit.

These features are described in greater detail in the first enclosure.

The bill that we are proposing at this time does not contain any revisions to the current program for disadvantaged business enterprises created by section 105(f) of the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982. The issue is still under consideration and we intend to work closely with the Congress to address this provision during the development of the legislation.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that, from the standpoint of the Administration's program, there is no objection to the submittal of this legislative proposal to the Congress and that its enactment would be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely,

ELIZABETH HANFORD DOLE.

SUMMARY OF MAJOR PROVISIONS

TITLE I—FEDERAL-AID HIGHWAY PROGRAMS

This legislation restructures the highway program to continue the Federal emphasis on highway systems that warrant Federal attention while allowing state and local governments greater flexibility to meet highway needs. The bill would restructure the highway program into four major parts: (1) the Interstate/Primary program composed of the former separate Interstate construction, Interstate rehabilitation (4R), and primary programs (2) the bridge program (3) selected safety programs (including the hazard elimination and highway-railroad grade crossings programs), and (4) the block grant program composed of the former separate urban, secondary, and non-primary bridge program. The Interstate/Primary program and changes to other existing highway programs are discussed below. The block grant program is discussed in Title IV.

Interstate/Primary Program

In order to give the states increased flexibility to address critical national needs, the Interstate construction, Interstate-4R and primary programs are merged into a single program. The funds may be used at the discretion of the state for any projects currently permitted under these programs. At a time when requirements to reduce the Federal deficit make it necessary to reduce program levels, a combined program offers the states more flexibility to complete high-priority work. The new structure recognizes the need to balance the preservation of the existing major highway system with the need to build new highways. States will have the ability to accelerate completion of some Interstate segments since there will no longer be a disincentive to use primary system funds on Interstate construction. Under current law, spending primary system funds on completing the Interstate system would decrease future Interstate construction apportionments.

The combined program will approximate the current relative distribution of these funds among the states since the new program will incorporate the current Interstate 4R and primary formulas and distribute Interstate construction funds based on the cost to complete the remaining system. States will have an incentive to allocate funds to the Interstate system because the Federal share for Interstate projects will continue to be 90 percent while the Federal share for primary projects will continue to be 75 percent. The current provisions in 23 U.S.C. 119(b) will be retained to ensure that the states maintain their Interstate system properly.

Bridge program

With the initiation of the highway and transit block grant in Title IV, the Federal-interest bridge program will include only non-Interstate primary system bridges. Bridges on the Interstate system would be eligible under the Interstate/Primary program. The latest Departmental report on the bridge program shows that there continues to be a large backlog of primary system bridge needs. The new program will be authorized at $1.25 billion per year for FY 1987-1990 to address these needs. Since there is also a large backlog of high-cost bridges, the discretionary portion of the program is being increased from $200 million to $250 million per year.

Interstate substitution program

Under current law, substitute transit projects are funded from the General Fund and substituted highway projects are funded from the Highway Trust Fund. The bill proposes to eliminate the separate authorization for substitute transit projects and provide funding for both substitute highway and transit projects from the Highway Account of the Highway Trust Fund. The bill authorizes the combined substitute program at $500 million per year through FY 1990.

Highway beautification

The bill proposes to simplify the complex and often unworkable Highway Beautification Program. The changes proposed would give states greater flexibility in administering the program and focus Federal efforts on billbords in rural areas, where state land use controls are the weakest and esthetic protection is most important. Other changes we propose would sharply reduce the cost of the program while still providing states the opportunity to use Federal funds for payments of just compensation for billboard removal, to the extent required by state law.

Safety construction program

The highway-railroad grade crossing and hazard elimination programs are important to highway safety, and they should be maintained as separate categories. The recommended funding is $190 million per year and $175 million per year, respectively.

Motor carrier safety grants

The bill proposes to continue the motor carrier grant program to states at an annual level of $50 million. We also propose to fund this activity directly from the Highway Trust Fund by means of a set-aside from the Interstate/Primary funds before these funds are apportioned to the states. In addition, the bill would establish a mechanism so that states can use a portion of their Interstate/Primary apportionment to supplement these funds. This program provides planning and implementation funds to states to increase their efforts to improve the safe operation of trucks and buses.

Other flexibility provisions

The latest report on the conditions and performance of our Nation's highways continues to show that needs are much larger than can be addressed by the Federal-aid highway program alone. In view of this, changes are proposed to increase the flexibility and purchasing power of state funds by reducing Federal requirements.

As one example, we are recommending revisions to present toll road statutes. The toll road provisions would permit a state to use toll financing, in conjunction with Federal-aid highway funds, in the construction of new toll roads or the reconstruction of existing toll roads. States would have the option of continuing tolls on these roads after the construction costs had been recovered so long as any excess revenues are used for highway construction on public roads. States would not be permitted to place tolls on existing free roads that were constructed using Federal-aid highway funds.

Program consolidation

As part of the program restructuring, a number of existing categorical programs are eliminated. Unobligated balances for certain of these programs will be transferred to the new programs that replace them. In the case of the urban and secondary programs, the unobligated balances may be used for highway construction on any public road using procedures applicable to the primary system. Alternatively, a state may elect to use procedures of the block grant program for off-system projects to the extent deemed appropriate by the Secretary. In most other cases, any unobligated funds will lapse one year after enactment of the bill.

TITLE II—HIGHWAY SAFETY PROGRAMS

The bill would provide authorizations from the Highway Trust Fund for the Department's National Highway Traffic Safety Administration [NHTSA] for fiscal years 1987 through 1990 to carry out the agency's highway safety grant and research programs.

State and community highway safety grant program

The bill would authorize $110 million per year for NHTSA's section 402 State and Community Highway Safety Grant program, reflecting the Department's continued high priority on effective traffic safety programs administered at the state and local level.

Research and development programs

For NHTSA's section 403 research and development programs, the bill would authorize $31 million per year for FY 1987 through FY 1990.

Cost-benefit test

The bill also includes a provision to explicitly require the Department to determine whether the benefits to be derived from requiring splash and spray suppression devices, such as mudflaps, on trucks and buses are greater than the costs.

Other provisions

The bill also includes several technical amendments to these NHTSA programs, including periodic reviews of the effectiveness of section 402 programs and organizational improvements for the National Highway Safety Advisory Committee. Further discussion of these provisions is included in the section-by-section analysis.

TITLE III—MASS TRANSIT PROGRAMS

The purpose of the changes to the mass transit program is to reduce Federal involvement in programs that do not serve nationwide needs, to reduce Federal requirements, to expand local flexibility and decisionmaking, and to enhance the role of private industry in the provision of transit services.

Revised delivery mechanism

Instead of the variety of financial assistance that is currently provided under Urban Mass Transportation Administration [UMTA] programs, this bill would create one basic program. Transit assistance would be provided to states and local governments under the block grant provisions of Title IV. The Block Grant would be funded from the Highway and Mass Transit Accounts of the Highway Trust Fund. Funds for areas with a population of 200,000 or more would be passed through directly to these areas. Funds for smaller areas would be administered by the states.

Operating assistance

At the request of the Administration, Congress has frozen or decreased the amount of assistance available to transit authorities to fund routine operating costs. This bill recognizes the differences between the need for Federal operating assistance in small urbanized (less than 200,000 population) and rural areas and the need in large areas. Many small and rural areas receive such a high percentage of their operating budget from the Federal government that the sudden cessation of Federal operating assistance might result in serious hardships for them. The bill proposes to allow block grant funds to be used for operating assistance in small urbanized and rural areas, subject to the current total limitation (or a reduced level if Congress later so provides). Operating assistance would be ended for large urbanized areas. This would result in an annual savings of more than $850 million from the General Fund.

To assist large urbanized areas in maintaining their transit equipment, the definition of capital assistance would be expanded to cover capital maintenance items.

Enhance private enterprise participation

Title III contains a number of changes to encourage the participation of private enterprise in the provision of mass transit service. First, section 302 would preclude the use of Federally-funded equipment and facilities in charter service. The planning requirements would be revised by section 304 so that the participation of private companies would be considered in decisions to provide transit service. Section 305 would require transit policy boards to include private operators, to the extent permitted by state law. Finally, section 306 would require recipients of transit funds to competitively bid a portion of their operations.

TITLE IV—BLOCK GRANT PROGRAM

An important objective of the bill is to give the states and localities increased flexibility in the use of their highway and transit funds which are used to satisfy local transportation needs. This title would replace the current FHWA urban system program, the FHWA secondary system program, the FHWA non-primary system portion of the bridge program, the UMTA discretionary grant program, and the UMTA formula program with a block grant program. Under this block grant program, a state would provide assurances that it will comply with applicable Federal requirements. Federal review and approval actions would not be required.

Structure

This program would have two components: an urban mobility component, under which funds could be used only in large urbanized areas for either highway or transit projects and a state component which can be used anywhere in the state for either highway or transit projects. A state may choose to use funds from the state component in rural and small urbanized areas for transit operating assistance. The amount used cannot exceed the amount made available in FY 1985 for operating assistance in these areas.

Distribution

The program would be authorized at a level of $3.3 billion per year which is equivalent to the sum of the FY 1986 program levels for the FHWA programs that are incorporated ($2.2 billion) plus $1.1 billion from the Mass Transit account. All of the funding would be derived from fees paid into the Highway Trust Fund.

Formula

The funds will be distributed to the Governor of each state by a formula that will approximate the total amount of funds each state received under the current FHWA programs plus an amount of UMTA funds that is based on the current section 9A and section 18 formulas. The funds would be fungible; that is, they could be spent on either highway or transit projects. To continue the consideration presently given to urbanized areas of 200,000 or more population, provisions are included to require that the portion of the FWHA and UMTA funds attributable to these urbanized areas be made available to these areas. The amounts of attributable funds are based on the current provisions of FHWA Urban System program and the UMTA section 9A formula. The FHWA funds that are not attributable to large urbanized areas could be spent anywhere in the state on eligible highway or transit projects. The Transit Account funds not passed through to the large urbanized areas would be apportioned to the states using the same percentages applicable to small urbanized areas and rural areas under existing law, 8.64 percent and 2.93 percent, respectively. These funds could be spent anywhere in the state for eligible transit or highway projects.

Program match

All highway and transit capital projects under the highway and transit block grant would have a maximum Federal share of 75 percent. Transit operating assistance for rural and small urban areas would have a maximum Federal share of 50 percent.

Program assurances

A number of assurances would apply to the use of funds under the highway and transit block grant. These assurances would require only a written statement from the Governor that the requirements are being met. Because the transit assurances would be based on provisions of the Urban Mass Transportation Act, and because the Administration proposes to make certain changes or additions to that Act, a number of the provisions of Title III would apply to the use of block grant funds for transit projects.

TITLE V—CHANGES TO TAX PROVISIONS

Highway revenue provision, extension of the user fees and the highway trust fund

In order to provide continued funding of the program, provisions are included to extend both the user fees and the Highway Trust Fund for four years.

Elimination of certain exemptions from user fees

The current exemptions for gasohol, methanol, and ethanol significantly reduce the revenue going into the Highway Trust Fund. In FY 1986, the loss amounts to approximately $445 million and, by FY 1990, the loss is expected to increase to approximately $600 million. Since vehicles using these exempt fuels do the same amount of damage to our highways as vehicles using nonexempt fuels, the Administration believes these exemptions are inappropriate and contrary to the user fee principle. Provisions to repeal these exemptions are contained in this bill and the President's tax simplication initiative.

Provisions to eliminate the current gasoline, diesel, and tire tax exemptions for public and private revenue bus operations are also included. These exemptions are estimated to reduce Highway Trust Fund revenues by approximately $113 million in FY 1986 with the reduction increasing to approximately $130 million by FY 1990. The goal of these changes is to charge the actual users of the highway systems for the damage that they cause and also to provide a "level playing field" between public and private bus companies.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS—SURFACE TRANSPORTATION REAUTHORIZATION ACT OF 1986

TITLE I: FEDERAL-AID HIGHWAY ACT OF 1986

Section 101—Short title

This section provides that Title I may be cited as the "Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1986".

Section 102—Authorizations

This section authorizes the appropriation of sums from the Highway Account of the Highway Trust Fund for the various Federal-aid programs through fiscal year 1990.

Paragraph (a)(1) provides authorizations for the Interstate-primary program for each fiscal years 1987 through 1990.

Paragraph (a)(2) provides authorizations for the Interstate substitution program of $500 million for each fiscal years 1987 through 1990.

Paragraph (a)(3) provides annual authorizations for the bridge replacement and rehabilitation program of $1.25 billion for fiscal years 1987 through 1990.

Paragraph (a)(4) provides each of the territories (the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, and the Northern Marianas) with an annual authorization under the Territorial Highway Program for fiscal years 1987 through 1990 of $5 million, $5 million, $1 million and $1 million, respectively.

Paragraph (a)(5) provides annual authorizations for each of the components of the Federal lands highways program for fiscal years 1987 through 1990 as follows: forest highways $75 million, public lands highways $25 million, Indian Reservation roads $75 million, and park roads and parkways $75 million.

Paragraph (a)(6) provides annual authorizations for highway related safety grants by FHWA for the fiscal years 1987 through 1990 of $10 million.

Paragraph (a)(7) provides annual authorizations for FHWA highway safety research and development for fiscal years 1987 through 1990 of $7.0 million.

Paragraph (a)(8) provides annual authorizations for rail-highway crossings for fiscal years 1987 through 1990 of $190 million.

Paragraph (a)(9) provides annual authorizations for hazard elimination for fiscal years 1987 through 1990 of $175 million.

Paragraph (a)(10) provides authorizations for fiscal years 1987 through 1990 for the 90-percent minimum apportionment of not to exceed $250 million per fiscal year.

Subsection (b) sets aside $50 million per fiscal year from the Federal-aid Interstate-primary program authorization for the motor carrier safety assistance program for each fiscal years 1987 through 1990. Funds set aside by this subsection shall not be used to match Federal training funds. Funds apportioned for the Federal-aid Interstate-primary program may be obligated for the motor carrier safety assistance program.

Subsection (c) provides an authorization out of the Highway Account of the Highway Trust Fund to administer the Bureau of Motor Carrier Safety.

Section 103—Income from rights-of-way

This section provides that the net income a State receives from the use, lease, or sale of right-of-way airspace acquired as a result of a project under title 23 shall be used for projects under chapter 1 of title 23. This section would be effective October 1, 1986.

Section 104—Federal-aid systems

This section amends section 103 of title 23 to establish the primary system, consisting of rural arterial routes and their extensions, and the 43,000 miles Interstate System as the systems of national significance. The prohibition of designation of additions to the Interstate System, except under 23 U.S.C. 139, is continued.

The Federal-aid secondary and urban systems are not part of this system of national significance and financing for projects which were previously on these systems will come from the highway and transit block grant established as Chapter 5, title 23 by this Act.

Section 103(b)(1) establishes the Interstate System mileage as a combination of the system mileage authorized by current law in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) in section 103(e) of title 23. The Interstate System mileage is also retained as part of the Federal-Aid Primary System and, as is provided in current law, the Secretary is prohibited from designating any new Interstate System mileage except under section 139 of title 23.

Section 103(b)(2) replaces section 103(e)(4) of title 23, contains the provisions of the Interstate withdrawal-substitution program, and continues the funding of substitution projects (highway or transit) with funds made available by Interstate System withdrawals approved before October 1, 1986.

The revision continues the administration of substitute highway and substitute transit programs by FHWA and UMTA respectively with all substitution funds authorized from the Highway Account of the Highway Trust Fund.

Since the revision is being made effective October 1, 1986, all current provisions concerning eligibility for withdrawal and the request and approval of withdrawals have been eliminated. The revision eliminates the September 30, 1983, deadline for approval of substitute projects and clarifies the roles of responsible local officials and the Governor in the selection and submission of substitute projects.

The requirement of a substitution cost estimate has been eliminated and replaced by an apportionment formula and by allocation in section 105 of this Act. The period of availability is extended for apportioned and allocated funds to 2 years in section 112 of this Act.

The types of projects eligible for funding remain the same as in current law with the added flexibility that substitute funds may be used for substitute highway construction projects on any public road (definition in section 101 of title 23) and for transportation planning and research under 23 U.S.C. 134 and 23 U.S.C. 307. The Federal share on substitute projects is retained at 85 percent and is shown in section 113 of this Act.

Current law (section 103(e) (5), (6), (7), (8), and (9) of title 23) permits the Secretary to waive the repayment of Federal funds expended on withdrawn Interstate segments under various circumstances.

Section 103(c) replaces the current law with a provision that requires, in the case of an Interstate or primary system action, the repayment of Federal funds expended on construction items, materials, and rights-of-way if such items, materials, and rights-of-way are not applied to a transportation project within 10 years.

The provision retains the rights of previous owners and provides that repaid funds shall be credited to the State's unobligated balance of Federal funds for use on other projects.

The provision replacing the repayment provisions for Interstate withdrawals allows waiver of the repayment of Federal funds only in those instances where the State proposes a transportation reuse and extends the provision to similar situations where system actions are taken on the Federal-aid primary system. This provision will narrow the situations on Interstate projects where waiver is permitted and apply the same policy to system actions on the Federal-aid primary system.

The provisions would apply to actions where an entire segment of the Federal-aid system is terminated or changed. This provision is not intended to cover certain kinds of property disposition such as excess right-of-way resulting from changes to project plans, deletions of open-to-traffic segments, individual project phases which do not advance to the next phase within the time limits of the Federal-aid project agreement or items purchased but found unnecessary to completion of an individual project all of which will continue to be handled under the policy and regulations of the FHWA.

Section 105—Apportionment and allocation

This section replaces the existing section 104 in title 23, consolidating provisions relating to the distribution of authority among the States and eliminates archaic references which no longer apply to the Federal-aid program. (Unless otherwise noted the references below are to 23 U.S.C. 104, as amended.)

Subsection (a) essentially incorporates the current administrative takedown.

Subsection (b) provides a process for distributing Federal planning assistance funds to States and urbanized areas. Federal assistance for planning activities in areas with a population of 200,000 or more will continue to be made available as currently provided in section 104(f) of title 23. For the urbanized areas with populations between 50,000 and 200,000, the funds will be made available to the State for use by or for the benefit of these areas. These amendments are being made in concert with those in section 121 of this bill which amends 23 U.S.C. 134.

This subsection requires designation of a metropolitan planning organization (MPO) only for those urbanized areas with population of 200,000 or more. Urbanized areas with populations between 50,000 and 200,000 would continue to be required to meet the objective of 23 U.S.C. 134, but would not be required to follow federally prescribed planning requirements contained therein.

Nothing in these amendments is intended to preclude State and local officials from continuing their planning process or an MPO, or both, in urbanized areas with populations between 50,000 and 200,000 if they so desire. These amendments also retain the current apportionment formula; each State's funds are determined by the ratio its urbanized area population bears to the total urbanized area population of the Nation.

Subsection (c) provides for a deduction in fiscal years 1987 through 1991 (net of administration and metropolitan planning) from the Federal-aid Interstate-primary, bridge replacement and rehabilitation, Interstate substitution, the railway-highway crossings and the hazard elimination programs to carry out the purposes of the Strategic Highway Research Program created by section 120 of this bill as 23 U.S.C. 133. A deduction from the Highway and Transit Block Grant for SHRP is also provided in title 4 of this Act.

Paragraph (d)(1) prescribes the apportionments of Federal-aid categories.

Paragraph (A) provides a formula for the new Interstate-primary program which apportions $1.635 billion based on an administratively adjusted 1985 Interstate Cost Estimate and then combines the existing Interstate-4R formula (55 percent on Interstate lane miles and 45 percent on Interstate vehicle miles traveled) with the existing primary formula. The amount necessary to provide the minimum amounts for the primary portion of the formula will be taken off the top of the authorization before apportionment in lieu of continuing the present authorization of "such sums as may be necessary".

Paragraph (B) changes the apportionment of the bridge replacement and rehabilitation authorizations by (1) increasing the set-aside for discretionary bridges from $200 million annually to $250 million annually for fiscal years 1987 through 1990, and (2) modifying the formula to apportion funds on the basis of cost estimates for only primary system bridges (excluding the Interstate). The current 10-percent maximum and one-quarter percent minimum for an individual State's share of total apportionment is maintained.

Paragraph (C) provides for the apportionment of 75 percent of the Interstate substitution authorization based on the relative share of unfunded withdrawal value. Both transit and highway substitutes would be funded from the Highway Trust Fund authorization.

Paragraphs (D) and (E) provide for apportionment of railway-highway crossings and hazard elimination authorizations as in current law.

Paragraph (d)(2) provides for the allocation of bridge discretionary and Interstate substitution discretionary funds. The criteria for bridge discretionary funds remain essentially unchanged from current law. Only high-cost primary system bridges are to be considered. Bridge discretionary funds will be allocated under the provisions of 23 CFR 650, Subpart D, as provided in section 161 of the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982. (A conforming amendment has been incorporated to make eligible for further discretionary funding high-cost nonprimary system bridges that have already received partial funding under the previous bridge replacement and rehabilitation program.) Twenty-five percent of Interstate substitution program funds will be allocated at the discretion of the Secretary.

Subsection (e) provides for a minimum apportionment (previously known as minimum allocation). The provision is established permanently with funds to be made available the first day of each fiscal year. The minimum apportionment may not exceed $250 million per fiscal year. The calculation is to be based on a comparison of (1) a State's percentage share of that year's apportionments including apportionments from the Highway and Transit Block Grant but excluding the minimum apportionment from the Highway Account of the Highway Trust Fund, and (2) the percentage share of the estimated tax payments to the Highway Account of the Highway Trust Fund attributable to highway users in that State in the latest fiscal year for which data is available. Paragraph (e)(2) provides that the minimum apportionment will be eligible for highway construction on any public road as defined in 23 U.S.C. 101. Applicable program requirements and Federal share correspond to the system on which used. The provisions of Chapter 1 applicable to primary system projects apply to off-system projects except that highway and transit block grant procedures under Chapter 5 of title 23 may be used to the extent determined appropriate by the Secretary. A minimum State match of 25 percent reimbursed according to Federal-aid procedures is provided for off-system projects.

Subsection (f) provides for 90-day advance notice of apportionments, when possible, as well as certification of apportionments on October 1 of each fiscal year.

Subsection (g) retains the right to transfer funds between the bridge replacement, hazard elimination, and railroad-highway crossings apportionments.

Section 106—Advance acquisition of rights-of-way

This section provides for interest on advances made for the purchase of rights-of-way, except purchases for Interstate construction projects.

Section 107—Agreements relating to use of rights-of-way

This section amends 23 U.S.C. 111 to enable deliveries on Interstate right-of-way of duty free store merchandise to motor vehicle occupants at U.S. border crossings. The provision is limited to facilitating U.S. Customs Service supervision of exports and the exception to provisions prohibiting commercial establishments on Interstate right-of-way applies only when such deliveries will not impair the full use and safety of the highways.

Section 108—Letting of contracts

This section amends 23 U.S.C. 112(b) to permit the Secretary to waive competitive bidding on a construction contract where an emergency situation exists.

Section 109—Construction

This section makes conforming and technical amendments to 23 U.S.C. 114 and provides for inspection of Federal-aid projects as prescribed by the Secretary. Previous provisions required a final inspection on every Federal-aid project.

Section 110—Maintenance

This section combines the provisions of sections 109(m) and 119(b) of title 23, United States Code, and places them in section 116 of title 23. Provisions that require a reduction of a State's Interstate apportionments by 10 percent for failure to maintain the Interstate System adequately are changed to permit a reduction of not more than 10 percent of a State's Interstate-primary apportionment at the discretion of the Secretary.

Section 111—Eligibility

This section makes payments of State or local taxes which are levied on materials to be incorporated into a Federal-aid highway project or which are based upon the value of a Federal-aid highway construction contract ineligible for Federal-aid reimbursement.

This section also excludes participation in any costs caused by State Davis-Bacon rates that are higher than the Federal Davis-Bacon rates. This Department already has such authority. The Davis-Bacon amendments are proposed to expressly and clearly state existing authority.

Section 112—Availability

This section consolidates provisions concerning availability in section 118 of title 23. The following identifies changes from current law. References are to 23 U.S.C. 118, as amended.

Paragraph (b)(1) provides 4-year availability for the Interstate-primary program, with any unobligated funds lapsing at the end of the period.

Paragraph (b)(2) clarifies the availability of bridge replacement and rehabilitation funds. Apportioned funds remain available for obligation in a State for 4 years with unobligated funds reallocated as bridge discretionary funds. Bridge discretionary funds remain available for obligation in a State during the year of allocation with unused authority available to the Secretary for further reallocation.

Paragraph (b)(3) clarifies Interstate substitution availability, making both apportioned and allocated funds available for obligation in a State for two years. Unobligated funds shall be reapportioned or reallocated.

Paragraph (b)(4) establishes an availability period for minimum apportionment funds. The funds remain available for obligation for 4 years with any unobligated funds lapsing at the end of the period.

Paragraph (b)(5) continues the current 3 year availability period for highway emergency relief funds.

Section 113—Federal share payable

This section revises section 120 of title 23, United States Code, by consolidating Federal share provisions corresponding to program changes and removing archaic provisions. The significant changes follow. (Unless otherwise noted, the references that follow pertain to 23 U.S.C. 120, as amended.) In each instance, permissive language is used to specify a maximum Federal share rather than a fixed percentage. The objective is to permit States to request a Federal matching share less than the maximum amount shown in title 23 and to permit adjustment in the matching ratio not to exceed the maximum specified rate.

Subsection (a) provides for a Federal share for Interstate-primary funds used on the primary system (other than the Interstate) and for bridge replacement and rehabilitation funds of not to exceed 75 percent of the cost of construction. These percentages may be increased under the sliding scale provisions of current law. Previously, the Federal share for bridge projects was contained in 23 U.S.C. 144 and fixed at 80 percent.

Subsection (b) provides that Interstate projects will have a Federal share of not to exceed 90 percent. Routes designated as Interstate under section 139(a) and 139(b) of title 23 prior to March 9, 1984, and under 23 U.S.C. 139(c) will be able to be improved at a 90-percent Federal share. These percentages may be increased in certain circumstances under current law.

Subsection (c) provides a maximum Federal share of 85 percent for Interstate substitution projects. The increased share of 100 percent for traffic control signalization substitution projects has been deleted.

Subsection (e) limits the Federal share for emergency relief (ER) projects to the normal rate for a project on a system. The Federal share may be increased based on sliding scale rates. ER Federal lands highway projects may be 100 percent regardless of their location on a Federal-aid system.

Subsection (i) retains a maximum Federal share of 90 percent for the safety construction categories. The special increased shares of up to 100 percent for projects financed from system funds for traffic control signalization, pavement marking, and commuter carpooling and vanpooling have been eliminated. Rail-highway crossing projects financed with system funds will continue to be eligible for 100-percent funding.

Subsection (k) reiterates the intent of a maximum Federal share as described above.

Section 114—Relocation of utility facilities

This section amends section 123(a) of title 23, United States Code, to clarify that Federal-aid highway funds may participate in utility relocation payments legally made by a State not only for utility relocations necessitated by the actual construction of a highway project but also for safety improvements under a State's safety improvement program.

This section also eliminates the requirement in existing section 123(a) that limits Federal reimbursement to only those utility relocation payments made by a State with its own funds. This would establish consistency with the overall Federal-aid program by allowing the State to obtain all or portions of its pro-rata share of the costs for the utility work from other parties, such as the utilities or political subdivisions, if it so desires.

Section 115—Emergency relief

This section amends section 125 of title 23, United States Code, to remove archaic provisions and to transfer authorization provisions and availability provisions to more appropriate settings. The territories are made eligible for emergency relief with a $5 million cap on obligations in the territories during any one fiscal year.

Section 116—Vehicle weight limitations—Interstate System

This section amends 23 U.S.C. 127(a) to provide for the withholding of Federal-aid Interstate-primary program funds, in lieu of withholding Interstate construction funds, for violations of 23 U.S.C. 127. The change is needed as Interstate construction funds will be unavailable to withhold. The current penalty provision in section 127(a) is revised to provide that any withheld funds do not lapse if they are subsequently released and obligated within the normal 4 year availability period.

Section 117—Toll roads, bridges, tunnels and ferries

This section modifies 23 U.S.C. 129 to permit the construction of "new toll highways." At present, section 129 applies only to bridges and tunnels. The new highway must be on a new location and may be converted to a toll facility at any time prior to its completion and opening to traffic. The conversion of such a new highway to a toll facility would be allowed even if Federal funds had previously participated in earlier phases of project development. Existing free highways previously constructed with Federal-aid highway funds may not be converted to toll roads. Revenues from tolls would be used for maintenance, operation, debt service, and necessary 4R before diversion to highway construction on any public road. Tolls may be kept on in perpetuity if the State agrees to apply any excess revenues beyond the funds needed for maintenance, operation, debt service, and necessary resurfacing, reconstruction, rehabilitation, and restoration for highway construction projects on any public road. After execution of an agreement under section 129 concerning a new toll highway, the highway will be eligible to use available Federal funds for 4R work. Alternatively, the State may execute an agreement to free the toll road when final payment is made on outstanding bonds.

This section also provides eligibility for Federal fundng of 4R activities on existing toll highways, bridges, and tunnels subject to the conditions outlined in the preceding paragraph.

This section also contains provisions concerning the use of Federal-aid funds to construct approaches to Interstate and Federal-aid primary toll facilities and concerning ferryboats.

Section 118—Railway-highway crossings

This section amends section 130 of title 23, United States Code, to add the provisions of section 203 of the Highway Safety Act of 1973 to title 23, United States Code. References that follow are to 23 U.S.C. 130, as amended.

Subsection (a) provides that Federal-aid Interstate-primary program funds apportioned under section 104 of title 23 may be used to pay for the entire cost of construction of projects for the elimination of hazards at railway-highway crossings (including relocation of a portion of a railway if determined to be less costly than other alternate methods) except as provided in section 120 of title 23.

Subsection (d) requires that States conduct and systematically maintain a survey of all railway-highway crossings and establish and implement projects for their separation, relocation, or protection. At a minimum, adequate signing would be provided for all crossings.

Subsection (e) provides that funds authorized to be appropriated to carry out this section may be used for projects to eliminate the hazards at railway-highway crossings on any public road and are to be available for obligation in the same manner as Federal-aid Interstate-primary program funds. At least half of the funds authorized and expended for this section are to be used for the installation of protective devices at railway-highway crossings.

The amendments also retain provisions of 23 U.S.C. 130 pertaining to railroads share of project cost. An unused provision of 23 U.S.C. 130 concerning the local matching share is deleted and a report to the Congress is deleted.

Section 119—Highway Beautification

This section amends 23 U.S.C. 131 as follows:

Section 131(a). This subsection retains the purposes of existing subsection 131(a) that outdoor advertising, signs, displays and devices be controlled in order to protect the public investment in highways, promote safety and recreational value of public travel and to preserve natural beauty.

Section 131(b). This subsection continues the requirement for the States and Federal agencies to effectively control both the erection and maintenance of signs but reduces the scope of the outdoor advertising program in existing subsection 131(b) from the entire Interstate and primary highway systems to only the rural areas of the primary and Interstate systems. The term, "rural areas", is defined in 23 U.S.C. § 101 as "all areas of the State not included in urban areas." The term, "urban areas", is also defined in § 101 to include at a minimum both urbanized areas (areas with a population of 50,000 or more) and urban places having a population of 5,000 or more as designated by the Bureau of the Census. This change generally means that, except where Bonus controls continue to apply, areas with a population of 5,000 or more will be excluded from Federal control requirements. The 10 percent penalty provision in existing 131(b) has been amended as set forth in 131(j). The Secretary is given broad discretion to obtain compliance with any provision of section 131.

Subsection 131(c)(1) continues to allow directional and official signs that conform to standards issued by the Secretary. The phrase "and notices" has been deleted to eliminate confusion. "Notices" have never been different than "signs, displays or devices."

Subsection 131(c)(2) retains for sale or lease signs allowed under the prior law.

New subsection 131(c)(3) continues to allow on-premise signs, including electronic signs. The agency practice of limiting on-premise signs to the proximate area of the activity advertised regardless of any larger ownership interest in the property on which the activity is located has been included in the statute to curb abuses under the existing law.

Subsection 131(c)(4) retains landmark signs allowed under the prior law.

Subsection 131(c)(5) adds an actual use requirement for signs within zoned or unzoned commercial and industrial (C&I) areas and eliminates the existing size, lighting, and spacing restrictions. It requires States to develop statewide actual use criteria prior to allowing signs in such areas.

Subsection 131(c)(6) adds a new exempt category to provide for tourist-oriented directional signs at specific areas approved by the State or Federal agency. The State or Federal agency must control these signs with a permit process after providing for the removal of nonconforming signs equal in number to the number of signs for which it seeks permits under this subsection.

Section 131(d). This subsection continues to allow the voluntary logo program within the highway rights-of-way along both the Interstate and primary systems that is allowed by subsection 131(f) of the existing law. A provision has been added to make it clear that Federal agencies as well as States may erect logo signs.

Section 131(e). This subsection continues to allow the establishment of traveler information centers within safety rest areas along the Interstate and primary systems that is allowd by subsection 131(l) of the existing law. A provision has been added to make it clear that Federal agencies as well as States may establish information centers.

Section 131(f). This subsection requires the removal of lawfully erected and maintained nonconforming signs from the rural Interstate system within 5 calendar years from the enactment of the Federal law or the date the signs become nonconforming, whichever is later. This provision sets a 5-year maximum time limit on the period that States or Federal agencies may allow a sign to remain in place after the time it becomes nonconforming. The 5-year provision is not a grandfather provision that requires States or Federal agencies to allow nonconforming signs to stay in place.

This subsection recognizes that there will be signs that are nonconforming on the date the Federal law is enacted and others that will become nonconforming later, for example, as a result of zoning changes or the enactment of stricter State or local laws. Signs that do not conform to the Federal law on the date of its enactment, must be removed within 5 years of its enactment. Signs that only become nonconforming with the Federal or State laws after the enactment of this section must be removed within 5 years of the date they became nonconforming.

Removal is only required along the rural Interstate System, whereas the States and Federal agencies are required by new subsection 131(b) to control erection and maintenance of signs on both the rural Interstate and primary systems.

Removal may be effected by whatever means is available under State law, including amortization. The Federal requirement in existing subsection 131(g) that States pay just compensation has been eliminated; however, for States that choose to continue to pay just compensation, Federal participation in such cost is authorized in subsection 131(h). The just compensation requirement is existing subsection 131(g) has been eliminated along with the provision in 131(h) that signs may not be removed unless the Federal share is available.

The payment of cash compensation is made optional. Where State law requires the payment of cash compensation, new section 131(k) allows States to elect to use their Interstate-primary program funds to pay compensation.

The 5-year period that nonconforming signs may be allowed to remain is only available so long as the sign maintains its nonconforming status. Signs that lose their nonconforming status and become illegal, must be removed immediately by the States. A nonconforming sign could lose its nonconforming status and become illegal under States law for a variety of reasons, such as enlargement of failure to keep permits or leases current.

Section 131(g). This subsection retains the provision in existing subsection 131(k) which permits States to impose stricter controls than required by Federal law. A provision has been added to make clear that Federal agencies may also impose stricter controls on lands within their jurisdiction.

Section 131(h). This subsection amends existing subsection 131(h) to clarify the responsibility for control of outdoor advertising in accordance with this section on Federal lands and reservations, including Indian lands and reservations. The control responsibility shall be with the Federal agency having jurisdiction over such lands or reservations. It requires the respective Federal agencies to promulgate procedures implementing this section within one year of the date of enactment of this subsection. Federal-aid highway funds will not be available for control or acquisition on such lands.

Section 131(i). This subsection continues the bonus controls on the Interstate System in existing section 131(j) for those States that are in the bonus program, but it would eliminate future bonus payments. In addition, it requires any State that fails to comply with the bonus agreement to return all payments received under the program.

Section 131(j) amends existing 131(b) to make the Secretary's enforcement authority broader and more flexible. The 10 percent penalty provision in 131(b) is replaced by discretion to withhold approvals under any section of title 23, United States Code, or to take such action as may be necessary to obtain compliance with section 131. By using the term "may" instead of "shall", this subsection clarifies that the Secretary's enforcement authority is discretionary.

Section 131(k). This subsection provides that the States, with the approval of the Secretary, may use Interstate-primary program funds for costs the States incur for (1) physically removing illegal or nonconforming signs and (2) acquiring nonconforming signs. The Federal share shall be the same as for Interstate-primary program funds used for other purposes. This subsection authorizes Federal participation in the payment of cash compensation to sign owners or landowners for their property interests in nonconforming signs in instances where the States choose to pay cash compensation rather than use amortization to remove nonconforming signs. Federal funds may only participate in the costs incurred by the States to achieve compliance with the requirements of 23 U.S.C. section 131. Federal funds may not participate in State costs incurred for removals that result from stricter State laws or for costs incurred for the acquisition of illegal signs or signs which are legal under State laws that are not in compliance with this section.

This section also amends 23 U.S.C. 136 as follows:

Section 136(a). This section retains the purposes of existing subsection 136(a) but amends that section to reflect the reduction on the scope of the junkyard control program in new subsection 136(b) from the entire Federal-aid primary and Interstate systems to only the rural areas of those systems.

Section 136(b). This subsection continues the requirement that States and Federal agencies effectively control junkyards that are within one thousand feet of the nearest edge of the right-of-way and visible from the main traveled way, but reduces the scope of the junkyard control program in existing subsection 136(b) from the entire primary and Interstate highway systems to only the rural sections of the primary and Interstate systems. The 10 percent penalty provision in existing subsection 136(b) is amended as set forth in subsection 136(g). In lieu of the 10 percent penalty, the Secretary is given broad discretion to obtain compliance with any provision in section 136.

Section 136(c). This subsection contains the definitions of "effectively control", "junkyard", and "junk", formerly in existing subsections (c), (f), and (d), respectively, of section 136. Only the definition of "effective control" is changed. The term "effectively control" retains the requirement that the establishment of new junkyards or the expansion of existing is prohibited if they are not screened. Each State would be required to define "screened". Federal agency requirements will be developed pursuant to subsection 136(f). The new definition imposes an actual use requirement for junkyards within industral areas, whether zoned or unzoned, and requires the States to develop statewide criteria defining "industrial area" prior to allowing any junkyard to remain unscreened.

Section 136(d). This subsection requires the removal or screening of lawfully erected and maintained nonconforming junkyards from the rural Interstate System within 5 calendar years from the enactment of the Federal law or the date the junkyards become nonconforming, whichever is later. This subsection retains the existing 1,000 foot control zone. This subsection sets a 5-year maximum time limit on the period the States or Federal agencies may allow a junkyard to remain in place without screening after the time it becomes nonconforming. The 5-year provision is not a grandfather provision that requires States or Federal agencies to allow nonconforming junkyards to stay in place.

This subsection recognizes that there will be junkyards that are nonconforming on the date the Federal law is enacted and others that will become nonconforming later, for example, as a result of zoning changes or the enactment of stricter State or local laws. Junkyards that do not conform to the Federal law on the date of its enactment, must be removed or screened within 5 years of its enactment. Junkyards that only become nonconforming with the Federal or State laws after the enactment of this section must be removed or screened with in 5 years of the date they became nonconforming.

Removal or screening is only required along the rural Interstate System, whereas the States and Federal agencies are required by new subsection 131(b) to control establishment and maintenance of junkyards on both the rural Interstate and primary systems. Removal or screening is not prohibited on the primary system.

Removal or screening may be effected by whatever means are available under State law, including amortization. The just compensation requirement in existing subsection 136(j) has been eliminated.

The payment of compensation is made optional. Where State law requires the payment of cash compensation, new section 131(h) allows States to elect to use their Interstate-primary program funds to pay compensation.

The 5-year period that nonconforming junkyards may be allowed to remain is only available so long as the junkyards maintains its nonconforming status. Junkyards that lost their nonconforming status and become illegal must be removed immediately by the States. A nonconforming junkyards could lose its nonconforming status and become illegal under State law for a variety of reasons, such as enlargement or failure to keep permits or leases.

Section 136(e). This subsection retains the provision in existing subsection 136(l) which allows States and Federal agencies to impose stricter controls than required by Federal law.

Section 136(f). This subsection amends existing subsection 136(k) to clarify the responsibility for control of junkyards on Federal lands and reservations, including Indian lands and reservations. The control responsibility shall be with the Federal agency having jurisdiction over such lands or reservations. It requires the respective Federal agencies to promulgate procedures implementing this section within 1 year of the date of enactment of this subsection. Federal-aid highway funds will not be available for screening or removal on such lands.

Section 136(g) amends existing 136(b) to make the Secretary's enforcement authority broader and more flexible. The 10 percent penalty provision in 136(b) is replaced by discretion to withhold approvals under any section of title 23, United States Code, or to take action as may be necessary to obtain compliance with section 136. By using the term "may" instead of "shall", this section clarifies that the Secretary's enforcement authority is discretionary.

Section 136(h). This subsection provides that the States may use Interstate-primary program funds for costs the States incur for screening or removing nonconforming junkyards. The Federal share shall be the same as for Interstate-primary program funds used for other purposes. Federal funds may only participate in the costs incurred by the States to achieve compliance with the requirements of 23 U.S.C. section 136. Federal funds may not participate in State costs incurred from screening or removals that result from stricter State laws or for costs incurred for screening or removing illegal junkyards.

Subsection (c) of this section authorizes payment of bonus claims that are submitted by States before October 1, 1986. No bonus payments are authorized for claims submitted after the effective date of this Act.

Subsection (d) of this section withdraws all authorizations and appropriations for all unexpended funds except those on which a State has acted in detrimental reliance. In many instances, States have "obligated" Federal funds by programming projects to be accomplished at some unspecified date in the future. This section would withdraw all outstanding authorizations and appropriations except in those instances in which the States, prior to enactment of the section, have expended State funds or have become contractually obligated to expend State funds for which they would have been entitled to Federal reimbursement prior to enactment of the section. This section eliminates, through rescission or expenditure, all general fund monies available for the program. All future funding for the program would come from the Highway Account of the Highway Trust Fund.

Subsection (e) of this section requires that the States be in compliance with 23 U.S.C. 131 and 136, as amended, no later than the end of the first regular legislative session in each State that convenes after the date of enactment of this section.

Section 120—Strategic Highway Research Program (SHRP)

This section adds a provision for SHRP to title 23, United States Code. The SHRP will be funded by deducting ¼ of 1 percent from funds authorized for the programs specified in subsections 104(c) and 501(a)(1) of title 23, United States Code. The Secretary will carry out the SHRP in cooperation with State highway departments and will set standards for the use of the funds to conduct research, development and technology transfer activities determined to be strategically important to the national highway transportation system. The Secretary may provide grants to and enter into compensation agreements with the American Association of State Highway Transportation Officials and/or the National Academy of Science to conduct appropriate portions of SHRP. Advance payments may be made under such agreements. No State matching share is required for the SHRP and the funds will remain available for 4 years.

Section 121—Transportation planning in certain urban areas

Section 134 of title 23, United States Code, provides that all levels of government—Federal, State and local—engage in a continuing, cooperative, and comprehensive (3C) process of planning transportation factilities in urban areas of more than 50,000 population.

This section would amend section 134 by raising the population threshold for urbanized areas that are required to have a 3C process from that of more than 50,000 to 200,000 or more. Urbanized areas with population between 50,000 and 200,000 would not be required to follow federally prescribed planning requirements.

Section 134 is further amended to delete certain factors from consideration in carrying out the 3C process and provides the Secretary with greater flexibility in ensuring that the provisions of this section are met.

These amendments are made in concert with those proposed in section 106, amending section 104(f) of title 23, United States Code. Nothing in these amendments is intended to preclude State and local officials from continuing their planning process or a metropolitan planning organization, or both, in urbanized areas with population between 50,000 and 200,000 if they so desire.

Sections (b)(1) and (c) from the existing section 134 are no longer needed and are eliminated.

Section 122—Skill training

This section makes technical amendments to 23 U.S.C. 140, reduces the skill training program in 23 U.S.C. 140(b) from $10,000,000 per fiscal year to $2,500,000 per fiscal year for the fiscal years 1987 and 1988 and repeals the skill training program effective October 1, 1988.

Section 123—Highway Bridge Replacement and Rehabilitation Program

The Highway Bridge Replacement and Rehabilitation Program remains essentially the same, except for restructuring to agree with the other provisions of this Act. The inventory of all highway bridges on public roads is required with a current inventory of all bridges to be maintained by the State. Section 144(d), which replaces section 144(h), adds a new criterion that will allow both tidal and nontidal navigable waterways to be exempt from the requirements for a Coast Guard Permit if the waterways are not used by small craft 26 feet or greater in length. In this context, "use" is meant to mean regular or seasonal use as compared with occasional use. The off-system bridge program is deleted to become a part of the highway and transit block grant. The requirement for an annual bridge report to the Congress is repealed.

Section 124—Federal-Aid Interstate-Primary Program

This section amends section 146 of title 23 to establish the Federal-Aid Interstate-Primary Program. The Interstate-primary program will stress bringing all elements of the primary system to acceptable standards of operation and safety. The program will consist of both new construction and 4R work on the primary system and the Interstate System (including additions thereto under section 139). As such, the Interstate-primary program will include traditional primary program projects, Interstate construction projects, and Interstate resurfacing, restoration, rehabilitation and reconstruction projects.

The designated Interstate System in all the States will command priority attention in maintaining its high level of serviceability. At the same time, there is sufficient flexibility to allow States to concentrate on neglected primary routes and other primary routes which have developed into significant interstate traffic carriers.

Section 125—Federal Lands Highways Program

Subsection (a) amends 23 U.S.C. 202(a) to provide a formula for the allocation of forest highways funds.

Subsection (b) amends 23 U.S.C. 203 to clarify the point of obligation and to strike outdated references to forest development roads and trails and public lands development roads and trails.

Subsection (c) amends 23 U.S.C. 204(a) to include planning, research, design and construction as eligible activities under the Federal lands highways program.

Subsection (d) gives the Secretary of Transportation added authority over park roads and parkways and Indian reservation roads.

Section 126—Territorial Highway Program

This section amends subsection (c) of section 215 of title 23 to return the Territorial Highway Program to its status prior to passage of the 1982 STAA except that (1) territorial highway funds will continue to come from the Highway Account of the Highway Trust Fund rather than the general fund and (2) the program will remain a contract authority program rather than revert to a budget authority program.

Subsection (f) of section 215 is amended to clarify that the provisions of Chapter 1 of title 23 which are applicable to Interstate-primary program funds and the primary system are applicable to the Territorial Highway Program. It also authorizes a Federal-aid system in each territory similar to the primary system established by the provisions of the 1982 STAA and provides that the Secretary may determine the applicability of the provisions of Chapter 1.

Section 127—Research and planning

This section amends section 307(c) of title 23, United States Code. Subsection 307(c)(1), as amended, requires that not less than 1½ percent of the sums apportioned each fiscal year to any State for the Federal-aid Interstate-primary program and the bridge replacement and rehabilitation program are to be used for highway planning and research activities. The list of activities specifically eligible to be funded under section 307(c) has been expanded to include technology transfer activities. The optional one-half percent planning funds takedown provided by former subsection 307(c)(3) of title 23, United States Code, has been eliminated.

Section 128—National Highway Institute

This section modifies 23 U.S.C. 321 to direct the Secretary to provide training at no cost to States and local governments for subject areas which are a Federal program responsibility and to allow the States to use Federal-aid funds to pay 75 percent of the cost of education and training purchased from any source including the National Highway Institute.

Section 129—Donations

This section permits the State matching share to be credited by the value of cash or land donations under some circumstances. This section also provides a mechanism to allow States to accept gifts of land at early project stages. The section provides procedural safeguards to insure that early donations do not prejudice the full assessment of alternatives required by such laws as the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969, as amended.

Section 130—Prohibition against disclosure and admission as evidence of State reports and surveys

This section would amend title 23, United States Code, to provide that no report, survey, schedule, list, or data compiled for the purpose of complying with any requirement of sections 130, 144, 152, and 402 of title 23, United States Code, or for developing any highway safety improvement project which may be implemented with Federal-aid highway funds shall be required to be made available under section 552 of title 5, United States Code (Freedom of Information Act), or admitted into evidence or used in any action for damages arising from matters mentioned or addressed in such documents.

Section 131—Regulation of tolls

This section amends various Federal statutes to eliminate the authority of the Federal Highway Administrator to regulate the rate of tolls on bridges by determining the reasonableness of those tolls. States and toll authorities would be given greater flexibility in operating toll facilities. This Federal oversight of the reasonableness of tolls has proven to be administratively burdensome, legally unproductive, and has interjected the Federal Government in the role of a mediator in disputes which could more appropriately be settled at the State and local level.

Section 132—Interstate System withdrawals

This section provides for the repeal of section 107(e) of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1978 which provided the September 30, 1986 deadline for commencing construction on all Interstate segments and on all substitute projects if sufficient Federal funds are available. The deadline has been met on all Interstate segments and elimination of the deadline will permit the more orderly development of substitute projects.

The section is effective on date of enactment and, therefore, a provision allowing withdrawal of routes which were under injunction at the time of the 1978 STAA until September 30, 1986, has been provided consistent with the intent of current law.

Section 133—Buy America

This section repeals the Buy American provision applicable to Department of Transportation programs.

Section 134—Contract authority

This section provides contract authority for the Motor Carrier Safety Grants program and permits the Secretary to make grants for periods of over one fiscal year.

Section 135—Interim amendments

Subsection (a) provides that unobligated Interstate construction balances (apportioned or allocated) shall remain available until October 1, 1990, for Interstate construction projects. Unallocated Interstate discretionary funds are to be distributed using current procedures.

Subsection (b) makes the unobligated balances previously apportioned to a State under subsections 104(b)(1) (primary system program) and 104(b)(5)(B) (Interstate-4R program) of title 23, United States Code, as they existed prior to enactment of this legislation available for obligation for projects under section 146 (Federal-aid Interstate-primary program) of title 23, United States Code, as amended by this bill.

Subsection (c) provides that unobligated balances under the Federal-aid secondary and urban programs shall be used for highway construction projects on any public road.

Subsection (d) provides that unobligated balances previously apportioned to a State for bridge replacement and rehabilitation will be available for obligation under section 144 of title 23, United States Code.

Subsection (e) provides that off-system bridges, including bridges previously on the urban or secondary systems that were partially funded before October 1, 1986, under the discretionary bridge replacement and rehabilitation provisions of title 23 will be eligible for discretionary funds under section 104(d)(2)(B) of title 23, United States Code.

Subsection (f) permits the Secretary, upon request of a State, to void an agreement entered into prior to October 1, 1986, pursuant to section 129 of title 23, United States Code, or section 105 of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1978 if the State enters into a new agreement pursuant to section 129 of title 23, as amended by this bill.

Subsection (g) makes the unobligated balances of funds apportioned to the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands under the provisions of section 108 of the Highway Improvement Act of 1982 available for obligation under the provisions of section 215 of title 23, United States Code.

Subsection (h) makes the unobligated balances of funds apportioned to a State under section 203 of the Highway Safety Act of 1973 available for projects under section 130 of title 23, United States Code.

Subsection (i) provides for the continued availability of unobligated emergency relief funds.

Section 136—Technical and conforming amendments

Paragraph (a)(1) makes conforming amendments by amending the tables of Sections for chapters 1, 2, 3, and 4 to conform to the changes made by this bill.

Paragraph (a)(2) strikes references to the urban and secondary systems and other dated and unnecessary language. It also clarifies the definition of "park road" in section 101(a) of title 23, United States Code.

Paragraph (a)(3) amends section 105 of title 23, United States Code, to conform to changes made to other sections of title 23, United States Code, by this bill.

Paragraph (a)(4) amends section 106 of title 23 United States Code, by increasing the maximum allowable amount for construction engineering from 10 to 15 percent and making conforming amendments.

Paragraph (a)(5) revises paragraph 107(a)(2) of title 23, United States Code, to make a conforming amendment.

Paragraph (a)(6) repeals subsection 109 (c) and (m) of title 23, United States Code, and makes conforming amendments. Subsection 109(c) is unnecessary since the secondary system is being eliminated. The requirements of 109(m) are being incorporated into section 116 of title 23. Section 109 is relettered to conform to the change made by this bill.

Paragraph (a)(7) repeals subsection 112(e) of title 23, United States Code. Subsection 112(e) pertains to the secondary system which is being eliminated by this bill.

Paragraph (a)(8) makes conforming amendments (eliminates reference to the secondary and urban systems) to section 113 of title 23, United States Code, and corrects an incorrect reference to title 40 of the United States Code.

Paragraph (a)(9) makes conforming amendments to section 115 of title 23, United States Code. All apportionments and allocations of funds for programs on which advance construction is permitted are now made under section 104 of title 23.

Paragraph (a)(10) makes conforming amendments to section 116 of title 23, United States Code by eliminating the reference to the secondary system.

Paragraphs (a)(11) and (12) make conforming amendments by repealing sections 117 (Certificate Acceptance) and 119 (Interstate System resurfacing) of title 23, United States Code. Certification Acceptance is being repealed as the Federal-aid highway program will be limited to programs of major Federal interest. It is appropriate for FHWA to be involved at all stages. The Interstate construction, Interstate 4R and primary programs are being merged to give the States greater flexibility. The combined program is covered in section 146 of title 23.

Paragraph (a)(13) makes an amendment to section 121 of title 23, United States Code, by raising the limitation for construction engineering from 10 percent to 15 percent.

Paragraph (a)(14) amends section 122 of title 23, United States Code, to include repayment of bonds used for Interstate substitute projects.

Paragraph (a)(15) makes a conforming amendment to subsection 124(b) of title 23, United States Code. Reference to the Interstate withdrawal substitution provisions is eliminated since the deadline for such actions will have passed by the effective date of the bill.

Paragraphs (a)(16), (18), and (19) repeal sections 126 (Diversion), 135 (Traffic operations improvement programs), and 137 (Fringe and Corridor Parking facilities) of title 23, United States Code. Section 126 contains outdated language that is no longer meaningful since current State funding for highway programs far exceeds the level of revenues for State user taxes on June 18, 1934. Special funding for the TOPICS program has not been provided for a number of years. TOPICS type improvements are eligible for regular Federal-aid funds under the definition of construction in section 101 of title 23. Fringe and Corridor parking facilities no longer warrant special emphasis; they continue to be eligible for Interstate-primary program funds under the definition of construction in section 101 of title 23.

Paragraphs (a) (17), (20), and (21) make clarifying and conforming amendments to sections 128, 139, and 141 of title 23, United States Code.

Paragraph (a)(22) makes conforming amendments to section 142 of title 23, United States Code.

Paragraphs (a)(23) through (a)(27) repeal sections 143 (Economic Growth Center Development Highways), 147 (Priority Primary Routes), 148 (Development of a National Scenic and Recreational Highway), 150 (Allocation of Urban System Funds), and 151 (Pavement Marking Demonstration Program) of title 23, United States Code. The programs under sections 143, 147, 148, and 151 no longer warrant special emphasis. The construction activities for these programs will continue to be eligible for Federal-aid funds under the definition of construction in section 101 of title 23. Section 151 is no longer needed since the urban system program is being eliminated. The guaranteed "pass-through" provision for urbanized areas over 200,000 population is incorporated into the highway and transit block grant. Any unobligated funds authorized for section 143 are rescinded. Unobligated balances of authorizations for section 147 shall remain available until October 1, 1987.

Paragraph (a)(28) makes conforming amendments to section 152 of title 23, United States Code.

Paragraph (a)(29) repeals subsection 154(c) of title 23, United States Code, which contains outdated language and makes conforming amendments to subsection 154(f) of title 23, United States Code.

Paragraphs (a) (30), (31), and (32) repeal sections 155 (Access highways to public recreation areas on certain lakes), 156 (Highways crossing Federal Projects), and 157 (Minimum Allocation) of title 23, United States Code. The programs under sections 155 and 156 no longer warrant special emphasis. The construction activities for these programs continue to be eligible for Federal-aid funds under the definition of construction in section 101 of title 23. Revised Minimum Allocation provisions are included in subsection 104(e) of title 23. Unobligated balances of authorizations for sections 155 and 156 shall remain available until October 1, 1987.

Paragraph (a)(33) makes conforming amendments to section 158 of title 23, United States Code.

Paragraph (a)(34) repeals section 201 (Authorizations) of title 23, United States Code which contains outdated language.

Paragraphs (a) (35) and (36) make conforming amendments to sections 204 and 210 of title 23, United States Code.

Paragraph (a)(37) repeals section 211 (Timber Access Road Hearings) of title 23, United States Code.

Paragraph (a)(38) repeals section 213 (Rama Road) of title 23, United States Code, and provides for the disposition of unobligated balances of authorizations for that section. This program has been inactive for a long time.

Paragraphs (a)(39) and (40) make conforming amendments to sections 215 (Territorial highway program) and 217 (Bicycle transportation and pedestrian walkway) of title 23, United States Code, and changes the Federal share payable for projects under section 217 from 100 percent Federal share to 75 percent Federal share. Bicycle transportation and pedestrian walkway projects no longer warrant special emphasis.

Paragraphs (a)(41) and (42) repeal sections 219 (Safer off-system roads) and 301 (Freedom from tolls) of title 23, United States Code. The safer off-system roads program is not a program of major Federal interest. The activities funded under this program will be eligible under the highway and transit block grant. Unobligated balances of authorizations for section 219 shall remain available until October 1, 1987. The substance of section 301 has been incorporated into section 129 of title 23.

Paragraphs (a)(43), (44) and (45) make conforming amendments to sections 302, 311, and 315 of title 23, United States Code.

Paragraph (a)(46) repeals section 322 (Demonstration Project-rail crossings) of title 23, United States Code. Unobligated balances of authorizations for section 322 shall remain available until October 1, 1987.

Paragraphs (a)(47), (48), and (49) make conforming amendments to sections 401, 402, and 406 of title 23, United States Code.

Paragraph (b)(1) repeals outstanding Interstate construction authorizations in section 108(b) of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956. The Interstate construction program is included in the Federal-aid Interstate-primary program in this Act.

Paragraph (b)(2) repeals section 163 of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1973 and provides that unobligated appropriations for that section shall remain available until expended.

Paragraph (b)(3) repeals section 203 of the Highway Safety Act of 1973. The major provisions of section 203 are codified in section 130 of title 23.

Paragraph (b)(4) repeals sections 118 and 119 of the Federal-Aid Highway Amendments of 1974 and provides that unobligated balances of authorizations for the sections shall remain available until October 1, 1987.

Paragraphs (b)(5), (6), (7), and (8) repeal section 146(c) of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1976, sections 105 and 141 of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1978, section 215 of the Highway Safety Act of 1978, and sections 105(d), 121(b) and 146 of the Highway Improvement Act of 1982. These sections contain provisions that are outdated, related to programs that no longer warrant special emphasis, not in conformance with the provisions of this bill, or are contrary to the objective of giving the States greater flexibility in the use of their funds. Unobligated balances of funds authorized or appropriated to carry out section 141 of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1978 are rescinded effective October 1, 1987.

Section 137—Union Station

This section will permit full realization of the United States' goals in a public works project of unique importance. In 1981, Congress enacted the "Union Station Redevelopment Act of 1981," to undertake the renewal and preservation of an important historic and architectural landmark at the north end of the Capitol grounds, Union Station. The 1981 Act has been effective to date in returning Union Station to its role as a safe, efficient, and useful commercial transportation terminal, with maximum reliance on the private sector and minimum requirement for Federal assistance.

Congress contemplated that the renewal of Union Station would require exercise of the United States' right to buy out the lease that had been signed in the 1970's with Union Station's owners. Indeed, a new section 113(b) added by the 1981 Act to the underlying Visitors Center legislation authorized purchase of Union Station by the DOT. The recent Development Agreement entered into by DOT contains a potential 99-year lease term that will require purchase to make the project commercially feasible.

Assuming purchase of Union Station occurs as a needed step in guiding Union Station preservation and development under the 1981 Act, further statutory authority is then needed to complete privatization of this project. Once the goals of an architecturally appropriate and commercially viable revitalization are achieved, it would be incongruous to retain a governmental ownership role in the Union Station complex. Federal ownership of commercial activities, ranging from retail sales to parking, is wholly unnecessary and contrary to the goals of the 1981 Act. Accordingly, this section would amend the 1981 Act to complete privatization.

Two assurances are needed to complete privatization. First, as a commercial matter, the selected developer has received a first-right-of-refusal so that an opportunity exists for ownership to be lodged in the party with the most significant interest in appropriate development. At the same time, a sale at full market value must be directed to assure that the United States is properly compensated for its interest, and that other bidders are not deprived of an opportunity to purchase in a deal favoring the developer. Second, it is imperative that the original goals of the 1981 Act, most importantly the historic preservation of the facility in a manner consistent with the Capitol grounds, be achieved and then that conveyance to the new owners of the property, located as it is at the north end of the historic Capitol grounds, be subject to appropriate protections of the public interest.

Section 138—Bridge construction

This section provides an amendment to eliminate the need for special legislation to amend prior acts of Congress in connection with the construction, reconstruction, maintenance, or operation of bridges authorized prior to August 2, 1946.

Section 139—Effective date

This section specifies that unless otherwise provided, the effective date of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1986 is October 1, 1986.

TITLE II: HIGHWAY SAFETY ACT OF 1986

Short title

This section provides that Title II may be cited as the "Highway Safety Act of 1986".

Section 202—Authorizations

This section contains two subsections. Subsection 1 would authorize appropriations of $110,000,000, out of the Highway Account of the Highway Trust Fund, for each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1987 through September 30, 1990, for the National Traffic Safety Administration to carry out section 402 State and Community Highway Safety Grant Programs under title 23, United States Code. This level of funding reflects the expiration of the special grants for computerized traffic recordkeeping systems and shows the Department's continued emphasis on effective highway safety programs. Since this provision does not continue the prior practice of earmarking 402 funds for various purposes, the States will have additional flexibility to use these funds to address their specific highway safety problem areas. This flexibility in the use of 402 funds will also enable the States to respond effectively to changes in the highway safety environment. At the same time, the Department will continue to monitor and advise the States with respect to their highway safety programs under this section through the annual approval process for section 402 State plans provided by section 402(b).

Subsection 2 would authorize appropriations of $31,000,000 per fiscal year for each of the fiscal years 1987 through 1990 out of the Highway Account of the Highway Trust Fund, for the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration to carry out the section 403 highway safety research and development activities under title 23, United States Code.

Section 203—Highway safety programs

This section contains four subsections. Subsection (a) would amend section 402 of title 23, United States Code, to replace the words "standards" and "standard" wherever they appear in the section with the words "guidelines" and "guideline," respectively. The purpose of this amendment is to conform the language of section 402 to the program as currently implemented, pursuant to the 1982 determinations of program effectiveness under section 402(j). As a result of the section 402(j) determinations, the existing 18 highway safety program standards have been maintained as non-binding guidelines for use by the States in their section 402 programs.

Subsection (b) of this section would strike out the last sentence of section 402(a) of title 23, United States Code, which authorizes the Secretary to amend or waive highway safety program standards on a temporary basis. This authority is unnecessary in view of the existing implementation of the section 402 program and its elimination is consistent with the amendment of section 402(a).

Subsection (c) of this section would strike out subparagraph (D) of section 402(b)(1) of title 23, United States Code, which prohibits the Secretary from approving a State's section 402 highway safety program if it does not provide for comprehensive driver training programs. The Department believes this restriction is no longer appropriate. A five-year study on driver education, conducted for the Department in DeKalb County, Georgia, evaluated the effect of driver education on 18,000 volunteer high school students. This study, which was released on August 7, 1984, found no evidence to support the assumption that significant highway safety benefits results from high school driver education courses. Accordingly, the Department no longer believes there is sufficient justification to support the statutory requirement that the Secretary must disapprove a State highway safety program plan when it does not provide for comprehensive driver training programs. The elimination of this restriction on the program approval process does not in any way affect a State's determination to continue such programs.

Subsection (d) of this section would amend section 402(j) of title 23, United States Code, to provide for a periodic review of the effectiveness of the various programs eligible for funding under section 402 in reducing accidents, injuries, and fatalities. Use of these funds would be limited to the programs found most effective. Such a periodic review of the highway safety programs is the best method to ensure the continued relevance of the section 402 program to changing circumstances and traffic safety needs, and to ensure that Federal funds continue to be used in as cost-effective a manner as possible. The first such review scheduled under this provision would begin on September 1, 1987, exactly five years after the initiation of the original section 402(j) review required by section 1107(d) of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 (P.L. 97-34).

Section 204—National highway safety advisory committee

This section would amend section 404 of title 23, United States Code, to provide various administrative, membership and organizational improvements in the operation of the National Highway Safety Advisory Committee. The existing responsibilities of the Committee would not be affected by this amendment.

The improvements provided by this section include: (1) reducing the membership from 35 to 25 to enhance the ability of the Committee to operate; (2) making the Secretary instead of the President responsible for membership appointments; (3) creating additional professional requirements for membership; and (4) eliminating the existing provision which gives the members compensation over and above payment for travel expenses.

Section 205—Splash and spray suppression devices

This section would amend section 2314(b) of title 49, United States Code, to incorporate certain criteria as preconditions to the issuance of a standard on splash and spray suppression devices. Since the enactment of the provision directing the Secretary to issue standards requiring the installation of splash and spray suppression devices on truck tractors, semitrailers and trailers (Sec. 414, Pub. L. 97-424), the Department has been attempting to develop a standard that would reduce the number of crashes resulting from drivers being blinded by splash and spray. A number of devices have been evaluated, some of which are capable of reducing splash and spray to a degree. However, it is the Department's belief that a standard should be issued only if it meets certain criteria. First, it should require devices that are capable of enhancing visibility to such a degree as to reduce crashes. Second, these devices should be practicable, both technologically and economically. Finally, the safety benefits should exceed the costs of installing and maintaining these devices.

TITLE III—THE MASS TRANSPORTATION CAPITAL ASSISTANCE AND REFORM ACT OF 1986

Section 301—Short title

This section provides that the title may be cited as the "Mass Transportation Capital Assistance Reform Act of 1986."

In order to reduce Federal involvement in programs that do not serve nationwide needs, to reduce Federal requirements, to expand local flexibility and decisionmaking and to increase competition and the role of private industry in the provision of transit services, the Administration is proposing a major change in the structure of the transit program. The Administration proposes to replace the current formula and discretionary transit programs for urbanized and rural areas with the highway and transit block grant program in Title IV of this bill. Under this program, funds could be used for either highway or transit projects, and this will encourage local decisionmaking by providing the States and localities with increased flexibility in the use of these funds. In particular, this flexibility will allow urbanized areas to better meet urban mobility needs. Moreover, provision for assurances necessary to meet the major Federal requirements will streamline the process.

The Administration believes that the private sector can play an increasingly important role in planning, financing, and providing transit services. Studies show that operation cost savings of 20 to 60 percent can be realized through competitively developed services. Accordingly, the bill includes provisions to implement a major policy initiative increasing the role of the private sector. These provisions include prohibiting use of federally-assisted equipment and facilities in charter service, ensuring private operator involvement in the transit planning process, requiring private transit operator representation on transit policy boards and requiring recipients to competitively bid (with both public and private operators eligible) a portion of their operations.

The block grant program in Title IV of the Mass Transit Account would be funded from certain highway programs as well as from the Mass Transit Account. The Mass Transit Account would have an annual authorization level of $1.22 billion through fiscal year 1990. As explained further below, certain amounts would be taken "off the top" of that annual authorization for the section 6 research program, sections 10, 11(a), and 20, the section 8 planning program, the section 16(b)(2) elderly and handicapped program, and for administrative expenses.

The remaining Mass Transit Account funds would be available to the States, with 88.43 percent of those funds passed through to unbanized areas with a population of 200,000 or more on the basis of the existing section 9A formula. This is the same percentage such areas get under the existing section 9 formula program. Officials of such areas would determine the appropriate use of those funds in accordance with the section 8 planning process. A certain amount of funds from the Highway Trust Fund also would be passed through to the States.

The Mass Transit Account and the Highway Trust Fund Program funds that would be passed through to each of the large urbanized areas would be fundible, that is, could be spent on either transit or highway projects within those areas. The Administration believes that urban mobility issues should be addressed at the local level, and that local officials in large urbanized areas should determine whether to make highway or transit investments based on local transportation needs rather than on the source of Federal funds.

The Transit Account funds not passed through to the large urbanized areas would be apportioned to the States using the same percentages applicable to small urbanized and rural areas under existing law—8.4 percent and 2.93, respectively. These funds would be apportioned on the basis of existing statutory formulas but could be spent anywhere in the State for eligible transit or highway projects. Similarly, the Highway Trust Funds not passed through to the large areas would be allocated to the States on the basis of existing formulas and would be eligible for highway or transit projects anywhere in a State. Thus, funds not attributable to large urbanized areas would be used for projects based on decisions made at the State level.

All highway and transit capital projects under the highway and transit block grant program would have a Federal share of 75 percent. Transit operating assistance projects in rural and small urban areas would have a maximum Federal share of 50 percent.

A number of assurances apply to the use of transit or highway funds under the highway and transit block grant program. These assurances require only a written statement that the requirements are being followed. Because the transit assurances are based on provisions of the UMT Act, and because the Administration proposes to make certain changes or additions to that Act, a number of the provisions discussed below, where noted, apply to the use of funds for transit projects under the highway and transit block grant program as well as to the use of any remaining carryover funds (in most cases) under the existing transit programs.

Section 302—Charter and school bus services

Section 3(f) of the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964, as amended ("the Act") currently provides that a recipient of Federal financial assistance for bus-related activities may not engage in charter bus service outside the urban area within which it provides regularly scheduled mass transportation services, except as provided in the recipient's agreement with the Secretary of Transportation. The agreement is meant to assure that the Federal financial assistance will not enable the recipient to foreclose private operators from the intercity charter bus industry where such private operators are willing and able to provide such service. The Administration supports the congressional directive to restrict federally subsidized public transit entities from entering markets that may be adequately served by the private sector, but believes that the existing section 3(f) does not provide adequate tools.

A statutory change in the burden of proof is needed to make clear, and more permanent, the Administration's commitment to expand the role of the private sector. This section would amend section 3(f) of the Act to provide that the State must provide written assurance that Federal operating assistance and federally-assisted facilities and equipment will not be used in charter bus operations. The Administration believes Federal funds should be used for public transportation but should not be used to compete unfairly with private business and thus cause the loss of private sector jobs.

This change would apply not only to projects funded under the UMT Act, but also to funds used for transit projects under the highway and transit block grant program in Title IV of this bill.

This section also amends section 3(g) of the UMT Act to provide that instead of the applicant entering into an agreement with the Secretary concerning school bus service, the State must provide written assurance that recipients will comply with the school bus requirements.

Section 303—Planning

Section 8 of the UMT Act provides that State and local levels of government engage in a continuing, cooperative, and comprehensive (3C) process of planning transportation facilities in urban areas of more than 50,000 in population and utilizing metropolitan planning organizations.

In light of the proposed highway and transit block grant program in Title IV of this bill, which would greatly streamline the funding delivery process and lessen red-tape requirements, this section would amend section 8 by raising the population threshold for urbanized areas that are required to have a 3C planning process from more than 50,000 to 200,000 or more. Urbanized areas with a population between 50,000 and 200,000 would not be required to follow federally prescribed planning requirements, although they could continue their planning process if they choose.

A new long-term financial plan would be required in urbanized areas over 200,000. This plan would estimate total costs and currently available revenues for needed regional transportation improvements and should provide a good basis for local officials to provide a better balance between costs and revenue sources in developing plans for transportation projects.

Section 304—Private enterprise

For private operators to achieve the maximum level of participation in the provision of mass transportation services, they must have an opportunity to participate at the earliest phase of the local planning process.

These amendments to section 8 are designed to maximize private enterprise input into service planning and decisionmaking. These amendments would apply to funds spent on transit projects under the proposed highway and transit block grant program in Title IV of this bill.

Section 305—Amendments to section 9

This section would amend section 9 and would apply to transit funds under the highway and transit block grant program in Title IV of this bill, as well as to the remaining carryover funds under the section 9 program. This section would amend section 9 to require a transit operator to have private mass transportation company representation on its policy board, to the extent feasible under State or local law.

"Associated capital maintenance items" would be redefined to include equipment, tires (including leasing of tires), materials, and supplies. This definition is drawn from section 15 and does not include fuel. This expanded eligibility would assist transit agencies in maintaining their capital equipment, without involving the Federal Government in subsidizing locally determined costs. Thus, it should meet the concerns of those who argued that capital maintenance would suffer if operating assistance were eliminated, while still preventing the use of Federal funds to subsidize labor costs and other costs that are determined locally.

Another activity that would be made eligible for funding would be public/private venture projects under section 3(a)(1)(D) of the Act. No funds could be used for the construction of commercial revenue producing facilities or those portions of public facilities not related to mass transit. This would increase local flexibility and enhance the potential for private sector participation in the development of mass transit projects. The Administration intends that proceeds from private investment in activities under this section would remain in the urbanized area where they are made to finance otherwise eligible transit activities, rather than being returned to UMTA. However, local areas would be encouraged to use local funds for these purposes before they used funds under this Act for the purposes of section 3(a)(1)(D). If a project funded under section 3 or 9 generates income because of air rights, the net income would have to be used for eligible transit projects.

Section 306—Competitively developed mass transportation services

This section would require competitively developed transit services under the proposed block grant program. Solid evidence from research reveals that operating savings from these services could range from 30 to 60 percent, thus saving hundreds of millions of dollars. There is no doubt that this infusion of competition into a monopolistic system will be very productive and beneficial. Subsection (a) would provide that in each of fiscal years 1987, 1988, 1989, and 1990, an amount of competitively developed mass transportation service or operations equivalent to a fixed percentage of the total operating cost of transit service in an urbanized or non-urbanized area in that particular fiscal year shall be available in each urbanized or non-urbanized area receiving any Federal transit assistance under the proposed block grant program. Competition for providing such services shall be open to any public or private mass transportation companies. The percentages would be five percent in fiscal year 1987, ten percent in fiscal year 1988, fifteen percent in fiscal year 1989.

Subsection (e)(1) requires that the local body that has actual responsibility for service decisions—whether that body is the MPO, transit planning board, transit operator, or some other local entity—institute procedures that will give effective, direct notice to local private sector providers in the event new or substantially restructured services are being considered. This amendment is intended to guarantee an opportunity for private providers to participate in service decisionmaking before the public hearing stage (at which time final decisions are usually presented and public input effectively is limited to support of, or opposition to, the final plan).

Subsection (e)(2) requires that public operators consider using private operators to provide federally-subsidized service.

Subsection (e)(3) requires that procedures be implemented to assure that all the costs of both public and private operators will be considered in determining which operator is best qualified to furnish any new services being contemplated. If, for example, the public operator would use federally financed capital equipment to provide a service, the actual costs of such equipment must be included in making service cost calculations.

Subsection (f) would allow the Secretary to promulgate the regulations necessary to implement section 8(e).

Subsection (b) would define "competitively developed mass transportation services" as services provided pursuant to a competitive review process open to any public or private mass transportation entity willing and able to provide such services. Such services would include, for example, actual operating service as well as maintenance.

Subsection (c) would require the State to provide written assurance that procedures have been established to seek proposals from public and private mass transit entities and to identify routes to be competitively bid. These procedures would also describe how a particular mass transit service will be chosen for this competitive process. The assurances would be subject to the waiver provision.

Subsection (d) would permit the State to waive the requirements of this section in a non-urbanized area if the State finds that the area has not received, or is unlikely to receive, any responsive proposals.

This section would also authorize the Secretary to promulgate regulations to implement this section.

Section 307—Reporting system

The Department has been constrained by single audit laws and practices from requiring independent verification of the data submitted for purposes of determining the correct apportionment factors for the formula program. The veracity of this date is necessary to make certain that each area gets only the sums to which it is entitled under the formula. By providing the Secretary with authority to require independent review of such data, its accuracy should be enhanced.

Section 308—Amendments to section 21 authorizations

This bill would make several significant changes to the authorizations for the Urban Mass Transportation Administration program. It would not authorize any appropriation of general funds for the section 9 and 18 formula programs, nor would it make available any funding for the Discretionary Grants Program (sections 3, 4(i), 8, and 16(b)). Rather, the Administration proposes to make Mass Transit Account funds available for the new block grant program in Title IV of this bill as well as for the research, training and human resources program, section 8 planning, administrative expenses, and section 16(b)(2) capital activities. Mass Transit Account funds could also be used for operating assistance in non-urbanized areas and, subject to the limitations of section 9(k)(2) of the UMT Act, in urbanized areas with a population of less than 200,000. No new funding would be available for operating assistance for large urbanized areas; however, carryover funds would be subject to original limitations. The Mass Transit Account authorizations are set forth in Title IV.

As originally authorized, the Discretionary Grants program derived its funding from the Mass Transit Account of the Highway Trust Fund. The Administration proposes to allocate the resource of the Federal motor fuels tax more fairly on the basis of the block grant program in Title IV. Projects eligible under sections 3 and 4(i) would still be eligible for funding under this new combined formula program. As noted below, both section 8 activities and elderly and handicapped projects would be directly funded from the Mass Transit Account.

Subsection (c) would make funding available from the Mass Transit Account to carry out the planning activities authorized by section 8 and the capital projects authorized by section 16(b)(2) of the Act. The Administration proposes to set aside funding for these programs to assure that a minimum level of funding will be available for planning activities and projects for the elderly and handicapped. These funds will no longer be made available by grants. Instead, they will be apportioned administratively and distributed in a manner determined by the Secretary. Accordingly, subsection (c)(1) would provide that up to 2.5 percent of the Mass Transit Account authorizations be available for planning activities authorized by section 8, and subsection (c)(2) would provide that up to $35 million would be available for the purposes of capital expenditure under section 16(b)(2).

Furthermore, subsection (c)(3) would make funding available from the Mass Transit Account to carry out the research, training and human resources functions (section 6, 10, 11(a), and 20 of the Act), as well as administrative expenses. Subsection (c)(3) would provide a combined authorization for sections 6, 10, 11(a) and 20 of up to $19.5 million for each of fiscal years 1987, 1988, 1989, and 1990. This reduction is commensurate with the overall reduction in other mass transit assistance programs. It would provide such sums as may be necessary for those fiscal years to carry out section 12(a) of the Act. This authorization would provide funding sufficient to meet expected staffing levels for those fiscal years. Staffing levels would be reduced consistent with the overall reduction in the UMTA program.

TITLE IV: HIGHWAY AND TRANSIT BLOCK GRANT ACT OF 1986

Section 401—Short Title

This section provides that Title IV may be cited as the Highway and Transit Block Grant Act of 1986.

Section 402—Highway and transit block grant

This section adds a new chapter (Chapter 5) to title 23, United States Code. This new chapter contains the provisions of the highway and transit block grant established by this Act. References that follow are to Chapter 5.

Section 501 specifies the apportionment procedures. Prior to apportionment of the funds authorized for fiscal years 1987 through 1991, the Secretary is required to deduct ¼ of 1 percent of Highway Account funds for the purposes of carrying out the SHRP under section 133 of title 23, United States Code.

Thirty-five percent of the Highway Account funds are apportioned to the States on the basis of the present urban system apportionment formula with no State receiving less than ½ of 1 percent of this 35 percent. Thirty percent of the highway funds are apportioned to the States on the basis of the current secondary system formula with no State (except the District of Columbia) receiving less than ½ of 1 percent of this 30 percent. The last 35 percent of the Highway Account funds is apportioned to the States on the basis of nonprimary system bridge needs as determined from the inventories required under section 144 of title 23, United States Code. No State is to receive more than 10 percent or less than one-quarter percent of this 35 percent.

Subsection 501(a)(2) would provide that funds for certain activities authorized under the Urban Mass Transportation Act are to be deducted from the Mass Transit Account funds, as authorized by proposed section 21(c) of the Urban Mass Transportation Act, before the Mass Transit Account funds are apportioned for purposes of this chapter. Proposed section 21(c) would authorize the following deductions each fiscal year: 2.5 percent of authorized Mass Transit Account funds for planning activities (section 8 of the Urban Mass Transit Act); up to $35,000,000 for capital expenditures under section 16(b)(2) of the Urban Mass Transportation Act; up to $19,500,000 for activities under sections 6, 10, 11(a), and 20 of the Urban Mass Transportation Act; and such sums as are necessary for administrative expenses. The subsection would also provide that the funds authorized under section 21(c)(1) (planning) and 21(c)(2) (elderly and handicapped) would be apportioned under an administrative formula and paid out in a manner determined by the Secretary.

Subsection 501(b)(1) provides the formulas for apportioning funds from the Highway Account of the Highway Trust Fund.

Subsection 501(b)(2) would provide that the funds in the Mass Transit Account, after funds are deducted pursuant to subsection (a)(2), are to be apportioned using the formulas in section 9A and 18 of the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964, as amended. Accordingly, 88.43 percent of the Mass Transit Account funds would be apportioned using the formula in section 9A(b). Of the remaining funds, 8.64 percent would be apportioned using the formula in section 9A(c) and 2.93 percent would be apportioned using the formula in section 18(a).

As noted below, all of the funds would be paid to the State, but the funds attributable to areas of 200,000 or more in population would have to be spent in those areas, unless transferred under section 503. Apportionment of funds under this section will be an obligation of the Federal Government for their payment under section 502. Apportionment is to be made 25 percent on October 1 and 75 percent on January 1 of each fiscal year to allow for sequestration, if any, under Gramm-Rudman.

Section 502 provides the method of payment to the States of funds apportioned under section 501(b). Fifteen percent of each State's apportionments for a fiscal year will be released during the fiscal year of apportionment. Subsequently, 40 percent will be released during the next year, 20 percent the next year and 25 percent the next fiscal year. If the State is not eligible to receive its total payment in a given year, the bill would allow adjustments to be made in later years so that a State could receive its funds. Implementing regulations will be developed by the Department of Transportation in consultation with the Treasury Department to insure that the payment mechanism will be at least as advantageous to the States as the current mechanism.

Section 503(a) describes how Highway Account funds which are apportioned to a State based on that State's urbanized areas having a population of 200,000 or more are to be allocated to the State's urbanized areas of 200,000 population or more. This section provides that local officials decide how funds apportioned under this section are to be spent. However, projects must have been developed in accordance with the planning process required pursuant to section 134.

Subsection 503(b) would provide that the funds apportioned to a State that are attributable to urbanized areas of 200,000 or more in population would have to be allocated to the urbanized area to which they are attributable. The funds so allocated would have to be made available for expenditure in those areas for projects selected by the metropolitan planning organization officials in accordance with the section 8 planning process. The funds may be transferred from the allocation of one urbanized area of 200,000 or more in population to another, or to the State for use in any urban area in the State, provided that the metropolitan planning organization in the area transferring the funds approves the transfer.

Subsection (a) of section 504 provides that payment of funds from the Highway Account and Mass Transit Account of the Highway Trust Fund under this chapter, may be expended for highway construction projects on any public road, for activities as provided in sections 134 and 307(c) of the title 23 and for mass transportation capital projects eligible under section 9(j) of the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964, as amended. Only costs incurred after the effective date of this Act would be eligible. Any transit capital project previously eligible for funding under section 3, under Interstate substitution, and under Federal-aid urban system programs would continue to be eligible under the highway and transit block grant. This flexibility will allow the Governor and large urbanized areas to make choices concerning urban mobility without being constrained by the source of Federal funds. In addition, such funds may be expended in urbanized areas with a population of less than 200,000 and in rural areas for mass transportation operating assistance in accordance with subsection (b).

The Administration continues to believe that the payment of operating costs is a local responsibility, since fares, service levels, labor costs, and other factors that determine such costs are locally decided. However, it recognizes that smaller urbanized areas and rural areas are perceived to be more dependent on operating assistance than are larger areas. Much of the opposition to the elimination of operating assistance has centered on the importance of operating assistance to small and medium sized urbanized areas and rural areas. The Administration believes that continuing operating assistance for these areas should meet the concerns expressed about the total elimination of operating assistance.

Thus, subsection (b) of section 504 would make operating assistance an eligible expense in urbanized areas with a population of less than 200,000 and in nonurbanized areas. It would limit the amount available to the Governor for urbanized areas to the total amount that would have been attributable on an annual basis to all urbanized areas under 200,000 under section 9(k)(2) of the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964, as amended, or under any more restrictive limitation Congress might impose. Section 9(k)(2) contains a specific provision concerning urbanized areas that became urbanized areas for the first time under the 1980 census. For purposes of eligibility of operating expenses under the highway and transit block grant, the reference in section 9(k)(2) to apportionments under section 9 is intended to mean fiscal year 1985 apportionments under section 9. The local match for such operating assistance would also have to be from sources other than operating revenues or than Federal funds.

Section 505 provides that the Federal share cannot exceed 75 percent of highway construction projects and transportation planning projects and cannot exceed 75 percent of the net project cost of mass transit capital projects. For mass transit operating assistance projects, the Federal share cannot exceed 50 percent.

Section 506 requires each State to provide annual written assurance that the State government will:

1. make funds available to urbanized areas for use on eligible projects as required by section 503;

2. expend payments received under Chapter 5 in accordance with the requirements of Chapter 5;

3. appropriate and expend the funds received in accordance with the laws and procedures that apply to the expenditure of its own funds;

4. provide an opportunity for the public to comment on the proposed use of these funds;

5. comply with the requirements of section 507 (nondiscrimination);

6. provide the Secretary and Comptroller General, upon reasonable request, access to and the right to inspect records and construction sites to review compliance and operations under Chapter 5;

7. consult with local governments on major policy decisions and program choices when highway and transit block grant funds are to be used for off-system projects or any projects in urbanized areas;

8. comply with the requirements of "The Uniform Relocation Assistance and Real Property Acquisition Policies Act of 1970" and the "Single Audit Act of 1984;"

9. pay wages on construction work under this chapter under the Davis-Bacon Act as if such work were work performed on regular UMTA of FHWA construction projects; and

10. each State will comply with the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA) and other Federal environmental laws and Executive Orders as specified in regulations issued by the Secretary. To the maximum extent possible existing regulations will be used. Under regulations, recipients will assume the Secretary's responsibilities under such laws and orders. The Council on Environmental Quality will be consulted on issuing any regulations. The State must certify that it will carry out the responsibilities of the Secretary. The certifying officer must consent to assume the responsibility of the appropriated Federal officials under NEPA and other laws and must consent to the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. The Secretary's approval of a certification will satisfy the Secretary's responsibilities under NEPA and other laws.

For transit projects, the State must make additional assurances to those required by subsection (a). Subsection (b) requires the State to assure that the State Government will comply with the following sections of the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964, as amended: 3(f) (charter bus), 3(g) (school bus), 8(e) (private sector participation), 9(e)(3)(A) (legal, technical, and financial capacity to carry out the program of projects), 9(e)(3)(B) (continuing control over the use of facilities and equipment, and 9B (competitive services). In addition, the State must assure that for transit projects in all urbanized areas, it will meet the requirements of section 9(e)(3)(I) (private sector representation on transit policy boards), and section 15 (reporting and accounts and records systems). Finally, the State must assure that for transit projects in urbanized areas with population of 200,000 or more, it will meet the other planning process requirements of section 8. Approval by the Secretary of Transportation shall not be required for any of the activities covered by the assurances made under this subsection.

Section 507 provides that the prohibitions against discrimination on the basis of age under the Age Discrimination Act of 1975, on the basis of handicap under section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, on the basis of sex under title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, or on the basis of race, color, or national origin under title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 apply to programs and activities that receive Federal financial assistance under Chapter 5, No person on the basis of sex is to be excluded from participation in, be denied benefits of or be subject to discrimination under, any program or activity that receives Federal financial assistance under Chapter 5. However, this does not prohibit any conduct or activities permitted under title IX of the Education Amendments Act of 1972.

Section 508 provides for withholding payments under Chapter 5 if the Secretary finds that a State or local government has failed to comply substantially with any provision of Chapter 5. Payments are to be withheld until appropriate corrective action is taken.

Section 509 provides that only the laws specified in sections 506 and 507 apply to funds expended under Chapter 5, that the definitions in section 101(a) of title 23, United States Code, and in section 12(c) of the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964, as amended, apply to Chapter 5, and that the remainder of Chapters 1 through 4 of title 23, United States Code, do not apply to Chapter 5 unless specifically provided by Chapter 5. Requirements that applied to categorical grants under the Urban Mass Transportation Act, such as the labor protection requirements of section 13(c), would not apply to the highway and transit block grant.

Section 403—Technical amendments

This section provides necessary technical amendments.

Section 404—Authorizations

This section authorizes $2.2 billion per fiscal year out of the Highway Account and $1.22 billion per fiscal year out of the Mass Transit Account for each of the fiscal years 1987 through 1990 to carry out the highway and transit block grant.

TITLE V: SURFACE TRANSPORTATION REVENUE ACT OF 1986

Short title

This section provides that Title V may be cited as the Surface Transportation Revenue Act of 1986.

Section 502—Amendment of 1954 code

This section provides that references in Title V to a section or other provision are references to the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

Section 503—4-Year extension of taxes which are transferred into the highway trust fund

This section provides a 4-year extension of the taxes which are transferred into the Highway Trust Fund and also provides a 4-year extension of certain exemptions not being terminated by other sections of Title V.

Section 504—4-Year extension of the highway trust fund

This section provides a 4-year extension of the Highway Trust Fund and makes conforming amendments to the Land and Water Conservation Fund Act.

Section 505—Gasohol, methanol, and ethanol exemptions

This section eliminates the exemptions from the motor fuel tax for gasohol, methanol, and ethanol effective December 31, 1986.

Section 506—Bus exemptions

The purpose of these amendments is to charge public and private buses for the use of the Nation's highways. Currently, buses owned by public transit authorities pay no taxes into the Highway Trust Fund. Gasoline buses owned by private transit companies pay no taxes if they are providing service open to the general public. Diesel buses owned by private companies pay either none of the 15 cents Federal diesel tax or just 3 cents, depending on the kind of service they provide. However, all of these vehicles depend on a good highway system to provide service and directly benefit from highway improvements financed by the Highway Trust Fund.

This amendment would also correct the inequity that currently exists between public transit authorities and private bus companies when they compete for service contracts. Since the public transit authorities pay no fuel taxes, they are able to undercut the costs of the private companies. This amendment would "level the playing field" between these two entities.

Subsection (a) would limit the current exemption that exists for diesel fuel purchased by State and local governments so that it would not apply to transit use. The amendment would not affect other vehicles owned by state or local governments (such as trucks) and would not affect diesel fuel taxes when no compensation is received (such as school service provided by a governmental entity itself without direct charge).

Subsection (b) would limit the current exemption that exists for gasoline purchased by State and local governments so that it would not apply to transit use. The amendment would not affect other vehicles owned by State or local governments (such as trucks) and would not affect gasoline fuel taxes when no compensation is received (such as school service provided by a governmental entity itself without direct charge). The current tire tax exemption for private transit buses would be repealed. School buses would keep the tire tax exemption.

Subsection (c) would revise the gasoline tax refund provisions of section 6421 to repeal refunds for all types of private transit buses. The refund provisions for school buses would not be revised since these vehicles are usually used in very localized services.

Subsection (d) would revise the diesel tax refund provisions of section 6427 to repeal refunds for all types of private transit buses. The refund provisions for school buses would not be revised since these vehicles are usually used in very localized services.

Section 507—Highway and transit block grant

This section provides that amounts in the Highway Account and the Mass Transit Account of the Highway Trust Fund are available for making payments in accordance with Chapter 5 of title 23, United States Code.

Section 508—Technical amendments

This section makes clarifying amendments to section 9503 of title 26, United States Code, corrects an error in section 911(d)(1)(A) of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 which inadvertently increased the amounts which are transferred into the Mass Transit Account of the Highway Trust Fund at the expense of the Highway Account, and repeals provisions that should have been repealed in the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984.

Subsection (d) is intended to give the same treatment, of the time available after obligations occur to make outlays, to contract authority as to appropriations of budget authority. Appropriations of budget authority, even when available for only one year, become available until expended after obligation. The time limit on availability of appropriations applies only to the time for obligation.

By Mr. SARBANES:

S. 2190. A bill to provide that the full cost-of-living adjustment in benefits payable under certain Federal programs shall be made for 1987; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS UNDER CERTAIN FEDERAL PROGRAMS

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which would guarantee the fiscal year 1987 COLA for all Federal retirees, protect them from the President's proposed budget COLA cuts, and essentially repeal the fiscal year 1987 COLA suspension required under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. As you know, language in Public Law 99-177, the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, suspended a scheduled 3.1 percent cost-of-living allowance for Federal annuitants for fiscal year 1986 and will suspend all future COLA's for fiscal years 1987-91. I voted against Gramm-Rudman-Hollings each time it was considered by the full Senate and I specifically opposed the provision which suspends COLA's for Federal retirees because it struck me as being particularly unfair. Because it is still uncertain whether reinstatement of the 3.1 percent fiscal year 1986 COLA will occur, I feel compelled to guarantee a cost-of-living adjustment for Federal retirees for fiscal year 1987 and I invite my colleagues to join with me in this effort.

The Members of this body rejected almost all of the President's fiscal year 1984, fiscal year 1985 proposals which, like Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, would have had a substantial impact on the income and benefits of Federal employees and annuitants, and I applaud my colleagues because you were correct in doing so. Subsequently, during the first session of the 99th Congress, this same body enacted a far-reaching budget proposal, one which will impose severe hardships on Federal employees and retirees for many years to come. At risk here is the possibility of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings placing the Federal Government in an adversarial role with current and former Federal employees. Mr. President, I am introducing this legislation because I am quite concerned about the viability of the civil service as a career under a Gramm-Rudman-Hollings environment. I strongly believe that if the income and benefits of our dedicated public servants continue to be threatened, our whole system of governing may be jeopardized.●

By Mr. ROTH (for himself, Mr. COHEN, Mr. CHILES, Mr. LEVIN, and Mr. SIMON):

S. 2191. A bill to amend the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 so as to prohibit reprisals against certain officers, employees, or contractors of air carriers; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

ENCOURAGING AIR CARRIER EMPLOYEES TO REPORT POTENTIAL CARRIER SAFETY VIOLATIONS

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, on behalf of Senators COHEN, CHILES, LEVIN, SIMON, and myself, I am today introducing an amendment to the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 which would encourage the Nation's airline employees to report actual or potential safety violations without fear of reprisals by their employees.

Mr. President, the American public is growing increasingly concerned, and rightly so, over the state of airline safety in this country. Despite an overall downward trend in fatal accidents over the past three decades, U.S. air safety took a beating in 1985. Last year was one of the deadliest years in the history of U.S. commercial aviation in terms of number of fatal accidents—seven—and total loss of life—528 fatalities.

Terrible air crashes in which hundreds of people die are shocking and disturbing; and there is also cause for concern in the recent increase in near-collisions and other so-called incidents which, but for the skill of flight crews and controllers—and sometimes thanks to just plain good luck—could have turned into equally terrible tragedies. While the direct causes of these crashes and near-crashes are many and varied, there is growing evidence that cost-cutting, overscheduling, and crowded conditions at airports may be eroding safety margins and posing a growing threat to the flying public.

Many entities and individuals share the responsibility for insuring the continued safety of air travel in the United States. Obviously, the Federal Aviation Administration, which is charged with establishing and enforcing safety standards for the industry, has a critically important role. So does the National Transportation Safety Board, an independent Federal agency which investigates accidents and makes recommendations for improvements in equipment and procedures. A current investigation by the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations has raised a number of troubling questions about the adequacy of the response of the agencies to potentially hazardous conditions. It is essential that we determine what actions are needed to insure that the FAA adequately regulates the safety of the U.S. airline industry and protects the interests of the traveling public.

But the Federal Government cannot do this job all by itself. The FAA cannot be everywhere, all the time, constantly looking over the shoulder of every U.S. carrier, large and small. The carriers themselves—the airline owners, the flight crews, the maintenance personnel and the ground crews—along with aircraft manufacturers, industry groups, trade unions and others, have an equally important duty to make safety the paramount every time an airliner taxis down the runway. Like any other business, airlines operate to make money, and in recent years Congress has gone a long way toward freeing this industry from excessive regulations and restrictions and allowing competition to flourish—to the benefit of both the industry and the American consumer. But economic deregulation does not relieve the Government of its responsiblity to ensure the safety of the traveling public—in fact, deregulation requires even more emphasis on safety than before—and it certainly does not give the industry free rein to pursue profits at the expense of safety.

The legislation I am introducing today is aimed at reinforcing the overriding importance of safety in commercial airline operations. This amendment to the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 would provide protection against adverse employment actions for whistleblowers who report safety-related violations of the Federal Aviation Act on Government regulations to the FAA, NTSB, or Congress. The amendment would create a private right of action for employees who are fired or harassed by their airline for reporting such violations. Under present law, an employee who is fired for reporting safety violations, even if the report leads to the correction of a dangerous condition and possibly saved lives, has no recourse, especially in States with "employment-at-will" laws. The inquiry by the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations has revealed a number of instances in which airline personnel, such as pilots and mechanics, were the only people in a position to know about potential safety hazards, yet were reluctant to report those conditions because of fear of reprisals by their employers. This amendment would help ensure that such fears do not stand in the way of disclosing and correcting safety hazards before they result in tragedy.

Mr. President, airline travel, on a passenger-mile basis, is still the safest way to get from here to there. This is as it should be. The American people should have a first-class ticket when it comes to air safety, and this legislation can help to provide that ticket by making it clear to all concerned that safety is the highest priority in air travel. I urge my colleagues to act quickly to enact this amendment in order to help guarantee that the "friendly skies" remain friendly—and safe—for the traveling public.●

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of Senator ROTH's bill to provide protection for pilots and other airline personnel who report safety violations on airlines. This bill gives air carrier employees the right to go to district court if they are the victims of reprisal for having reported air safety violations.

This legislation is being offered in response to growing concern in Congress and the Nation about the safety of air travel. Hearings held recently by the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, on which I serve, included some alarming testimony that airline employees are reluctant to report aircraft safety problems and that the Federal Aviation Administration's inspection and enforcement activities may be seriously lax.

My own conclusion during these hearings was that corners are being cut on safety. I find this to be an intolerable situation. We must be willing to provide the necessary commitment for a strong, effective regulatory agency which will keep our skies safe.

Everyone who has flown a plane recently cannot help but feel an extra twinge of apprehension as the plane taxis down the runway. Last year was the second-worst year ever for air safety on large U.S. commercial carriers; 526 people were killed.

And the figures could easily have been far worse. There are an astounding and frightening number of near-misses, or near-hits as they should perhaps be called. Pilot-reported near collisions have dramatically increased. They increased by 93 percent from 395 in 1981 to 763 in 1985, according to the National Journal which reportedly got its figures from the FAA.

An example of one of the near misses occurred just last week at Detroit Metro Airport. On March 6, on the third page of the Detroit Free Press, it was reported that a DC-10 with about 70 people on board narrowly missed a smaller plane by about 500 feet; 500 feet was all that kept this near-miss from being a direct hit; 500 feet was the only difference between one more page-3 story on a close call and a page-1 headline of a tragic collision involving 70 people. The article reported that:

> The pilot of the small jet * * * said the planes came within about 500 feet of each other partly because air traffic monitoring equipment could not tell tower controllers quickly enough how close together the planes were.

To avoid the DC-10, the pilot of the small jet said he had to increase his rate of descent from the normal 1,000 to 1,500 feet per minute to about 4,000 feet per minute.

As the statistics I cited earlier show, this hair-raising incident at Detroit Metro is not unusual. My primary reason for concern is that such incidents appear to be all too common.

This bill I am cosponsoring would encourage airline employees to come forward and let responsible Government bodies know of safety problems within their airlines. Pilots testifying at the hearings in the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations indicated that fear of reprisal and loss of job security are significant reasons for pilots not bringing problems to the attention to the FAA, even when such disclosures are made anonymously. Pilots and airline crews are in the best position to know of any aircraft problems. Congress has a responsibility to take action to ensure that these people feel safe in coming forward with problems which might be prevented and thus save lives.

At the same time it is important to remember that this bill will address only one aspect of what appears to be a number of reasons for the serious safety problems plaguing domestic aviation. We cannot stop here. Congress must continue to keep a close eye on the Federal Aviation Administration. We must make sure the FAA has the funding and personnel necessary to inspect airlines and correct any problems that are found. We must make sure the FAA carries out its inspection and enforcement duties stringently, and if it errs, it must err on the side of safety. This may necessarily involve taking a hard look at the relationship between the FAA and the airline industry. Is this relationship too cozy? Should there be stricter limits on when and how FAA employees can leave the FAA to go work for airlines?

Congress must consider all these questions, if we are to reduce the number of incidents like the recent near-miss at Detroit Metro. This bill I am supporting today will be a good start in this direction.●

By Mr. HATFIELD:

S. 2192. A bill to reform and simplify the Federal individual income tax; to the Committee on Finance.

SIMPLIFORM TAX ACT

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, For the fourth time in 5 years, Congress is attempting to amend the Internal Revenue Code. This almost annual tinkering with the Tax Code typically results in a bill which fails to accomplish what I believe are the two most important goals of tax reform; namely, simplicity and equity. The current tax reform effort is no exception and, I fear, will produce a bill which further complicates our hopelessly confused tax system.

Consequently Mr. President, I am reintroducing my simpliform tax proposal. Since 1972, I have advocated the repeal of all deductions and credits, substituting instead six low marginal tax rates for all individual taxpayers. In addition to lowering marginal tax rates, simpliform provides for five simple and equitable tax credits for the following: personal exemption, charitable contributions, mortgage interest, State and local taxes, and medical expenses.

The cost to the Treasury for the total amount of personal and corporate tax breaks currently in the Tax Code, termed "tax expenditures," has increased from $36 billion in 1967 to $427.5 billion in 1985. Because of the tendency to expand the size and scope of available tax breaks each time Congress amends the Tax Code, less than half of personal income is currently subjected to income taxation.

In the last 32 years, we have come to view the Tax Code not as a means to efficiently raise the amount of money needed to operate the Government, but rather as an instrument of social intervention, as a method of fine tuning the economy and as a vehicle to subsidize favorite causes and industries. In light of the evolution of the Tax Code, and of the track record of Congress in making the Code simpler and more fair, one wonders whether there is hope of any meaningful reform.

In 1981, we enacted a mammoth $750 billion tax cut that essentially reflected an unrestrained bidding war between the President and the Democratic leadership in the House. Less than 1 year later, we were trying to recapture a portion of those revenues in a $100 billion tax bill that enraged financial institutions, savers, waiters, waitresses, and a host of other affected individuals. Motivated by the desire to reduce the deficit, Congress again amended the Tax Code in 1984. Our current tax reform effort, whatever goals it accomplishes, will undoubtedly not be the last. This repeated revision of the Code underscores a fundamental problem with current tax policy: it is constructed in a piecemeal and inconsistent manner.

The future gives no indication that this trend will change. The existence of large budget deficits and the cloud of Gramm-Rudman will increase the need to study ways to increase revenues and broaden the tax base.

Our Tax Code is the motor which, in part, helps run the Federal Government and our economy. Yet like an auto mechanic who can't seem to make the right adjustments, Congress has been unable to make the necessary changes to the Tax Code to ensure simplicity and equity, thereby increasing compliance. The time for additional tinkering is over, we need a new engine. In answer to this need, I again submit my simpliform proposal, and ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. President, in further explanation of the general provisions of the Simpliform Tax Act, I ask unanimous consent that an article appearing in the January 30, 1984, edition of Tax Notes, entitled "Tax Reform: Time to Fulfill the Promise," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2192

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE; AMENDMENT OF 1954 CODE.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This Act may be cited as the "Simpliform Tax Act".

(b) AMENDMENT OF 1954 CODE.—Except as otherwise expressly provided, whenever in this Act an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or repeal of, a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section, chapter, or other provision of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

SEC. 2. RATE OF TAX IMPOSED ON INCOME OF INDIVIDUALS.

Part I of subchapter A of chapter 1 (relating to tax on individuals) is amended to read as follows:

"PART I—TAX ON INDIVIDUALS

"Sec. 1. Tax imposed.
"Sec. 2. Community property laws not to apply.
"Sec. 3. Cross references relating to tax on individuals.

"SECTION 1. TAX IMPOSED.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—There is hereby imposed on the taxable income of every individual a tax determined in accordance with the following table:

"If the taxable income is:	The rate of tax is:
Not over $5,000	6%.
Over $5,000 but not over $10,000.	$300, plus 12% of the excess over $5,000.
Over $10,000 but not over $30,000.	$900, plus 17% of the excess over $10,000.
Over $30,000 but not over $40,000.	$4,300, plus 25% of the excess over $30,000.
Over $40,000 but not over $50,000.	$6,800, plus 28% of the excess over $40,000.
Over $50,000	$9,600, plus 30% of the excess over $50,000.

"(b) NONRESIDENT ALIENS.—In the case of a nonresident alien individual, the tax imposed by subsection (a) shall apply only as provided by section 871(b) or section 877.

"(c) ADJUSTMENTS IN TAX TABLES SO THAT INFLATION WILL NOT RESULT IN TAX INCREASES.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Not later than December 15 of 1987 and each subsequent calendar year, the Secretary shall prescribe a table which shall apply in lieu of the table contained in subsection (b) with respect to taxable years beginning in the succeeding calendar year.

"(2) METHOD OF PRESCRIBING TABLES.—The table which under paragraph (1) is to apply in lieu of the table contained in subsection (b) with respect to taxable years beginning in any calendar year shall be prescribed—

"(A) by increasing the minimum and maximum dollar amounts for each rate bracket for which a tax is imposed under such table by the cost-of-living adjustment for such calendar year,

"(B) by not changing the rate applicable to any rate bracket as adjusted under subparagraph (A), and

"(C) by adjusting the amounts setting forth the tax to the extent necessary to reflect the adjustments in the rate brackets.

If any increase determined under subparagraph (A) is not a multiple of $10, such increase shall be rounded to the nearest multiple of $10 (or if such increase is a multiple of $5, such increase shall be increased to the next highest multiple of $10).

"(3) COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENT.—For purposes of paragraph (2), the cost-of-living adjustment for any calendar year is the percentage (if any) by which—

"(A) the Consumer Price Index for the preceding calendar year, exceeds

"(B) the Consumer Price Index for the calendar year 1986.

"(4) CONSUMER PRICE INDEX FOR ANY CALENDAR YEAR.—For purposes of paragraph (3), the Consumer Price Index for any calendar year is the average of the Consumer Price Index as of the close of the 12-month period ending on September 30 of such calendar year.

"(5) CONSUMER PRICE INDEX.—For purposes of paragraph (4), the term 'Consumer Price Index' means the last Consumer Price Index for all-urban consumers published by the Department of Labor.

"SEC. 2. COMMUNITY PROPERTY LAWS NOT TO APPLY.

"For purposes of this subtitle, the income of a married individual shall be determined without regard to the property laws of any State under which any part of the income of a married individual is treated as the income of his spouse.

"SEC. 3. CROSS REFERENCES RELATING TO TAX ON INDIVIDUALS.

"(1) For rates of tax on nonresident aliens with respect to income not connected with United States businesses, see section 871(a).

"(2) For computation of tax where taxpayer restores substantial amount held under claim of right, see section 1311.".

SEC. 3. TAXABLE INCOME.

Section 63 (relating to taxable income) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 63. TAXABLE INCOME DEFINED.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of this subtitle, the term 'taxable income' means—

"(1) in the case of an individual, adjusted gross income reduced by the itemized deductions of the taxpayer for the taxable year, and

"(2) in the case of a corporation, gross income reduced by the deductions allowed the taxpayer by this chapter for the taxable year.

"(b) ITEMIZED DEDUCTIONS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of this subtitle, the term 'itemized deductions' means the deductions allowed the taxpayer by this chapter for the taxable year other than the deductions taken into account in determining adjusted gross income.

"(2) ELECTION TO ITEMIZE.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—Unless an individual makes an election under this subsection for the taxable year, no itemized deduction shall be allowed for the taxable year. For purposes of this subtitle, the determination of whether a deduction is allowable under this chapter shall be made without regard to the preceding sentence.

"(B) TIME AND MANNER OF ELECTION.—Any election under this subsection shall be made on the taxpayer's return, and the Secretary shall prescribe the manner of signifying such election on the return.

"(C) CHANGE OF TREATMENT.—Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, a change of treatment with respect to the itemized deductions for any taxable year may be made after the filing of the return for such year. If the spouse of the taxpayer filed a separate return for any taxable year corresponding to the taxable year of the taxpayer, the change shall not be allowed unless, in accordance with such regulations—

"(i) the spouse makes a change of treatment with respect to the itemized deductions, for the taxable year covered in such separate return, consistent with the change of treatment sought by the taxpayer, and

"(ii) the taxpayer and his spouse consent (within such period as may be agreed on with the Secretary) in writing to the assessment of any deficiency, to the extent attributable to such change of treatment, even though at the time of the filing of such consent the assessment of such deficiency would otherwise be prevented by the operation of any law or rule of law.

This paragraph shall not apply if the tax liability of the taxpayer's spouse, for the taxable year corresponding to the taxable year of the taxpayer, has been compromised under section 7122.

"(D) MARITAL STATUS.—For purposes of this paragraph marital status shall be determined under section 143.".

SEC. 4. PERSONAL EXEMPTION CREDIT.

Subpart C of part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 (relating to refundable credits) is amended by redesignating section 35 as section 36 and by inserting after section 34 the following new section:

"SEC. 35. PERSONAL EXEMPTION.

"(a) TAXPAYER.—In the case of an individual electing the application of this subsection, there shall be allowed the taxpayer as a credit against the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year an amount equal to the sum of—

"(1) $250, plus

"(2) the product of—

"(A) $250, multiplied by

"(B) the cost-of-living adjustment for such taxable year.

"(b) ADDITIONAL CREDIT FOR SPOUSE.—In the case of a taxpayer whose spouse does not elect the application of subsection (a) for the taxable year of the spouse ending with or within the taxable year of the taxpayer, there shall be allowed the taxpayer as an additional credit against the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year of the taxpayer the sum described in subsection (a).

"(c) ADDITIONAL CREDIT FOR DEPENDENTS.—There shall be allowed the taxpayer as an additional credit against the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year the product of—

"(1) the number of qualified dependents of the taxpayer for the taxable year, multiplied by

"(2) the sum of—

"(A) $250, plus

"(B) the product of—

"(i) $250, multiplied by

"(ii) the cost-of-living adjustment for the taxable year.

"(d) DEFINITIONS; SPECIAL RULES.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENT.—The term 'cost-of-living adjustment' has the meaning given to such term by section 1(c)(3).

"(2) QUALIFIED DEPENDENT.—The term 'qualified dependent' means a dependent of the taxpayer—

"(A) whose gross income for the calendar year in which the taxable year of the taxpayer begins is less than $1,000, or

"(B) who is a child of the taxpayer that has not attained the age of 19 at the close of the calendar year in which the taxable year of the taxpayer begins.

"(3) CHILD.—The term 'child' means an individual who is a son, stepson, daughter, or stepdaughter of the taxpayer (within the meaning of section 152 as in effect on the day before the date of enactment of the Simpliform Tax Act).

"(4) DEPENDENT.—The term 'dependent' has the meaning given to such term by section 152 (as in effect on the day before the date of enactment of the Simpliform Tax Act).

"(5) SPECIAL RULES.—Rules similar to the rules under subsections (b), (c), (d), and (e) of section 152 shall apply in determining the credit allowable under this section.".

SEC. 5. REPEALS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The following provisions of chapter 1 (relating to normal taxes and surtaxes) are hereby repealed:

(1) All sections in subpart A of part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 (relating to nonrefundable personal credits), except section 26.

"(b) INDEBTEDNESS OF COOPERATIVE HOUSING CORPORATION.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a tenant-stockholder, there shall be allowed as a credit against the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year an amount equal to 15 percent of the amounts which—

"(A) are paid or accrued to a cooperative housing corporation during the taxable year,

"(B) represent such tenant-stockholder's proportionate share of the interest allowable as a deduction to the corporation under section 163 which is paid or incurred by the corporation on its indebtedness contracted—

"(i) in the acquisition, construction, alteration, rehabilitation, or maintenance of the houses or apartment building, or

"(ii) in the acquisition of the land on which the houses (or apartment building) are situated, and

"(C) were not taken into account in determining the amount of any credit or deduction allowed the taxpayer under any provision of this chapter other than this subsection.

"(2) DEFINITIONS AND SPECIAL RULES.—The meaning given to any term by section 216(b) (as in effect on the day before the date of enactment of the Simpliform Tax Act), and rules similar to the rules provided by such section, shall apply in determining the amount of credit allowable under this subsection.

"(c) DOLLAR LIMITATION.—The aggregate amount allowed a taxpayer under this section for any taxable year shall not exceed $1,000.

"SEC. 24. CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTIONS OF INDIVIDUALS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—In the case of an individual, there shall be allowed as a credit against the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year an amount equal to 20 percent of the excess of—

"(1) the aggregate amount of charitable contributions made by the taxpayer during the taxable year, over

"(2) 1 percent of the adjusted gross income of the taxpayer for such taxable year.

"(b) CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTIONS.—For purposes of this section, the term 'charitable contributions' has the meaning given to such term by section 170(c).

"(c) SPECIAL RULES.—Rules similar to the rules provided under subsections (a)(3), (e), (f), and (g) of section 170 shall apply in determining the amount of the credit allowable under this section.

"SEC. 25. LOCAL TAXES.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—There shall be allowed as a credit against the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year an amount equal to 15 percent of the excess of—

"(1) the aggregate amount of qualified taxes paid by the taxpayer during the taxable year to a political subdivision of a State or to the District of Columbia, over

"(2) 1 percent of the adjusted gross income of the taxpayer for the taxable year.

"(b) QUALIFIED TAXES.—For purposes of this section, the term 'qualified taxes' means any tax with respect to which a deduction would be allowable under section 165 if the taxpayer were a section 11 corporation.

"(c) DOLLAR LIMITATION.—The aggregate amount allowed a taxpayer under this section for any taxable year shall not exceed $1,000.

"(d) DEFINITIONS AND SPECIAL RULES.—The meaning given to any term by section 165, and rules similar to the rules provided by such section, shall apply in determining the amount of the credit allowable under this section.".

(b) EXCESS EARNED INCOME CREDIT ALLOWED SPOUSE.—Subsection (d) of section 32 (relating to earned income) is amended to read as follows:

"(d) EXCESS CREDIT ALLOWABLE TO SPOUSE.—Any portion of the amount of the credit determined under subsection (a) which a married individual is not allowed for any taxable year by reason of the limitation provided in subsection (b) shall be allowed as a credit under this section to the spouse of such individual for the taxable year of the spouse beginning in the calendar year in which such taxable year begins to the extent the aggregate amount allowed the spouse under this section for such taxable year of the spouse does not exceed the limitation imposed by subsection (b) with respect to the spouse.".

SEC. 11. INDEXATION OF BASIS IN PROPERTY.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 1001 (relating to determination of gain or loss) is amended—

(1) by striking out "adjusted basis provided in section 1011" in subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof "indexed basis",

(2) by striking out "adjusted basis provided in such section" and inserting in lieu thereof "indexed basis", and

(3) by redesignating subsection (f) as subsection (h) and inserting after subsection (e) the following new subsections:

"(f) INDEXED BASIS.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The indexed basis of the taxpayer in any property is the product of—

"(A) the adjusted basis of the taxpayer in such property (within the meaning of section 1011), multiplied by

"(B) the applicable inflation ratio for such property.

"(2) APPLICABLE INFLATION RATIO.—The applicable inflation ratio for any property is the percentage determined by dividing—

"(A) the Consumer Price Index for the calendar year in which the sale or exchange takes place, by

"(B) the Consumer Price Index for the calendar year in which the holding period of the property began.

The applicable inflation ratio shall not be taken into account unless it is greater than 1. The applicable inflation ratio for any property shall be rounded to the nearest one-tenth of 1 percent.

"(3) CONSUMER PRICE INDEX.—The term 'Consumer Price Index' has the meaning given to such term by section 1(c).

"(g) TREATMENT OF PROPERTY.—For purposes of determining the gain from the sale or other disposition of property, the following shall be treated as separate property:

"(A) any substantial improvement to such property,

"(B) in the case of a transaction in which gain or loss is recognized only in part, that portion of the asset to which the recognized gain or loss is property attributable, and

"(C) any other portion of an asset to the extent that separate treatment of such portion is appropriate to carry out the purposes of this section.".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to disposition of property made after December 31, 1986.

SEC. 12. WITHHOLDING.

Section 3402 (relating to income tax collected at source) is amended by—

The Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate shall, as soon as practicable but in any event not later than 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act, submit to the Committee on Finance of the Senate and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives a draft of all technical and conforming changes in the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 which are necessary to reflect throughout such Code the changes in the substantive provisions of law made by this Act.

SEC. 16. STUDY OF CORPORATE INCOME TAX.

(a) STUDY.—The Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate shall conduct a study of amendments to the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 which would—

(1) lower the rate of tax imposed on corporate income,

(2) eliminate corporate tax preferences, and

(3) structure the corporate income tax so that it is similar to the individual income tax (as amended by this Act).

(b) REPORT.—The Secretary of the Treasury shall submit to the Committee on Finance of the Senate and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives a final report on the study conducted under subsection (a) by no later than 1 year after the date of enactment of this Act. Such report shall include—

(1) recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to the amendments described in subsection (a), and

(2) proposed legislation necessary to effect such amendments.

SEC. 17. EFFECTIVE DATE.

Except as otherwise provided, the amendments and repeals made by this Act shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1986.

TAX REFORM: IT'S TIME TO FULFILL THE PROMISE

(By Senator Mark O. Hatfield)*

(Sen. Mark O. Hatfield, R-Ore., is chair of the Senate Appropriations Committee. In this article, he recommends adoption of his "Simpliform" proposal for fundamental reform of the income tax system. Under Simpliform, the tax base would be broadened by replacing the many deductions, credits, and exemptions in current law with, simply, five credits. In addition, tax rates would be lowered.

(Hatfield begins by outlining the major problems with the current Internal Revenue Code and the principal objectives of tax reform. He argues, for example, that the current system discourages saving, and he notes that the complexity of the system makes it costly to administer. Tax reform, he says, should strive for simplicity, economic neutrality, and fairness. The senator goes on to describe his Simpliform proposal, which he believes would eliminate many of the problems in the current system.

(An appendix to the article contains a detailed analysis of the proposal by the Joint Committee on Taxation and contains revenue estimates and comparisons with current law.)

When Congress considered the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 (ERTA), proponents assumed that the 1984 federal budget would be in balance and that surplus revenues would be used to index tax rates. Yet, the most recent Administration budget projections forecast a $185 billion revenue shortfall for fiscal year 1984. In addition, the Congressional Budget Office budget projections show deficits through 1986 on the order of $200 billion annually, if Congress takes no action to enforce its budget reconciliation instructions.[1]

Such a development would bring the amount of publicly held federal debt to approximately $2.4 trillion—roughly equivalent to one half the total Gross National Product projected for 1988.[2] Even with significant economic growth, annual budget deficits will approach six percent of GNP. To place this projection in perspective, the 1968 "guns and butter" budget of President Johnson had a $25 billion deficit (three percent of GNP) which seemed a staggering figure at that time.[3]

Moreover, CBO projections earlier this year show that between 1981 and 1988 (two years estimated to have comparable unemployment rates), the deficit will rise by 3.6 percentage points of GNP, which translates into a structural deficit of about $170 billion.[4] Of striking interest is the fact that the net revenue effect of ERTA and TEFRA (the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982) may account for up to 74 percent of the deficit projected for 1988, if Congress makes no changes in present policies and laws.[5]

1. CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET SENTIMENTS AND OUTLOOK

Unpleasant realities and considerable frustration have emerged as hallmarks of congressional efforts to formulate the 1984 budget. Coupled with intolerably high deficits proposed by the Administration for fiscal years 1984 through 1988 is the continuing erosion of the revenue base, which, if unchecked, will further exacerbate efforts to narrow deficits in the out-years.

Congress has been wrenched to and fro on the issue of increasing taxes. In the Senate, the battle over the budget resolution supported by the President and the resolution proposed by the so-called "Gang of Five" centered largely on revenue policy.[6] Because of the magnitude of the projected revenue shortfall, spending restraint alone, even if combined with a sustained and robust economic recovery, will not adequately reduce the mushrooming deficits that have caused increasing concern in the financial markets. Even the Administration acknowledged the need to raise additional revenues to reduce future federal deficits, when it proposed the standby tax package that called for tax increases of $46 billion in 1966 and $51 billion in 1988.

A. Tax increases vs. no tax increases

Currently, congressional sentiment on the revenue side of the budgetary equation tends to fall into two broad camps. One group opposes any tax increase, arguing that the economy will advance more vigorously and speedily than CBO projections; that CBO estimates are too pessimistic; and that tax increases will impede economic recovery.

The second group contends that some multi-year revenue increases or slow-down in future tax cuts, representing a component of a broader deficit reduction package that includes spending cuts, are essential. The primary focus for reducing the deficit, however, should be in the out-years. Delaying efforts to reduce the structural deficit may cause uncertainty about the future of the economy, thereby keeping interest rates unacceptably high, and may make lenders reluctant to enter into longer-term commitments.

Seemingly more heterogeneous in its membership than the first group, the second camp is comprised of a variety of factions with differing tax policy preferences. One of these factions views the current tax system as largely unfair to the poor and middle income taxpayer. This relatively liberal contingent sees the tax code gaping with loopholes that disproportionately benefit upper income individuals and corporations. Accordingly, these legislators seek to eliminate numerous corporate tax preferences and to curtail benefits enacted in ERTA, such as through proposals to cap the third year of the tax cut, or to freeze the scheduled phase-in of estate tax reductions.

A second faction among those who recognize the necessity of future revenue increases focuses on enhanced compliance and selective measures to broaden the scope of the income tax, so that basic tax rates would not have to be raised. The driving force behind this faction has been the Senate Finance Committee.

A third faction seeks to curtail or eliminate a host of tax expenditures in order to broaden the tax base and thereby reduce marginal tax rates. These legislators are satisfied neither with the net effects of ERTA and TEFRA nor with piecemeal efforts to close loopholes and strengthen compliance. Accordingly, this third faction seeks nothing short of comprehensive restructuring of the tax code.

B. Lessons of ERTA and TEFRA

While there is a growing consensus in Congress that ERTA was excessive and unaffordable, particularly in light of current and projected deficits, there is also agreement that ERTA properly sought to encourage savings and investment by lowering punitively high marginal tax rates. TEFRA, on the other hand, reflected the need to raise revenue, in part to offset the effects of ERTA, by limiting several tax preferences and by increasing tax compliance.

Both acts attempted to achieve appropriate objectives by adjusting the rate structure, in the case of the former, and by partially broadening the tax base, in the case of the latter. Yet, the changes of ERTA and TEFRA underscore a fundamental problem with current tax policy: that it is constructed in a piecemeal, inconsistent, and vacillatory manner.

C. Time for fundamental tax reform

Even though deep divisions remain in Congress over the appropriate direction for tax reform, the next 18 months offer a historic opportunity to meld many of these groups into a broad coalition that seeks fundamental reform of the federal tax code.

A changing political and economic climate provides mounting impetus for, at a minimum, more serious consideration of substantial revisions in the individual and corporate income tax which could promote greater simplicity, economic efficiency, and equity.

Advocates of "fundamental tax reform" have been active since the enactment of ERTA.[7] Hearings before the Senate Finance Committee and the Joint Economic Committee on flat-rate tax proposals indicate that there is increasing support for, and political interest in, overhauling the federal income tax. The Administration has contributed to that interest with its recent calls for studies on simplifying the tax system. Moreover, with the completion of the Treasury Department's econometric tax model, more detailed and meaningful analyses of congressional tax proposals have become feasible.

Political interest in "reforming" the entire tax code or various components of it may intensify as the presidential campaign shifts into high gear. Particularly within the Democratic race, the early themes of promoting economic growth by encouraging savings and investment, and of enhancing U.S. competitiveness in international markets may translate into additional proposals for restructuring specific tax provisions.

More important, though, current budgetary realities will direct attention to tax reform. The intolerably high deficits projected for the next four years, combined with a trend toward a declining revenue base will provide a prominent backdrop for major tax revisions after the 1984 elections.

While few would disagree with the proposition that the tax code is in need of reform, the scope and character of such proposals is the contentious issue. Accordingly, this article will outline some of the major frustrations and problems with the tax code. Next, it will outline appropriate objectives of tax reform. Finally, it will present my proposal to reform the individual income tax which includes a provision for its eventual integration with the corporate income tax.

2. FRUSTRATION WITH THE CURRENT TAX SYSTEM

By April 15, 1983, over 95 million individual income tax returns were filed with the Internal Revenue Service. When enacted in 1913, the federal income tax affected less than one-half of one percent of all wage earners in the country, most of whom paid one percent or less of their income for taxes. Today the tax code profoundly affects a significantly broader scope of our country's economic activties, with increasingly adverse economic consequences.

The individual income tax, leaking with loopholes that promote inefficiency, inequity, and enormous complexity, is on the verge of losing its most admirable feature—the willingness of millions of Americans to comply. In addition to the thousands of letters that I receive annually which call for reform of the federal income tax, a litany of studies also documents the growing public dissatisfaction with the income tax. For example, a recent General Accounting Office report concluded that the tax protest movement alone poses a serious threat to our nation's voluntary tax system.[8] Moreover, the Advisory Commission on Intergovermental Relations reports that 36 percent of the public feels that the federal income tax is the most unfair tax (compared to state income, state sales, and local property taxes).[9]

In recent years over 40 percent of taxpayers have employed professional assistance to prepare their returns at a cost of over $1 billion.[10] Because of the complexity of federal tax policies, the federal government spent over 485 million hours attempting to satisfy reporting and recordkeeping requirements.[11]

In addition, the backload of court cases considering tax disputes is staggering. For fiscal 1981, the U.S. Tax Court started with over 34,000 cases and received over 29,500 new cases. It solved over 18,000 cases, but concluded the year with 45,000 cases pending. Similarly, District Courts and Courts of Claims were unable to gain ground in resolving existing tax cases.[12] As recently as June 13 of 1983, the Senate Finance Committee found that the backlog of cases is estimated at 50,000, 16,000 of which involve tax shelters.[13]

The source of this complexity is the attempt by Congress and the Executive to achieve a myriad of social objectives with the income tax. Whether it is the promotion of housing, jobs, energy conservation, or incentives to save and invest for various purposes, the perennial legislative response is to add another deduction or credit to the tax form.

The federal government has forgotten the principal function of the tax system: to raise revenue in the most efficient, equitable, and least complex manner. The current practice of narrowing the scope of income that is subject to taxation—via additional tax expenditures—requires unnecessarily high tax rates to yield the revenue that is required to support federal obligations.

3. EFFECTS OF CURRENT TAX POLICY

A. Encourages borrowing, discourages savings, retards capital formation

The structure of current tax policy provides a plethora of incentives for accumulating debt as opposed to encouraging savings. Not surprisingly, the U.S., which is unique in permitting the unlimited deductibility of interest, has the lowest national savings rate among highly developed countries. A prinicpal reason for this disparity is the fact that an unusually large percentage of the U.S. population consumes and borrows more than they save every year.[14] It does not result because Americans tend to save less than people in other countries.

As a result of the tax bias toward borrowing and the inflationary spiral of the recent past, Americans have been caught up in a debtor mentality—borrowing excessively today, writing off interest payments, and counting on inflation to devalue the real burden of debt over time. Our entire economy is caught in a vicious cycle of debt with over $900 billion in gross interest payments made each year.[15] Interest payments have risen more than twice as fast as GNP. Indeed, the deductibility of interest on consumer credit and mortgage interest alone represented a $30 billion loss in revenue in 1983.[16]

The tax code penalizes equity financing because returns to shareholders face double taxation: first by federal and state governments, which tax earnings at the corporate rate; and then as dividends and investments are distributed to shareholders. A generation of business managers has been taught to leverage corporate return on assets by borrowing rather than raising internally the needed cash for investment.

After the federal government soaked up 73 percent of available net private savings in 1983, and highly leveraged businesses and individuals borrowed to keep afloat, precious little remained for productive new enterprises that hold the key to providing the jobs America so desperately needs.[17] In sum, the combination of budget deficits and federal tax policy has produced massive borrowing, crippling interest rates, and a scarcity of investment capital.

B. Reduces economic growth

The catalogue of tax preferences continually added to the tax code reduces economic efficiency in a number of ways. In addition to providing disincentives for savings and other investments, current tax expenditures direct resources toward tax-preferred activities from other activities with higher pretax returns, thereby reducing potential GNP. As the tax code drifts from a more steady course of tax neutrality, countless violations to the broad objective of economic efficiency result.

A glaring illustration of tax-induced activity that offers virtually no return to the economy in general, or to the federal government, is the increasingly popular leasing scheme by which tax-exempt institutions sell their assets to private investors who agree to lease them back to the seller. Unless corrective action is taken, this loophole will cost the federal government $14 billion in lost revenue by 1988.[18]

Moreover, as tax preferences grow, tax rates necessary to generate adequate federal revenue must rise. As a result, many individuals and corporations will funnel more of their resources into unproductive tax shelters, which represent a waste of both badly needed government revenue and private funds. In addition, higher marginal tax rates reduce incentives for additional work and investment.

C. Induces tax evasion

Higher marginal tax rates induce taxpayers to seek legal and illegal means to reduce their tax burden. Indeed, the fast pace of the "underground economy" in recent years is in part a response to higher taxes, particularly as middle income earners are pushed by inflation into higher tax brackets. In effect, inflation has produced increasingly higher effective tax rates while real incomes have not correspondingly increased.

Tax officials comment with great frequency that tax avoidance is blurring into tax evasion—exaggerated deductions, unreported income, and unfiled returns all have increased faster than personal income. Lowering tax rates will not eradicate the underground economy, but such a move may reduce the incentive for new people to join the underground labor force, which will soon hide an estimated $100 billion in legally earned income from the I.R.S.[19]

4. TAX EXPENDITURES AND EQUITY CONSIDERATIONS

As mentioned, a fundamental issue in the tax reform debate concerns the alarming decline of the tax base. The increasing number of special tax incentives and exclusions, coupled with their frequent expansion, reduces the tax base and results in unnecessarily high tax rates.

The amount of income excluded from adjusted gross income has increased steadily since 1947.[20] Because of our tendency to expand the size and scope of available tax breaks, less than half of personal income is currently subject to income taxation. Indeed, a study by the Congressional Research Service concluded that the dollar magnitude of tax expenditures is so large that if the tax expenditure system were dismantled, average tax rates could be cut by approximately one third.[21] A CBO study documents the sharp growth of tax preferences, observing that in 1967, the first year for which a tax expenditure budget was compiled, 50 items represented a total revenue loss of $36.6 billion—equivalent to 4.4 percent of GNP. By fiscal year 1983, the report estimated that tax expenditures will have increased to $273 billion compared to estimated revenues of $633 billion, amounting to over eight percent of GNP.[22]

In essence, tax expenditures are similar to government payments, because the same objective could be accomplished by direct outlays. Because tax expenditures represent revenue losses and contribute to federal deficits as do direct spending programs, they should be reviewed annually as part of the congressional budget process. Unlike the process by which outlays are categorized in the budget resolution into broad budget functions and then periodically reviewed by the authorizing committees, no comparable procedures exists for tax expenditures. Currently, tax expenditures are grouped together with aggregate revenues and assigned solely to the tax-writing committees. As a result, tax expenditures operate much like entitlement programs in that both function on automatic pilot, with built-in increases that largely escape annual congressional scrutiny.

The presumed efficacy of tax preferences and the propensity to expand benefits underlie the growth of tax loopholes. A recent example of the growth of tax expenditures was ERTA, which added 11 new expenditures, expanded 21 existing ones, and reduced only two items. This act directly increased tax expenditures by $25.4 billion in the current fiscal year and $57.3 billion in fiscal 1985, while only partially reducing other tax expenditures.[23]

A number of tax experts have observed that if tax expenditures were broken down in amounts paid to various income groups, the results would show that the largest payments flow to wealthy individuals. Tax expenditures, the product of a shotgun approach to tax equity, increasingly undermine the intended progressivity of the individual income tax. Indeed, figures provided by the Treasury Department and the Joint Committee on Taxation reveal that the top 4.4 percent of taxpayers in 1981—those making $50,000 or more—received a wholly disproportionate share of the benefits of 13 out of 33 tax expenditures studied. Moreover, these findings show individuals making $100,000 or more—less than one percent of all taxpayers—received 13 percent of the benefits of these tax expenditures.[24] The study by the Treasury Department also noted that some major tax preferences are highly regressive, such as the exclusion of interest on state and local bonds, with 94.1 percent of the benefits going to the most affluent taxpayers.[25]

While controlling the amount and types of tax expenditures has received greater attention in recent years, the federal government has failed to establish an adequate set of criteria for the review of these tax subsidies. When evaluating each special tax provision, legislators should ask three broad questions: First, does the tax provision still serve a valid public end? Second, do the benefits resulting from the provision exceed its costs? Third, how does the provision compare with alternative means of achieving the same public objective?[26] In far too many instances, current tax expenditures would not pass this test. In some cases, individuals would undertake the subsidized activity even in the absence of the tax subsidy. For the vast majority of cases, direct subsidies would be more cost-effective than hidden tax subsidies.

5. OBJECTIVES OF TAX REFORM

A. Simplicity

Simplicity implies that distinctions in the tax code should be kept to a minimum, so that ordinary taxpayers can prepare their returns without professional assistance. In general, repealing deductions, credits, and exclusions would simplify the tax filing process. Of course, not all base broadening measures would simplify the tax system. Taxing social security benefits, for instance, might require many low-income elderly individuals who do not currently file to complete tax forms, thereby increasing government paperwork. Simplicity also enhances tax equity by enabling individuals with less education to calculate their tax liabilities as readily as those with greater knowledge and expertise.[27]

B. Efficiency

An efficient tax system is neutral, so that personal and business decisions are based on their perceived value, apart from tax considerations. Rather than viewing the tax code as a necessary evil which efficiently raises revenue, policy makers have used the tax code as an instrument of social intervention, as a method to finetune the economy, and as a highly politicized game of subsidizing favorite causes and industries.

C. Equity

An equitable tax system recognizes that to those who have been given the most, there is a corresponding greater responsibility in bearing the burdens of self-government. But equity also means that we should avoid striving to "soak the rich" and instead, treat income from all sources in the same manner.

Unfortunately, inequity abounds in current tax policy. In addition to receiving proportionately fewer of the benefits of current tax expenditures, the median income family faces disproportionately higher marginal tax increases because of inflation than do the wealthy.[28] Marginal federal tax rates for the median income family of four persons was 22 percent in 1975, 24 percent in 1981, and is projected to rise to 32 percent by 1985, an increase of 34 perent in 10 years.[29]

6. SIMPLIFORM: A NEW PROPOSAL

Since 1972, I have advocated reforming the individual income tax and have introduced several versions of The Simpliform Tax Act. This proposal, which is based on the principles of efficiency, simplicity, and equity, serves as a model for eliminating the plethora of tax expenditures in order to lower significantly marginal tax rates. Accordingly, I have reintroduced my Simpliform proposal, S. 2158.

A. Analytical framework

Under Simpliform, essentially all income would be treated in the same manner. For example, the broader income base would include an array of previously excluded items such as unemployment compensation, contributions by employers to accident and health plans, interest from municipal and mortgage revenue bonds, and 50 percent of social security income for individuals with taxable income over $12,000—in order to reduce significantly tax rates for all taxpayers. By eliminating the litany of current tax expenditures, this proposal virtually eliminates the distinction between adjusted gross income and taxable income. By focusing on simplifying the tax code and reducing marginal tax rates. Simpliform effectively addresses many of the shortcomings and structural defects of current tax policy which were delineated earlier.

Because Simpliform does not use tax simplification as an excuse to raise taxes or to shift the tax burden to low- and middle-income taxpayers, this proposal is constructed upon two basic criteria. First, Simpliform raises the same level of revenue as present federal income and social security tax laws. Second, Simpliform is distributionally neutral in that it maintains the current distribution of the tax burden across broadly defined income classes.

B. Summary of Simpliform

By broadening the tax base, Simpliform offers progressive rates varying from six percent for taxable incomes less than $5,000 to a maximum of 30 percent for taxable incomes over $50,000. Thus, Simpliform reduces the top rate by 40 percent from its current high of 50 percent. Moreover, Simpliform reduces average tax by over 25 perent. The following presents the individuals income tax rate schedule under Simpliform:

Taxable income	The tax is
0 to $5,000	0 plus 6 percent of excess over 0.
$5,000 to $10,000	$300 plus 12 percent of excess over $5,000.
$10,000 to $30,000	$900 plus 17 percent of excess over $10,000.
$30,000 to $40,000	$4,300 plus 25 percent of excess over $30,000.
$40,000 to $50,000	$6,800 plus 28 percent of excess over $40,000.
Over $50,000	$9,600 plus 30 percent of excess over $50,000.

In addition to lowering marginal tax rates. Simpliform provides five simple and equitable tax credits, which enhance distributional neutrality, tax equity, and the overall attractiveness of the proposal. First, Simpliform provides a $250 nonrefundable personal exemption credit for each taxpayer, spouse, and each dependent. (The definition of dependent follows current law except that it does not include students over the age of 19.) According to the analysis of this proposal prepared by the Joint Committee on Taxation (reproduced as an appendix to this article), converting current exemptions to a $250 tax credit would provide taxpayers with income under $30,000 with a 20 percent average increase in tax benefits compared to current law.

Second, Simpliform provides a 20 percent nonrefundable credit for charitable contributions for that portion in excess over one percent of adjusted gross income. The economic justification for maintaining a tax subsidy for charitable contributions, as opposed to direct federal outlays, as Martin Feldstein and other scholars discern, is that a tax preference can encourage greater contributions at a lower cost to federal revenues than direct government spending. Before the charitable deduction was expanded to include nonitemizers in 1981, the National Committee for Responsible Philanthropy endorsed the concept of a tax credit for charitable contributions.[30] Shifting to a tax credit would encourage taxpayers with incomes of less than $40,000, many of whom realize few tax benefits under current law, to make larger contributions. Simpliform replaces the complexity of the above-the-line charitable deduction simplicity and greater tax equity.

Third, Simpliform provides a 15 percent nonrefundable credit for home mortgage interest for that portion exceeding one percent of adjusted gross income. The credit would be limited to $1,000 per taxpayer. As a report by the Congressional Budget Office observes, converting the mortgage interest deduction to a tax credit would extend the present tax subsidy to virtually all homeowners with mortgages.[31] Currently, 60 percent of homeowners do not use the mortgage interest deduction.

Moreover, converting the deduction into a tax credit would, in general, equalize the rate of subsidy provided to homeowners with mortgage payments. For example, if two taxpayers have a home mortgage with an interest rate of 14 percent, and one is in the 50 percent tax bracket while the other is in the 20 percent bracket, our current tax system reduces the interest rate to seven percent for the former and 11 percent for the latter. In contrast, a 15 percent tax credit would provide a 15 percent reduction for both taxpayers. As an added benefit, this tax credit would also concentrate more tax savings on low and moderate-income families.[32] Under current tax law, the Joint Committee on Taxation estimates that by 1985, three-quarters of the benefits of the mortgage interest deduction will go to taxpayers with incomes over $30,000.[33] With Simpliform, taxpayers with annual income under $30,000 would enjoy 45 percent of the benefits of the mortgage interest tax credit, and would receive a slightly larger subsidy than under current law.

Fourth, Simpliform provides a 15 percent nonrefundable credit for taxes paid for that portion exceeding one percent of adjusted gross income. The credit would be limited to $1,000 per taxpayer. Like the mortgage interest tax credit and personal exemption credit, a credit for state and local taxes paid will largely equalize the tax benefit of this expenditure across all income brackets. In contrast, 80 percent of the benefits of the current deduction for state and local taxes goes to those earning over $30,000 and 50 percent goes to those earning in excess of $50,000 annually.[34] Maintaining some protection for taxes paid ensures, for the most part, that a tax on a tax will not be paid.

Fifth, Simpliform provides a 20 percent nonrefundable credit for medical expenses exceeding 10 percent of adjusted gross income. This provision serves as another means to insure tax equity, for excessive medical expenses severely impinge upon the "ability to pay" principle that is a fundamental tenet of our tax system. As the analysis by the Joint Committee on Taxation shows, the medical care credit would, on average, be more generous than current law for 98 percent of all taxpayers.[35]

Sixth, Simpliform repeals the option of filing joint tax returns and thereby virtually eliminates the "marriage penalty." In the words of one commentator, "our current method of defining units of taxation is capricious in its determination of the relative tax liabilities of people who differ only in their formal marital status."[36] In taxing the first dollar of compensation to the secondary earner in a marriage at the other spouse's top tax rate, we severely penalize the couple who tries to get ahead by working longer and harder. As a result, we reward rather substantially those who by preference, or otherwise, avoid marriage.

Although this proposal taxes the individual as a unit instead of the couple, the bill allocates unearned income such as rents, interest, or investment income equally between the two spouses. By treating this income as property of an equal partnership, we prevent the tax planning opportunities of shifting passive income to the lower-earning spouse. Thus, the bill strikes an intermediate position between the flexibility of income shifting and allocating all unearned income to the spouse with the larger salary.

Finally, making the individual the unit of taxation encompasses two other advantages.

It responds to the growing emergence of women in the workforce as an equal partner in a marriage, as an unmarried head of a household, or as a single worker.

It is economically efficient and removes a substantial disincentive for second earners in a marriage to enter the workforce. In the conclusion of one study, we could achieve the same amount of tax revenue with a 30 percent increase in economic output by adopting the individual as the unit of taxation.[37]

Seventh, indexing of the rate brackets and personal exemptions, which was adopted in ERTA, would be retained but implemented in 1986. The special capital gains deduction would be repealed, but the cost basis of capital assets would be indexed to account for inflation beginning after 1984. In doing so, gains in property assets would be taxed on their actual as opposed to their inflated gain.

Finally, Simpliform does not immediately reform our corporate tax system. Instead, it requires the Treasury Department to study our business income tax structure and submit legislation to the Congress which would simplify the existing system by eliminating tax preferences and lowering tax rates.

7. ADVANTAGES OF SIMPLIFORM

If enacted, Simpliform would revolutionize and, in my view, energize our tax system with lower rates, greater equity, and increased economic efficiency. Briefly, it has the advantage of:

Drastically reducing high marginal tax rates that punish saving and investment at the expense of more leisure and consumption.

Continuing the reduction in top tax rates that once ranged from 23 percent to 94 percent and today range from 11 percent to 50 percent, we automatically reduce the built-in incentive to avoid taxable wages and accept fringe benefits instead. (In 1951, fringe benefits accounted for 19 percent of payroll expenses, but by 1980 they consumed 37 percent of an employer's payroll.)[38]

Meeting head-on the explosion of tax expenditures that eroded the efficiency and fairness of our tax system.

Retaining a limited tax incentive for five basic provisions—personal exemptions, charitable contributions, mortgage interest deductions, medical expenses, and state and local taxes paid.

Making these five tax incentives equitable and equally valuable to taxpayers across all income levels.

Simplifying our tax system by eliminating a host of special exclusions and deductions, as well as dozens of special forms that confuse and frustrate millions of taxpayers.

Restoring confidence in the fairness and simplicity of our tax code; thereby breathing new life into our "voluntary" or self-reporting system of taxation.

Reducing the tax code's bias towards borrowing, thereby taking the pressure off the Federal Reserve System to rely exclusively on punitive interest rates to quench the fires of inflation.

Broadening the tax base and treating income from a variety of sources in a more equal fashion.

Eliminating the marriage penalty and recognizing the important contribution of women to our economic welfare.

Retaining indexing of rate brackets, personal exemptions, credits, and capital assets to ensure that inflation does not undermine the incentive to work, save, and invest.

8. CONCLUSION

With a projection of annual $200 billion deficits that by 1986 will be overwhelmingly due to the 1981 tax cut, it is time we begin to lay the foundation for a fundamental change in tax policy. After the dust clears from the 1984 election, we in the Congress and in the Executive Branch should seize the opportunity to radically change the erosion of a tax system that is sapping our economic strength, penalizing thrift, encouraging excessive debt, and forcing redoubled efforts to exact a pound of flesh from errant taxpayers who fail to comply with its obscure provisions. To the skeptic, tax reform is a product with no market. But from my visits and correspondence with constituents, I believe there is a vast untapped reservoir of support for a complete restructuring of our tax system. Because of its virtues of simplicity, fairness, and increased economic efficiencies, Simpliform should be a serious contender in the tax policy debates that are sure to come.

APPENDIX

SIMPLIFORM PROPOSAL FOR INCOME TAX REFORM

I. INTRODUCTION

The Simpliform proposal would alter the individual income tax system by broadening the tax base and taxing at lower rates. The base would be broadened by: 1) repealing most deductions, credits, and exemptions, and 2) including many items which currently are excluded from adjusted gross income. One result of these measures is to eliminate the present-law distinction between adjusted gross income and taxable income. There would also be provisions made to extend the relevant base-broadening aspects of the proposal to the base for social security taxes.

The proposed tax structure would be progressive with the rates varying from a low of six percent for taxable incomes less than $5,000 to a high of 30 percent for taxable income over $50,000. It would also permit five new tax credits. These would be for: 1) the taxpayer, spouse and dependents; 2) charitable contributions; 3) home mortgage interest; 4) taxes paid; and 5) medical expenses.

Under the proposal, the rate brackets and the exemption amount would be indexed for tax years after 1985. In addition, the basis for capital gains would be indexed.

The joint filing status would be repealed so that every individual would file a separate tax return regardless of marital status. Rules allocating income and credits for married couples would also be stipulated.

The Simpliform tax system would be effective beginning in calender year 1985.

II. BASE-BROADENING MEASURES

A. Repealed exemptions

The current system of deductions from adjusted gross income for individual exemptions would be repealed. The exemption for the taxpayer, spouse, and dependents would be replaced by tax credits. These are discussed subsequently. The repealed exemptions under the proposal would be:

1. The personal exemptions for the taxpayer and his spouse (Sec. 151(b)).
2. The dependency exemption (Sec. 151(e)).
3. The aged exemption (Sec. 151(c)).
4. The blindness exemption (Sec. 151(d)).

B. Repealed credits

The Simpliform proposal would repeal four existing credits. The repealed credits would be:

1. The credit for the elderly and disabled (Sec. 37).
2. The political contributions (Sec. 41).
3. The credit for expenses for household and dependent care services necessary for gainful employment (Sec. 44(a)).
4. The residential energy credit (Sec. 44(c)).

The remaining credits under the present tax system, including the earned income credit would be retained.

C. Repealed deductions

The deductions for charitable contributions, home mortgage interest, taxes paid, and medical expenses would be replaced with an alternative system of tax credits. These are discussed shortly. Under the Simpliform proposal, the repealed deductions would be:

1. Interest (Sec. 163) except when pertaining to business or investment expenses.
2. Taxes (Sec. 164) except when pertaining to businesses.
3. Casualty and theft losses (Sec. 165(h)).
4. Charitable, etc., contributions and gifts (Sec. 170).
5. Medical, dental, etc., expenses (Sec. 213).
6. Moving expenses (Sec. 217).
7. Retirement savings (Sec. 219).
8. Deduction for two-earner married couples (Sec. 221).
9. Adoption expenses (Sec. 222).

D. Repealed exclusions from gross income

The items currently excluded from income which would be included under the Simpliform proposal would be:

1. All premiums on group-term life insurance (Sec. 79).
2. Excluded unemployment compensation (Sec. 85).
3. Certain death benefits (Sec. 101(a)).
4. Interest on certain governmental obligations (Sec. 103).
5. Interest on mortgage subsidy bonds (Sec. 103(a)).
6. Contributions by employers to accident and health plans (Sec. 106).
7. Rental value of parsonages (Sec. 107).
8. Income from discharge of indebtedness (Sec. 108).
9. Recovery of bad debts, prior taxes, and delinquency amounts (Sec. 111).
10. Certain combat pay of members of Armed Forces (Sec. 112).
11. Mustering-out payments for members of Armed Forces (Sec. 113).
12. Sports programs conducted for American National Red Cross (Sec. 114).
13. Partial exclusion of dividends received by individuals (Sec. 116).
14. Scholarships and fellowship grants (Sec. 117).
15. Meals or lodging furnished for the convenience of the employer (Sec. 119).
16. Amounts received under qualified group legal services plans (Sec. 120).
17. One-time exclusion of gain from sale of principal residence by individual who has attained age 55 (Sec. 121).
18. Qualified transportation provided by employer (Sec. 124).
19. Cafeteria plans (Sec. 125).
20. Certain cost sharing payments (Sec. 126).
21. Educational assistance programs (Sec. 127).
22. Partial exclusion of interest (Sec. 128).

23. Dependent care assistance programs (Sec. 129).

24. Disallow the deduction for entertainment and related expenses (Sec. 274).

25. Reinvestment of dividends of stock of public utilities (Sec. 305(e)).

26. Repeal the foreign earned income exclusion (Sec. 911).

27. Repeal the deduction for capital gains (Sec. 1202).

28. Treat tier-two retirement income in the same manner as the present-law treatment of private pension income.

29. Include 50 percent of OASDI and tier-one railroad retirement benefits in taxable income for individuals with incomes over $12,000 in taxable income.

30. Veterans pensions and benefits other than disability.

31. Public assistance benefits.

E. Miscellaneous provisions

1. Repeal of Minimum Tax (Sec. 55).

2. Repeal of income averaging (Sec. 1304).

3. Repeal the joint filing status (Sec. 6013).

4. Index the basis for capital gains for inflation occurring after 1984.

5. Index the exemption credit and rate brackets beginning after tax year 1985.

6. Rules for allocating tax items among spouses would be specified. These rules are described below.

III. INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX STRUCTURE

A. Tax rates

The tax structure would be progressive under the Simpliform proposal, but the marginal tax rates across income classes would be reduced from the present tax system. The zero bracket amount would be eliminated, and all taxpayers would file separately.

The Simpliform individual income tax rate schedule would be:

Taxable income	The tax is:
0 to $5,000	0 plus 6 percent of excess over 0.
$5,000 to $10,000	$300 plus 12 percent of excess over $5,000.
$10,000 to $30,000	$900 plus 17 percent of excess over $10,000.
$30,000 to $40,000	$4,300 plus 25 percent of excess over $30,000.
$40,000 to $50,000	$6,800 plus 28 percent of excess over $40,000.
Over $50,000	$9,600 plus 30 percent of excess over $50,000.

B. Tax credits

There would be five new tax credits permitted under the Simpliform proposal. These would be:

1. A $250 nonrefundable personal exemption credit for each taxpayer and for each dependent. (The definition of dependent follows current law except that it does not include students over the age of 19.)

2. A 20 percent nonrefundable credit for charitable contributions for that portion in excess of 1 percent of adjusted gross income.

3. A 15 percent nonrefundable credit for home mortgage interest for that portion exceeding 1 percent of adjusted gross income. The credit would be limited to $1,000 per taxpayer.

4. A 15 percent nonrefundable credit for taxes paid for that portion exceeding 1 percent of adjusted gross income. The credit would be limited to $1,000 per taxpayer. The base amount of taxes paid under the credit would be the same as those state and local taxes currently deductible under present law.

5. A 20 percent nonrefundable credit for medical expenses for that portion exceeding 10 percent of adjusted gross income.

C. Allocation of tax items for married couples

Since the joint filing status would be repealed under the proposal a problem emerges with respect to the allocation of income and credit items for married couples.

Under present law a married couple filing a joint return reports their income, deductions, and tax credits as a unit, however under the proposal, each spouse would now be required to determine his share of each tax item. This determination could prove quite arbitrary, particularly for the allocation of income and tax credits. As a result, the proposal stipulates an unambiguous method of allocating certain items for married couples.

In general, wages and salaries would be allocated to the spouse that earned the income while unearned income would be split equally betwen the two spouses. In addition, a special rule would apply to tax credits that would allow any unused tax credits of one spouse to be used to offset the tax liability of the other spouse.

IV. BUSINESS TAXATION

The Simpliform proposal would not change the present system of business taxation. However, the Simpliform proposal requires the Secretary of the Treasury to conduct a study on the business income tax structure with the aim of lowering the rate of tax imposed upon corporate income. In addition, it would attempt to simplify the existing system by: 1) eliminating business tax preferences, and 2) structuring the corporate income tax in a similar fashion to that proposed for individuals. Finally, the Secretary of the Treasury would be required to submit proposed legislation toward these ends.

V. EFFECTIVE DATE

The effective date for implementation of Simpliform would be for calendar year 1985.

VI. ESTIMATED DISTRIBUTIONAL AND REVENUE EFFECTS

A comparison across broad income classes of the percentage distribution of tax liability under present law and under the proposal provides some general indications of the distributional effects of the proposed tax system.

The following table displays such a compensation [40] using expanded income classes and 1981 income levels.

	Percentage distribution of 1985 tax liability under Present law	Simpliform
Expanded income class:
Under $10,000	5.9	5.9
$10,000 to $20,000	17.7	17.7
$20,000 to $30,000	23.6	23.7
$30,000 to $40,000	18.8	18.7
$40,000 to $50,000	10.7	10.6
$50,000 to $75,000	9.5	9.7
$75,000 to $100,000	3.8	3.9
$100,000 to $200,000	5.4	5.3
Over $200,000	4.6	4.5
Total	100.0	100.0

Tax liability in this tabulation includes both the federal income tax and social security taxes. It is clear that this one measure indicates substantial distributional neutrality.

We estimate that the proposal also generates approximately the same aggregate tax liability as is forecast for present law in calendar year 1985, although a larger share of these revenues are in the form of payroll tax contributions compared with present law.

VII. IMPACT OF THE NEW TAX CREDITS

Under the Simpliform proposal the exemptions for taxpayers and their dependents, and certain itemized deductions, are converted to tax credits.

The following tables display the distributional and the tax expenditure effects of these converted items both under present law and under Simpliform. These effects are measured using 1981 income levels.

By Mr. BOREN:

S. 2193. A bill to change the basis for computation of emergency compensation whenever the Secretary of Agriculture adjusts the level of loans and purchases for the 1986 through 1990 crops of wheat under the Agricultural Act of 1949; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

ADJUSTMENTS OF BASIS OF DETERMINATION OF WHEAT DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill which will modify the basis for determination of a portion of wheat deficiency payments.

The Food Security Act of 1985 included a provision which requires a portion of the deficiency payment to be determined on the basis of the reduced loan rate or the average price received by farmers during the marketing year. In the past, the entire deficiency was based on the loan rate or the average price during the first 5 months of the marketing year. Under previous law, producers could get their entire deficiency payment 5 months after the beginning of the marketing year. For wheat, that meant producers received their deficiency payments in November. Under the farm bill enacted in December, producers can get a portion of their deficiency payment in November, but must wait until June or July of the next year to receive the balance.

The 1985 farm bill provides for two deficiency payments, in essence. The regular deficiency payment is based on the difference between the target price and the statutory loan rate or the average market price during the first 5 months of the marketing year, whichever is higher. The Secretary has the authority under the law to reduce the loan rate by up to 20 percent. If the Secretary uses this authority, which he has for the 1986 wheat crop, the producer is then entitled to another deficiency payment. This payment is based on the difference between the statutory loan rate and the new loan rate or the average market price during the entire marketing year.

The 1986 program for wheat provides for a target price of $4.38 per bushel. The statutory loan rate is $3.00, providing for a maximum deficiency payment of $1.38. The Secretary did use his authority to drop the loan rate to $2.40 thereby providing for a second deficiency payment with a maximum rate of 60 cents. It is this deficiency payment which is determined by using the market price for the entire marketing year. As the law stands now, farmers must wait until June or July of 1987 to receive this second payment on a crop that is harvested, in Oklahoma, in May 1986. For wheat, the marketing year ends in May the year after the crop is harvested. When this provision was included, obviously little thought was given as to the effect this would have on producers' income and their ability to pay their operating loans.

American farmers are having a very difficult time generating enough cash to meet their current expenses right now. If they cannot get all of their deficiency payment until the summer of 1987, many will be unable to raise enough cash to put in the 1987 crop. Farmers need to receive their payments in a prompt manner; they cannot afford to wait an entire year to be paid for their crop. Creditors will be hesitant to provide a farmer money for the 1987 crop if the farmer cannot pay off his loan for the 1986 crop.

Mr. President, this problem is very serious. There could be many producers forced out of business simply because of the provision contained in the 1985 act. We need to correct this provision now before the sign-up period for the 1986 Wheat Program is completed.

The bill I am introducing today will correct this problem by requiring that all deficiency payments be determined on the basis of the average market price received during the first 5 months of the marketing year instead of the entire marketing year.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2193

S.J. Res. 296. Joint resolution to designate October 16, 1986, as "World Food Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WORLD FOOD DAY

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce a joint resolution designating October 16, 1986, as World Food Day. The commemoration of this day will encourage thousands of Americans to consider how the Nation can further expand its role in the fight against world hunger.

Since Congress first recognized World Food Day in 1981, media coverage of catastrophic famine in Africa has brought the tragedies of starvation, chronic hunger, and malnutrition into millions of American households. The people of this country have been profoundly moved, and they have responded with genuine concern and characteristic generosity.

Now, many African nations are blessed with improved harvests and renewed optimism—a sense that the worst may, at last, be over. It is a time for hope, and even a time to take pride in our Nation's contribution to assistance efforts. But it is no time for complacency.

Millions of Africans still face starvation, and more than 500 million people worldwide suffer from hunger and chronic malnutrition. More than half of those afflicted by hunger are small children. Each day, more than 40,000 children die of malnutrition-related causes; in Africa, 1 in 3 children dies of hunger or related disease before reaching school age. Many of those who survive go through life with serious mental or physical disabilities.

We must not let hunger recede from the camera's glare into the shadows of neglect. We must not forget that, whatever we have done, there is much more to do. That is why World Food Day is particularly important this year.

The search for solutions to hunger and malnutrition will require continued public interest and education. But above all, it will demand individual commitment. World Food Day encourages each of these, and provides a focal point for sustained efforts throughout the year.

We will not eradicate hunger until we come to grips with the underlying causes of food shortages. Hunger is not simply a product of climatic disaster, and responding to such tragedies will not be enough to win this battle. Hunger is the product of overpopulation, of failed economic policies, of burgeoning debt, and of environmental degradation. Excessive reliance on food relief merely prolongs dependency by discouraging local farmers from producing. The effort to alleviate world hunger and malnutrition will not be successful until it addresses these basic problems.

World Food Day also provides an opportunity to reflect on hunger and food production at home, and to renew our commitment in these areas. It is unconscionable that in a nation blessed with unparalleled natural and technological resources, in a nation that warehouses mountains of surplus agricultural commodities, men, women, and children should suffer from chronic hunger and malnutrition. We have the ability to lessen this suffering within our own Nation; we lack only the will. That, also, is why World Food Day is so important.

Our domestic agricultural crisis will add particular poignancy to this year's observance of World Food Day. American farmers have provided the foundation upon which this Nation grew and prospered. Now they face low commodity prices, stagnant markets, high debt loads, and falling land values. Many farmers see their livelihood—a vocation inseparable from our future as well as our heritage—endangered. World Food Day will provide an opportunity to examine what must be done to restore a fair economic return and a bright future to those who nurture the seeds of life.

World hunger can be overcome. Governments must do their best to assist the needy while pursuing long-term solutions to difficult problems. But, ultimately, it will be individuals who together transform dreams of nourishment and self-sufficiency into reality. That is the vision of World Food Day, and the hope of mankind.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 366—EXPRESSING THE SENSE OF THE SENATE WITH RESPECT TO THE DEDUCTION FOR STATE AND LOCAL TAXES

Mr. HUMPHREY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. RES. 366

Whereas the Federal deduction for State and local taxes must be eliminated in order to achieve significantly lower tax rates for all Americans;

Whereas most Americans do not benefit from the deduction for State and local taxes;

Whereas 80 percent of the benefits of the deduction for State and local taxes are enjoyed by the top 20 percent of all taxpayers;

Whereas the other 80 percent of all taxpayers pay for this limited benefit for the 20 percent through higher tax rates; and

Whereas the deduction for State and local taxes amounts to an unfair subsidy for the high-tax States at the expense of the low-tax States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) elimination of the Federal deduction for State and local taxes is essential in order to achieve true tax reform;

(2) low-tax States should not be forced to subsidize high-tax States; and

(3) the Federal deduction for State and local taxes should be repealed in order to reduce marginal tax rates for all Americans.

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, today I send to the desk a resolution to express the sense of the Senate on an issue which is of extreme importance to the overall issue of tax reform: The deductibility of State and local taxes. This resolution, Mr. President, declares that it is the sense of the Senate that the deduction for State and local taxes should be eliminated in order to lower marginal tax rates for all Americans.

Mr. President, there are many reasons why deductibility should be repealed. However, it all boils down to one simple concept: Fairness. Not only is this a deduction for the rich at the expense of the poor, it is a deduction for high-tax States at the expense of low-tax States. While 80 percent of the benefits for this deduction go to the top 20 percent of all taxpayers, the lopsidedness becomes even more evident when it is noted that half of the benefits go to the top 5 percent. That's 5 percent, Mr. President. And we all pay for this through higher rates. This is fair? I must say that I do not think so, Mr. President.

Mr. President, the deduction for State and local taxes currently costs the Treasury upwards of $30 billion per year. The repeal of this deduction was one of the cornerstones of President Reagan's tax reform proposal last year. When the Ways and Means Committee began consideration of the matter, it decided to retain full deductibility. Upon making this decision, the committee found that its bill would lose revenue. This shortfall had to be corrected, so what did the committee do? It raised the rates for everyone by lowering the thresholds for the higher marginal rates. This action raised the rates over what President Reagan had proposed by 10 to 20 percent for all Americans. Once again, we all would be forced to pay for this unfair deduction through higher rates.

Mr. President, we are constantly hearing the argument that repealing deductibility would lead to double taxation. This "tax-on-a-tax" argument seems to me to be rather inconsistent. In the present tax system in our Nation, taxes on taxes are accepted at all levels of government. State and local governments do not exempt Federal excise taxes on several goods to avoid taxes on taxes. As far as personal income taxes are concerned, a majority of States do not allow a deduction for Federal income taxes. Furthermore, dividends also face double taxation at the corporate and the individual levels. Cries of taxes on taxes, then, are quite clearly inconsistent, especially when one considers the fact that most of these cries are coming from government jurisdictions that impose their own double taxation.

The other primary argument made by opponents of repealing deductibility outline a rather unlikely scenario. If deductibility were to be eliminated, the scenario goes, there would be incredible pressure put on State governments to then cut their taxes. Now that State and local taxes would no longer be deductible, individuals would feel the effect of high State taxes. While they can reduce their Federal tax liability by the full amount of their tax payments to State and local governments, the high-tax policies of many States will go unnoticed. This new pressure to cut State taxes will then force States to sharply curtail State and local services.

Mr. President, this argument ignores one very important fact. The majority of States currently follow the Federal definition of income for tax purposes. As the Federal tax base is broadened through the closing of loopholes, the base for State taxes is broadened as well. The effect of this will be to increase State revenues since the same tax rates would apply to a broader base of income. State officials would then face a politician's dream: The opportunity to reduce tax rates without having to cut back on services at all. In this light, it becomes quite clear that repealing deductibility will not impact State governments in a manner in which opponents of repeal have claimed.

Mr. President, I could go on at greater length, but I think the point has been made. The arguments against repealing deductibility do not really stand up on their own. The arguments in favor of repeal, however, do. The House demonstrated in December what happens to tax rates if the decision is made to retain deductibility. This unfair deduction which benefits mostly those with high incomes and forces low-tax States to subsidize high-tax States must be eliminated if we are to achieve true tax reform.

I am encouraged with the news coming out of the Finance Committee which demonstrates that the committee is at least examining the possibility of changing this deduction at this point. However, Mr. President, nothing short of full repeal will suffice. We must put an end to the unfair practice of forcing low- and middle-income individuals to pay for the benefit of the rich and forcing low-tax States to pay for the free-spending practices of the high-tax States. This step is essential in any attempt to truly reform the U.S. Tax Code.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort. After years of constant changes in the Tax Code, we now have an opportunity to achieve true tax reform. Let us not allow this opportunity to pass us by.●

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

BALANCED BUDGET CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT HATCH (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 1668

Mr. HATCH (for himself, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. SIMON, Mr. ARMSTRONG, Mr. BOREN, Mr. GRAMM and Mr. WILSON) proposed an amendment, which was subsequently modified, to amendment No. 1652 proposed by Mr. THURMOND (and others) to the joint resolution (S.J. Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself, Mr. DIXON, and Mr. DOLE) proposed an amendment to the resolution (S. Res. 353), supra; as follows:

On page 24, after line 16, add the following new section:

INVESTIGATION BY THE COMMISSION ON SECURITY AND COOPERATION IN EUROPE

SEC. 23. (a) It is the sense of the Senate that the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe (hereafter in this section know as the "Commission") should—

(1) conduct an investigation to determine—

(A) whether any officer or employee of the United States violated any law of the United States or any State or local law, including any statute, regulation, ordinance, or procedure promulgated pursuant to law, in connection with the defection attempt of Miroslav Medvid;

(B) the instances in which an individual (other than the individual referred to in clause (A)), who was a national of the Soviet Union or a Soviet-bloc Eastern European country, requested political asylum in the United States and was returned to the authorities of his country in violation of any United States, State, or local law, including any statute, regulation, ordinance, or procedure promulgated pursuant to law; and

(C) whether the treatment accorded to individuals described in clauses (A) and (B) requires changes in the laws of the United States; and

(2) submit a report, not later than one year after the date of adoption of this resolution, to the House of Representatives and the Senate on the findings of such investigation, including any recommendations for changes in the laws of the United States.

(b) Salaries and expenses in connection with the implementation of this section shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate out of the Account for Miscellaneous Items, subject to the following terms and conditions:

(1) The aggregate amount of salaries and expenses payable under this section shall not exceed $200,000.

(2) Such salaries shall be payable only for not more than five individuals at any time—

(A) who shall be employees of the Senate and shall be under the policy direction of the Chairman and Cochairman of the Commission; and

(B) who shall be appointed to perform services in the conduct of activities under this section, on or after the date of adoption of this resolution, and who shall have their compensation fixed at an annual rate, by the Secretary of the Senate, upon the joint recommendation of the Chairman and Cochairman of the Commission.

(3) Payment of expenses shall be disbursed upon vouchers approved jointly by the Chairman and Cochairman of the Commission, and no voucher shall be required for the disbursement of a salary of an individual appointed under paragraph (2).

(4) For purposes of determining whether and to what extent any travel or other official expense incurred by the Commission in carrying out any activity under this section is payable from the contingent fund of the Senate, such expense shall be treated as if it has been incurred by a standing committee of the Senate and as if the Commission and its staff were members and staff, respectively, of such a committee.

(5) Any expense under this section may be payable

(A) the Committee on Rules and Administration of the Senate approves;

(B) such expense is of the type for which payment may be made if incurred by standing committee of the Senate:

(C) such expense is not attributable to the detailing of employees; and

(D) the payment of such expense is otherwise in accordance with all laws, rules, and regulations governing expenses of standing committees of the Senate.

(6) Not more than $20,000 of the funds made available by this subsection shall be available for the procurement by the Secretary of the Senate, upon the joint recommendation of the chairman and cochairman of the Commission, of services, on a temporary basis, of individual consultants, or organizations thereof, with the prior consent of the Committee on Rules and Administration of the Senate. Such services may be procured by contract with the providers acting as independent contractors or, in the case of individuals, by employment at daily rates of compensation not in excess of the per diem equivalent of the highest gross rate of annual compensation which may be paid to employees of a standing committee of the Senate and any such contract shall not be subject to the provisions of section 5 of title 41, United States Code, or any other provision of law requiring advertising.

(c) None of the funds may be obligated from the contingent fund of the Senate to carry out any provision of this section on or after a date 30 days after—

(1) the date on which the report described in subsection (a)(2) is submitted, or

(2) a date one year after the date of adoption of this resolution.

whichever comes first.

(d) For purposes of this section, the term "Soviet-bloc Eastern European country" includes Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Poland, and Romania.

STEVENS AMENDMENT NO. 1671

Mr. STEVENS proposed an amendment which was subsequently modified to the resolution (S. Res. 353), supra; as follows

At the end of section 2, add the following paragraph:

(e) Not more than $1,500,000 of the aggregate unexpended balance of the funds authorized by S. Res. 85, agreed to February 28, 1985, the Omnibus Committee Funding Resolution of 1985) is hereby transferred to a special reserve and made available for use from March 1, 1986, throught September 30, 1986. The Committee on Rules and Administration is authorized to adopt regulations to govern use of the special reserve and may, notwithstanding any other provision of this resolution, transfer funds from the special reserve, by administrative action, to the committees described in paragraph (a) to defray extraordinary or unexpected expenses.

WARNER AMENDMENT NO. 1672

Mr. WARNER proposed an amendment to the resolution (S. Res. 353), supra; as follows:

At the end of section 2, add the following paragraph:

(e) $335,000 of the aggregate unexpended balance of the funds authorized by the Omnibus Committee Funding Resolution of 1985 is hereby transferred to a special reserve and made available for use from March 1, 1986, through September 30, 1986. Of this amount, $100,000 is authorized for the use of the Committee on Armed Services, and $235,000 is authorized for the use of the Committee on Finance.

DEFICIT REDUCTION AND PROGRAM IMPROVEMENT

DOMENICI (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 1673

Mr. SIMPSON (for Mr. DOMENICI, for himself, Mr. MCCLURE, and Mr. PACKWOOD) proposed an amendment to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3128) to make changes in spending and revenue provisions for purposes of deficit reduction and program improvement, consistent with the budget process; as follows:

(3) strike out paragraph (3) of subsection (b).

In section 6085—

(1) insert "and duties" after "functions" in the long title of the Act of August 6, 1947 cited in such section; and

(2) strike out "'or subdivision thereof'" and insert "'or subdivision thereof,'" in paragraph (2).

In title VIII, strike out the heading for subtitle A.

In section 8001, strike out "subtitle" and insert in lieu thereof "title".

In section 8(g) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, as proposed to be amended by section 8003, strike out paragraph (2) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(2) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Secretary shall deposit into a separate account in the Treasury of the United States all bonuses, rents, and royalties, and other revenues (derived from any bidding system authorized under subsection (a)(1)), excluding Federal income and windfall profits taxes, and derived from any lease issued after September 18, 1978 of any Federal tract which lies wholly (or in the case of Alaska, partially until seven years from the date of settlement of any boundary dispute that is the subject of an agreement under section 7 of this Act entered into prior to January 1, 1986 or until April 15, 1993 with respect to any other tract) within three nautical miles of the seaward boundary of any coastal State, or (except as provided above for Alaska) in the case where a Federal tract lies partially within three nautical miles of the seaward boundary, a percentage of bonuses, rents, royalties, and other revenues (derived from any bidding system authorized under subsection (a)(1)), excluding Federal income and windfall profits taxes, and derived from any lease issued after September 18, 1978 of such tract equal to the percentage of surface acreage for the tract that lies within such three nautical miles. Except as provided in paragraph (5) of this subsection, not later than the last business day of the month following the month in which those revenues are deposited in the Treasury, the Secretary shall transmit to such coastal State 27 percent of those revenues, together with all accrued interest thereon. The remaining balance of such revenues shall be transmitted simultaneously to the miscellaneous receipts account of the Treasury of the United States.

In section 8(g)(5) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, as proposed to be amended by section 8003, strike out subparagraph (A) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(5)(A) When there is a boundary dispute between the United States and a State which is subject to an agreement under section 7 of this Act, the Secretary shall credit to the account established pursuant to such agreement all bonuses, rents, and royalties, and other revenues (derived from any bidding system authorized under subsection (a)(1)), excluding Federal income and windfall profits taxes, and derived from any lease issued after September 18, 1978 of any Federal tract which lies wholly or partially within three nautical miles of the seaward boundary asserted by the State, if that money has not otherwise been deposited in such account. Proceeds of such account shall be distributed as follows:

"Upon the settlement of any boundary dispute which is subject to a section 7 agreement between the United States and a State, the Secretary shall pay to such State all monies due such State from amounts deposited in the escrow account. If there is insufficient money deposited in the escrow account, the Secretary shall transmit, from any revenues derived from any lease of Federal lands under this Act, the remaining balance due such State in accordance with the formula set forth in section 8004(b)(1)(B) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act Amendments of 1985.".

Strike out section 8004 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 8004. DISTRIBUTION OF SECTION 8(g) ACCOUNT.

(a) Prior to April 15, 1986, the Secretary shall distribute to the designated coastal States the sum of—

(1) the amounts due and payable to each State under paragraph (2) of section 8(g) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, as amended by this title, for the period between October 1, 1985, and the date of such distribution, and

(2) the amounts due each such State under subsection (b)(1)(A) of this section for the period prior to October 1, 1985.

(b)(1) As a fair and equitable disposition of all revenues (including interest thereon) derived from any lease of Federal lands wholly or partially within 3 miles of the seaward boundary of a coastal State prior to October 1, 1985, the Secretary shall distribute:

(A) from the funds which were deposited in the separate account in the Treasury of the United States under section 8(g)(4) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act (43 U.S.C. 1337(g)(4)) which was in effect prior to the date of enactment of section 8003 of this title the following sums:

(a) PARTICIPATION IN JOB SEARCH PROGRAM REQUIRED.—

(1) Subsection (a) of section 231 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2291 (a)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(5) Such worker, unless the Secretary has determined that no acceptable job search program is reasonably available—

"(A) is enrolled in a job search program approved Secretary under section 237 (c), or

"(B) has, after the date on which the worker became totally separated, or partially separated, from the adversely affected employment, completed a job search program approved by the Secretary under section 237 (c).".

(2) Section 231 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2291) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) If the Secretary determines that—

"(1) the adversely affected worker—

"(A) has failed to begin participation in the job search program the enrollment in which meets the requirement of subsection (a)(5), or

"(B) has ceased to participate in such job search program before completing such job search program, and

"(2) there is no justifiable cause for such failure or cessation.

no trade readjustment allowance may be paid to the adversely affected worker under this part on or after the date of such determination until the adversely affected worker begins or resumes participation in a job search program approved under section 237(c).".

(3) Subsection (a) of section 239 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2311(a)) is amended—

(A) by striking out "training," in clause (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "training and job search programs,"; and

(B) by striking out "and (3)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(3) will make determinations and approvals regarding job search programs under sections 231(c) and 237(c), and (4)".

(b) QUALIFYING WEEKS OF EMPLOYMENT.—The last sentence of section 231(a)(2) of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2291(a)(2)) is amended by striking out all that follows after subparagraph (C) and inserting in lieu thereof "shall be treated as a week of employment at wages of $30 or more, but not more than 7 weeks, in case of weeks described in paragraph (A) or (C), or both, may be treated as weeks of employment under this sentence.".

(2) Section 233 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2293) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) No trade readjustment allowance shall be paid to a worker under this part for any week during which the worker is receiving on-the-job training.".

SEC. 13004. JOB TRAINING FOR WORKERS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 236 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2296) is amended—

(1) by striking out "for a worker" in subsection (a)(1)(A) and inserting in lieu thereof "for an adversely affected worker",

(2) by striking out "may approve" in the first sentence of subsection (a)(1) and inserting in lieu thereof "shall (to the extent appropriated funds are available) approve",

(3) by striking out "under paragraph (1)" in subsection (a)(2) and inserting in lieu thereof "under subsection (a)",

(4) by striking out "this subsection" in subsection (a)(3) and inserting in lieu thereof "this section",

(5) by redesignating paragraphs (2) and (3) of subsection (a) as subsections (e) and (f), respectively,

(6) by inserting at the end of subsection (a) the following new paragraphs:

"(2) For purposes of applying paragraph (a)(C), a reasonable expectation of employment does not require that employment opportunities for a worker be available, or offered, immediately upon the completion of training approved under this paragraph (1).

"(3)(A) If the costs of training an adversely affected worker are paid by the Secretary under paragraph (1), no other payment for such costs may be made under any other provision of Federal law.

"(B) No payment may be made under paragraph (1) of the costs of training an adversely affected worker if such costs—

"(i) have already been paid under any other provision of Federal law, or

"(ii) are reimbursable under any other provision of Federal law and a portion of such costs have already been paid under such other provision of Federal law.

"(C) The provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to, or take into account, any funds provided under any other provision of Federal law which are used for any purpose other than the direct payment of the costs incurred in training a particular adversely affected worker, even if such use has the effect of indirectly paying or reducing any portion of the costs involved in training the adversely affected worker.

"(4) The training programs that may be approved under paragraph (1) include, but are not limited to—

"(A) on-the-job training,

"(B) any training program provided by a State pursuant to section 303 of the Job Training Partnership Act,

"(C) any training program approved by a private industry council established under section 102 of such Act, and

"(D) any other training program approved by the Secretary.", and

(7) by inserting after subsection (c) the following new subsection:

"(d) Notwithstanding any provision of subsection (a)(1), the Secretary may pay the costs of on-the-job training of an adversely affected worker under subsection (a)(1) only if—

"(1) no currently employed worker is displaced by such adversely affected worker (including partial displacement such as a reduction in the hours of nonovertime work, wages, or employment benefits),

"(2) such training does not impair existing contracts for services or collective bargaining agreements,

"(3) in the case of training which would be inconsistent with the terms of a collective bargaining agreement, the written concurrence of the labor organization concerned has been obtained,

"(4) no other individual is on layoff from the same, or any substantially equivalent, job for which such adversely affected worker is being trained,

"(5) the employer has not terminated the employment of any regular employee or otherwise reduced the workforce of the employer with the intention of filling the vacancy so created by hiring such adversely affected worker,

"(6) the job for which such adversely affected worker is being trained is not being created in a promotional line that will infringe in any way upon the promotional opportunities of currently employed individuals,

"(7) such training is not for the same occupation from which the worker was separated and with respect to which such worker's group was certified pursuant to section 222,

"(8) the employer certifies to the Secretary that the employer will continue to employ such worker for at least 26 weeks after completion of such training if the worker desires to continue such employment and the employer does not have due cause to terminate such employment,

"(9) the employer has not received payment under subsection (a)(1) with respect to any other on-the-job training provided by such employer which failed to meet the requirements of paragraphs (1), (2), (3), (4), (5), and (6), and

"(10) the employer has not taken, at any time, any action which violated the terms of any certification described in paragraph (8) made by such employer with respect to any other on-the-job training provided by such employer for which the Secretary has made a payment under subsection (a)(1).".

(b) ON-THE-JOB TRAINING DEFINED.—Section 247 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2319) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(16) The term 'on-the-job training' means training provided by an employer to an individual who is employed by the employer.".

(c) AGREEMENTS WITH THE STATES.—Section 239 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2311) is amended—

(1) by amending subsection (a)(2) by inserting "but in accordance with subsection (f)," after "where appropriate,"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(e) Agreements entered into under this section may be made with one or more State or local agencies including—

"(1) the employment service agency of such State,

"(2) any State agency carrying out title III of the Job Training Partnership Act, or

"(3) any other State or local agency administering job training or related programs.

"(f) Each cooperating State agency shall, in carrying out subsection (a)(2)—

"(1) advise each adversely affected worker to apply for training under section 236(a) at the time the worker makes application for trade readjustment allowances (but failure of the worker to do so may not be treated as cause for denial of those allowances), and

"(2) within 60 days after application for training is made by the worker, interview the adversely affected worker regarding suitable training opportunities available to the worker under section 236 and review such opportunities with the worker.".

SEC. 13005. JOB SEARCH ALLOWANCES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 237 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2297) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) The Secretary shall reimburse any adversely affected worker for necessary expenses incurred by such worker in participating in a job search program approved by the Secretary.".

(b) DEFINITIONS.—Section 247 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2319), as amended by section 13004(b) of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(17)(A) The term 'job search program' means a job search workshop or job finding club.

"(B) The term 'job search workshop' means a short (1 to 3 days) seminar designed to provide participants with knowledge that will enable the participants to find jobs. Subjects are not limited to, but should include, labor market information, resume writing, interviewing techniques, and techniques for finding job openings.

"(C) The term 'job finding club' means a job search workshop which includes a period (1 to 2 weeks) of structured, supervised activity in which participants attempt to obtain jobs.".

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry has scheduled a markup on S. 2045, a bill to amend the Commodity Exchange Act to reauthorize appropriations to carry out such act, and for other purposes.

The markup is to be held on Tuesday, March 25, 1986, at 9:30 a.m. in room 328-A Russell Senate Office Building.

Please contact the committee staff at 224-2035 if further information is needed.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS, RESERVED WATER, AND RESOURCES CONSERVATION

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the public, the scheduling of hearings before the Senate Subcommittee on Public Lands, Reserved Water and Resource Conservation on Monday, March 31, 1986, in Kotzebue, AK, and Wednesday, April 2, 1986, in Bethel, AK, on S. 2065, to amend the Alaska Native Claims Act to provide Alaska Natives with certain options for the continued ownership of lands and corporate shares pursuant to the Act and for other purposes.

The hearing on Monday, March 31, 1986, will be held from 12:30 p.m. to 5 p.m. at the Kotzebue Senior Citizens Center in Kotzebue, AK. The hearing on Wednesday, April 2, 1986, will be held from 9:00 a.m. to 5 p.m. at the VFW Club in Bethel, AK.

Witnesses are asked to limit their oral testimony to 3 to 5 minutes. Witnesses will be placed in panels. Those wishing to testify should sign up in advance of the hearing no later than close of business on Thursday, March 27, 1986. Witnesses are requested to bring five copies of their testimony with them to the hearing.

Those wishing to testify should contact one of the offices of Senator Murkowski at the following addresses: 701 C Street, Box 1, Anchorage, AK 99513, 907-271-3735; 101 12th Avenue, Box 7, Fairbanks, AK 99701, 907-456-0233; or Box 1647, Federal Building, Juneau, AK 99802, 907-586-7400.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING, HOUSING, AND URBAN AFFAIRS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, March 13, 1986, in order to conduct a hearing on S. 1763, S. 2058, and S. 2076, and also to act on four nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON DEFENSE ACQUISITION POLICY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Defense Acquisition Policy, of the Committee on Armed Services, be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, March 13, 1986, in order to receive testimony on S. 2082, the Defense Acquisition Enterprize And Initiative Act of 1986.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON INVESTIGATION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Investigations, of the Committee on Governmental Affairs, be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, March 13, 1986, in order to conduct a hearing on airline safety in the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

TOBACCO AND THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE HEALTH PROMOTION DIRECTIVE

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, on Tuesday, the Secretary of Defense released a health promotion directive which is a disappointment to those of us who are concerned about the health of military service members and their families. By omitting from this directive positive and substantive provisions which would have discounted the Department of Defense subsidies for tobacco products sold on military installations, the Secretary missed a significant opportunity to improve the quality of life of those who serve in the Armed Forces.

This directive guarantees that the Department of Defense will continue to subsidize disease and premature death among its personnel and their families. Additional service members and their families will suffer from lung cancer, heart disease, and other smoking-related maladies as a result of this directive. These individuals will seek medical care for their diseases in military hospitals and in VA medical centers. Taxpayers will foot the bill for this care.

Everyone lost on Tuesday, Mr. President, with the exception of the tobacco industry. It is the taxpayer and the service members and their families who are the biggest losers. The former will pay more in taxes for the health care of smokers; the latter will suffer needlessly from preventable diseases.

This directive could have been and should have been more effective. On February 5, Senators CHAFEE, BOREN, LUGAR, PROXMIRE, HATFIELD, KENNEDY, and HEINZ joined me in writing to Secretary Weinberger urging him to stop the subsidy of tobacco products on military installations. The Secretary has chosen not to do so.

Instead, the Secretary's directive calls for aggressive educational programs regarding smoking and its danger. I support such programs and I am pleased that they are included in the directive. But this is quite simply not enough. Judging from press reports, as well as from his own comments in a memorandum to the service Secretaries outlining the directive, I am convinced that Secretary Weinberger understands and even agrees with those of us in the Senate who wrote him. The overwhelming evidence regarding the ill-effects of smoking on the military community has not escaped his notice. I believe that he would have liked to have included an end to the military tobacco subsidy in his directive. However, the supporters of the tobacco industry, both in Congress and in the administration, are many and vocal. They have persuaded the Secretary to put off any increase in tobacco prices in commissaries and exchanges to the indefinite future, after "a reasonable trial of the intense antismoking campaign." Once again we see good public policy sacrificed in order to satisfy the demands of special interest politics.

Tuesday's announcement further highlights the schizophrenic approach of the Federal Government with regard to tobacco. The Secretary notes these "undesirable inconsistencies" in his memorandum to the service Secretaries. With this directive, we will continue to encourage military personnel to smoke by keeping cigarette prices far below the prevailing local rate, even though we will be spending taxpayer's dollars to warn the same personnel of the dangers inherent in the use of tobacco. This is nothing short of absurd, Mr. President.

This is not, however, the last word on this matter. What the Secretary has failed to do administratively can still be done legislatively. I intend to offer an amendment to the 1987 Defense Authorization Act to require that prices of tobacco products in commissaries and exchanges be raised to the prevailing local rate. The additional revenues raised by higher tobacco prices will be returned to the morale and welfare fund in the case of exchanges and to improved operations in the case of commissaries. In that way, we will provide a real benefit to the majority of the military community who do not smoke by discontinuing subsidies to the minority who do.●

DEDUCTIBILITY OF STATE AND LOCAL TAXES

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I have recently called to the attention of my colleagues a recent series of articles in the Washington Times by nationally syndicated economics columnist Warren Brookes concerning the deductibility of State and local taxes. Today, I would commend to my colleagues an article which appeared in the December 1984/January 1985 issue of "People & Taxes," a newsletter published by Ralph Nader's group, Public Citizen. The support for the elimination of this unfair deduction demonstrated by Public Citizen in this article, I believe, helps to show that people of varying political views agree on at least one aspect of tax reform: Repealing the deduction for State and local taxes must be eliminated in order to achieve true tax reform.

In this article, the deduction receives the award for being the "Loophole of the Month." The article points out the important fact that, while looked at in isolation, repeal could cause some problems, when overall tax reform is taken into consideration, most taxpayers, even those in high-tax States, would be better off. The House tax bill demonstrates clearly that such is not the case if this deduction is retained. Many Americans would face higher tax rates under the House bill for the simple reason that the House pushes taxpayers into higher tax brackets at lower threshold levels. Why did the House lower the income thresholds? Because additional revenue was needed to pay for retaining deductibility.

The article goes on to point out a fact that has not received much attention. Opponents of repeal claim that States will be pressured to reduce taxes since they will no longer be deductible. This would then lead to a reduction in essential services. However, this entire argument ignores one important fact, a fact of which the States are well aware: the overwhelming majority of States piggy-back on the Federal personal income tax by using Federal law to determine individuals State tax liabilities. Even more States utilize the Federal measurement rules for corporate income tax purposes. When the Federal tax base is broadened, the States' tax bases are also broadened. Without the accompanying reduction in rates, States will see their revenue coffers overflowing with money. This would then provide the States with the politically appealing prospect of reducing taxes without adversely affecting revenues. Mr. President, I cannot understand why this fact has not received more attention. Even more to the point, I cannot understand why opponents of repeal are using this argument at all. It is clearly a misstatement of the fact which I take this opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues.

Mr. President, the arguments raised by the Public Citizen article further demonstrate the fairness issue involved in deductibility. I would urge my colleagues to strongly consider the points made by public citizen as the Senate continues consideration of the tax reform issue.

Mr. President, I ask that the article referred to above appear in the RECORD.

The article is as follows:

FROSTBELT LIBERALS AMBUSH TAX REFORM

(By Matthew Cooper)

The first principle of constitutional government, Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D-NY) recently observed with indignation, is to avoid assessing taxes. So much for "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," which most Americans probably regard as the fundamentals of government.

Moynihan, regarded as a learned historian and one of his party's leading intellectuals, is simply engaging in the ancient political alchemy of trying to turn pork barreling into something more noble. There has been a lot of that going around since the Treasury Department issued its tax reform plan in November.

Every interest group has its gripe. The gripe for Moynihan and many other Democrats is the Treasury plan's proposal to eliminate the current federal tax deduction for individuals' payments of state and local property, income and sales taxes. A group of liberal politicians, who might otherwise be expected to offer strong support for a Treasury proposal that reduces taxes an average of 8.5 percent on all taxpayers, has ripped Treasury's plan largely because it would kill a single tax break used by fewer than one-third of all taxpayers.

About half of the tax benefits from the federal deduction for state and local taxes go to households earning more than $50,000. Out of every tax dollar saved by individuals using the present deduction, about 82 cents end up in the pocket of persons earings above $30,000. Despite those statistics, Moynihan and seveal other Democrats who represent high-tax Frostbelt states say they will continue to spurn Treasury's package until and unless Treasury agrees to preserve the deduction for state and local taxes.

The federal tax deduction for levies paid to state and local governments does not qualify as a blatant squandering of the public trust. It's not on a par with, say, the writeoff that permits attorneys to deduct their bar conferences on cruise ships,

Moynihan, New York Gov. Mario Cuomo, and other spokesmen for states with high tax rates argue that repeal of the federal deduction would mean a large tax hike for the average taxpayer, falling disproportionately on residents in New York, Massachusetts, Delaware, Maryland, Wisconsin, California and other states with high taxes on income and property. Several lawmakers, therefore, have complained about a regional unfairness in Treasury's plan. Furthermore, it is perceived as a double tax on the same income, rubbing salt in the wound of state taxpayers and lending defenders of the deduction their most attractive argument. "Monies paid to a state or a local government don't constitute income available for (federal) taxes," Moynihan explained. "It's already disappeared. It's not income."

Moynihan's scholarly vexation at double taxation will be news to taxpayers whose income has always been taxed twice—for social security and for income taxes. Businesses have also long complained that corporate income taxes amount to double taxation on the same dollar—once at the corporate level and later at the shareholders' level.

Estimates vary, but the 44 percent of New Yorkers who use the federal deduction for state and local taxes save an average of nearly $900 off their federal tax bill. That compares to a tax savings for itemizers in Massachusetts of about $650, and a tax break of only $230 for Floridians, whose state tax burden ranks among the lowest in the nation.

Defenders of the present deduction fear that if the deduction is repealed, citizens in high-tax states will feel the full weight of heavy state and local taxes. New York state politicians, for example, fret that tax-slashing and budget-cutting movements would foment in every hamlet from Buffalo to the Bronx. Beseiged state lawmakers, so the scenario goes, will be forced to cut taxes, axe services, and curtail programs aiding the poor.

Since New Yorkers use the deduction more than residents of other states do, New York politicians have emerged as the most outspoken critics of this portion of the Treasury proposal. Cuomo charged that it would "pulverzie the middle class." Moynihan was quoted as saying, "Goddamn it, they're trying to wreck our state." Calling the plan, "ruinous," Moynihan vowed, "I'm on the Senate Finance Committee to see it doesn't happen."

In the House of Representatives, liberal Rep. David Obey (D-Wisc.), only hours after Treasury announced its comprehensive reform proposal, warned his House colleagues that "your state and mine . . . will get the shaft." Obey's state ranks fifth in the country in usage of the federal deduction for state and local taxes.

WEIGHING THE GOODIES

Some of these nightmares might occur if the Treasury eliminated deductions piecemeal. But if implemented in its entirety, the complete package of tax reform offered by Treasury Secretary Donald Regan would leave most taxpayers better off—even those in high-tax states.

Even though residents of New York state are more likely to itemize their deductions than persons in other states, about six out of ten New Yorkers do not itemize and therefore never use the deduction for state and local taxes. Even many itemizers who would use the state-local deduction would fare well when the Treasury plan is viewed in its entirety.

According to Treasury statistics, a New York family with a median income of $35,160 pays total federal taxes of $3,205 under present law, compared with $3,182 under Regan's plan—a savings of $23 per year even though state and local taxes could no longer be deducted. In other words, for many families, the tax increase caused by termination of the state-local tax deduction would be outweighed by other tax reductions in the Treasury's plan: doubling tax exemptions to $2,000 for each family member, expanding the standard deduction for non-itemizers, increasing the write-offs for individual retirement accounts, lowering marginal tax rates, and other goodies. Mr. and Ms. Albany would enjoy their share of federal tax cutting.

State treasuries may find the least to whine about. A tax reform that gives many citizens an overall tax cut is hardly the impetus for a state-level tax revolt. States, in fact, could reap a politician's dream—the opportunity to cut taxes if Treasury's plan becomes law.

At present, 34 state tax systems "piggyback" on the federal personal income tax by using federal law to determine individuals' state tax liabilities. Many of the 46 states with corporate income taxes rely on income measurement rules of the federal corporate tax. When Treasury broadens the tax base, states automatically broaden theirs.

Gov. Cuomo, when quizzed about why he would oppose this potential windfall to New York's state coffers, replied, "Well, we don't want them (additional taxes). That's the whole point. It would chase people out of the state." If Cuomo disdains additional state revenue, however, he has one enviable choice: cut taxes. That's not a bad predicament for any politician.

TAX BREAK AS SUBSIDY

Treasury officials have attempted to turn the Frostbelt liberals' own fairness argument against them by emphasizing that the current deduction amounts to a larger subsidy for taxpayers in high-tax states than in low-tax states. Moynihan bridled at Treasury's use of the word "subsidy." "There is something to be resisted in the notion that what the federal government doesn't tax, it has given you," he told the New York Times. Moynihan admitted, however, that he vilified oil companies' write-offs as "subsidies" because, he said, "we don't have any oil wells in New York."

Texans, whose state has grown rich on oil revenues, have little need for federal deductions for state and local taxes. New Yorkers, whose state raises revenue from sales, property and income taxes, have little need for federal write-offs for oil drilling.

And there lies the basis for a selfless compromise, if Frostbelt liberals really want to support Treasury's tax reform package. But if they don't, there lurks the basis for an unholy alliance.●

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION DAY

● Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I would like to join Sigma Delta Chi, the Society of Professional Journalists, in commemorating March 16, 1986, as Freedom of Information Day.

As a former journalist myself, I know just how vital the exchange of information must be in a democratic society. Of all the rights we cherish in America, the right to know is among the most important.

Now is the time to reflect on the foundations of our freedom, from the first amendment to the Freedom of Information Act, and to renew our resolve to protect them from future assaults. We must always remember that democracy, like so many special creatures, cannot survive in captivity, but only in the open.

It seems particularly appropriate to mark this occasion on March 16, the birthday of James Madison, who perhaps did more for American freedom than anyone else in our history. As the Father of the Constitution and the principal author of the first amendment, Madison had the foresight to design a free society that could keep itself free. He understood—and in 40 years of public service, helped to prove—that democracy was mankind's greatest and most powerful invention.

We owe it to our forefathers and our children to keep fighting for the freedoms that make democracy work.●

INNA AND NAUM MEIMAN: A LOOK AT THEIR LIVES

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, although many of my colleagues have participated in the Congressional Call to Conscience to draw attention to the plight of Soviet Jewry, only a few of us have had the opportunity to actually meet the Soviet Jews who fill our hearts and minds with concern. Because of this, I want to acquaint my colleagues with the lifestyle of two friends of mine, Inna and Naum Meiman.

The Meimans were married, both for the second time, in 1981. Naum is a physicist. Inna is an English tutor in her midfifties. Naum has a daughter in Colorado who emigrated some years ago.

I visited their apartment in Moscow on the fifth floor. The building does not have an elevator which makes life very difficult for 72-year-old Naum and for Inna who is critically ill with cancer. Naum has lived there for over 30 years.

As visitors come into the apartment, Naum makes a fuss, giving house slippers and making sure that you have a comfortable place to sit. Like any hospitable couple, Naum and Inna bring out some sort of sweet and the inevitable Russian tea.

Visiting with Naum and Inna is like going to any friend's house—with one major exception. As foreigners, you and I can leave. The Meimans, and others like them, live each day in hope. Without our voices, my colleagues, their hopes may fade. We cannot allow ourselves to grow silent.

I urge the Soviet authorities to allow Inna and Naum Meiman to emigrate.●

UNITED STATES POLICY ON CHILEAN HUMAN RIGHTS

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I rise today to express my support for the Reagan administration's efforts to call attention to the current human rights situation in Chile.

As a member of the board of International Friends of the Chilean Human Rights Commission, I have seen detailed evidence of the Pinochet government's poor performance in the area of human rights. The Department of State's 1985 report on Chile's human rights practices further underlines the concern of our Government:

Reliable and documented reports of torture and mistreatment of those detained by the authorities continue to be received by human rights organizations, and there was an increase in charges by human rights groups and government opponents of temporary kidnappings, beatings, and torture by persons frequently reported to be agents of the security forces. There continued to be a high level of far left terrorism, to which was attributed the murders of military and police officers and civilians, as well as the bombing of installations identified with the Chilean government or the United States, such as Mormon churches, U.S.-owned companies, and binational centers.

Yesterday, Assistant Secretary of State Richard Schifter introduced a draft resolution on Chile at the annual session of the United Nations Human Rights Commission in Geneva. This resolution firmly places the United States among such democratic states as Venezuela, Costa Rica, West Germany, and Britain in collective opposition to the human rights performance of the Chilean Government. While I am pleased that Chile's Government was concerned enough about its international reputation that it permitted full access to the U.N.'s Special Rapporteur on Chile, Professor Fernando Volio of Costa Rica, I am disturbed that President Pinochet's response has been to attack his domestic critics in the democratic parties and to criticize foreign interference in Chile's affairs.

Professor Volio's report on Chile expresses the special Rapporteur's concern about the incidence of torture and physical abuse against political opponents of the government and human rights activists. More specifically, this U.N. report states that:

Such violations as well-founded reports of torture and abuses by security forces, the climate of insecurity for those involved in church and human rights work, the prohibition preventing several thousand Chilean exiles from returning to their country, and the suppression of fundamental political rights and freedoms through the maintenance of exceptional executive powers during the prolonged period in which States of Exception to constitutional rights have been in effect.

It is my hope that the Chilean Government would respond in a positive and constructive way to the recommendations suggested in Professor Volio's report. Such human rights violations are a blot on Chile's past reputation as a stronghold of democracy in the Americas. It is my understanding that Ambassador Schifter has now moved to table the American resolution on Chile, so that it might be acted upon expeditiously. I further understand that another, more strident resolution has been subsequently offered by Mexico, Yugoslavia, and Algeria. These governments should give full consideration to the importance of having the U.N. Human Rights Commission speak with one voice on this humanitarian issue. Knowing these facts, there should be no misunderstanding of where the United States stands on human rights in Chile and what the most constructive approach to encouraging a transition to democracy in Chile ought to be.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article from today's New York Times on Chile as well as the text of the United States draft resolution on Chile be printed in the RECORD.

UNITED STATES, IN REVERSAL, FAULTS CHILEANS OVER RIGHTS ISSUE

(By Bernard Gwertzman)

WASHINGTON, March 12.—The United States, in a reversal of policy, today expressed concern over the human rights situation in Chile. It called on other countries to support a United Nations resolution condemning the Chilean rights record.

State Department officials said the United States had been quietly pressing for months in favor of changes under the military government of President Augusto Pinochet, which has been in power in Chile since 1973.

But they said that the efforts had been frustrated and that the United States has therefore decided not only to publicize its unhappiness in a public statement but also to denounce Chile in a resolution of the United Nations Human Rights Commission in Geneva.

U.S. FEARS LEFTIST INROADS

The criticism of Chile follows American support for the ouster of Jean-Claude Duvalier in Haiti and of Ferdinand E. Marcos in the Philippines, both of whom has also been accused of rights violations by Washington.

The United States says it fears the failure of General Pinochet to create room for a non-Communist opposition will make a sham of the political transition he has promised and enhance support for Communists.

A Constitution that took effect in Chile in March 1981 provides for continued direct rule by the military junta until 1989, when presidential elections are to mark the beginning of a phased return to full civilian rule by 1997.

The draft resolution introduced by the United States in the United Nations rights commission marked the first time that it had taken the lead in criticizing Chile before that body. In past years, the Reagan Administration had either voted against or abstained on anti-Chilean resolutions.

Richard Schifter, the Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs, said at a news conference in Geneva today that the United States had made public its criticism because Chile had not responded to quiet diplomacy.

Charles E. Redman, a State Department spokesman, said the United States had also decided to introduce its own resolution because it has been dissatisfied with resolutions offered in the past by Cuba and others.

"We believe the resolution we introduced in Geneva presents the human rights situation in Chile in an objective way and hope that other countries will join us in supporting this text," Mr. Redman said.

The resolution, although commending Chile for admitting a United Nations human rights observer last year, noted the allegations made by the observer and expressed concern "at the persistence of serious violations of human rights in Chile."

The draft resolution said the Human Rights Commission "notes with particular dismay the ineffectiveness of government and judicial authorities in preventing the recurrence of abuses by security forces, and expresses special concern over the failure of the Government of Chile to insure the thorough investigation and persecution of the many recent cases of kidnapping and torture."

American officials said the criticism had apparently caused concern in Chile. United Press International reported that General Pinochet met today with his Cabinet to discuss the American condemnation of Chile's rights record.

CHILEAN BISHOPS ISSUE AN APPEAL

SANTIAGO, Chile, March 12 (Reuters).—The Roman Catholic bishops today urged the Government to listen to its opponents and said that punitive laws and disproportionate repression were illegitimate.

In a statement issued by the Permanent Committee of the Episcopal Conference, the bishops also spoke out against the use of violence and said a visit by Pope John Paul II next year was not meant to support either the Government or the opposition. Leftists have urged the Pope not to come.

The bishops' statement came a day after the Government marked the fifth anniversary of the 1981 Constitution with an uncompromising speech by Interior Minister Ricardo Garcia and a wave of bombings by leftist guerrillas.

The bombings caused blackouts in Concepción and in some parts of Valparaíso, Viña del Mar and Santiago, the police said.

UNHRC 1986 DRAFT RESOLUTION

The Commission on Human Rights, aware of its responsibility to promote and encourage respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and resolved to remain vigilant with regard to violations of human rights wherever they occur.

Noting the obligation of the government of Chile to respect and protect human rights in accordance with the international instruments to which Chile is a party, an obligation which is not different from that of any other government which is a party to international human rights instruments.

Recalling its successive resolutions on the situation of human rights in Chile and in particular its resolution 11 (XXXV) of 6 March 1979, by which it appointed a special rapporteur on the situation of those rights, and its resolution of 1985/47 of 14 March 1985, in which it agreed most recently to extend the mandate of the special rapporteur for one more year, and in view of the serious human rights violations in Chile to give high priority to the study of this issue.

Recalling also the concern expressed by the general assembly on the situation of human rights in Chile in its resolutions 3219 (XXIX) of 6 November 1974, 3448 (XXX) of 9 December 1975, 31/124 of 16 December 1976, 32/118 of 16 December 1977, 33/175 of 20 December 1978, 34/179 of 17 December 1979, 35/188 of 15 December 1980, 36/157 of 16 December 1981, 37/183 of 17 December 1982, 38/102 of 16 December 1983, 39/121 of 14 December 1984 and in particular, general assembly resolution 40/145 of 13 December 1985 in which the assembly invited the commission on human rights to take the most appropriate steps for the effective restoration of human rights and fundamental freedoms in that country, including the extension of the mandate of the special rapporteur for one more year.

Having examined the special rapporteur's report:

1. Commends the special rapporteur for his report on the situation of human rights in Chile, prepared in accordance with resolution 1985/47, and the efforts made by the special rapporteur during his stay in Chile.

2. Recognizes as a positive development the fact that the government of Chile permitted the special rapporteur to enter the country and provided the cooperation and freedom of access to persons of all social, political and economic interests necessary for his investigation.

3. Expresses its concern, nevertheless, at the persistence of serious violations of human rights in Chile, as described in the report of the special rapporteur, which refers to such violations as well-founded reports of disappearances and of torture and abuses by security forces, the climate of insecurity for those involved in church and human rights work, the prohibition preventing several thousand Chilean exiles from returning to their country, and the suppression of fundamental political rights and freedoms through the maintenance of exceptional executive powers during the prolonged period in which states of exception to constitutional rights have been in effect.

4. Notes with particular dismay the ineffectiveness of government and judicial authorities in preventing the recurrence of abuses by security forces, and expresses special concern over the failure of the government of Chile to ensure the thorough investigation and prosecution of the many recent unsolved cases of kidnapping and torture.

5. Expresses its conviction that a legal and political structure, based on the consent of the governed, emerging from a civilized and constructive national dialogue between the concerned parties, representative of the will of the people, and respecting the full exercise of civil and political rights, including those of trade unions, is essential to the full observance of human rights in Chile, as in any other nation.

6. Once again appeals to the Government of Chile to restore and respect human rights in harmony with provisions of the universal declaration of human rights and in accordance with obligations it has assumed under various international instruments, and to re-establish democratic institutions and the principle of legality essential to the effective enjoyment and exercise of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

7. Strongly recommends the government of Chile take at least the following steps, in conformity with the information and recommendations of the report of the special rapporteur, and adopt the measures necessary and conducive thereto:

A. Immediately put an end to all forms of physical and psychological torture by the security and police forces and, in order to accomplish that result, reiterate and make public the order of July 30, 1985 by Ministers of Defense and Interior which calls for an end to these abuses;

B. Proceed vigorously through judicial and administrative action to investigate all reports of torture, killings, kidnappings, or other human rights violations by the security forces, take appropriate action against all persons found guilty of such violations, and effect such reorganization of the same security forces as may be necessary to end persistent problems of human rights;

C. Establish a permanent system to monitor the conduct of the security and police forces, including the National Center of Investigations;

D. Cooperate fully and effectively with investigations of recent unsolved assaults against persons engaged in human rights activities and take vigorous steps to protect such persons against future assaults;

E. Proceed vigorously to end the activities of groups and bands, whether private or connected with security forces, which have been reported to be responsible for kidnappings, interrogations, intimidation and beatings of ordinary citizens, and punish those responsible, especially the leaders of these groups;

F. Cooperate fully and effectively with investigations ordered in judicial proceedings on criminal cases or complaints in the civilian and military tribunals, and reform the legal system to guarantee the maximum effectiveness of judicial remedies, particularly amparo and habeas corpus;

G. Punish persons found to have been guilty of terrorist acts, under due process of law, without using the problem of terrorism as a justification for any abuse of authority against persons engaged in non-violent opposition;

H. Maintain law and order without resort to excessive use of force by security and police authorities which can cause injury or death to innocent bystanders or other persons not engaged in violent acts;

I. Amend the law authorizing the declaration of a state of exception so as to limit the time and circumstances under which such state of exception may be in effect and bring the law into conformity with constitutional guarantees of human rights;

J. End the practice of ordering internal banishment without recourse to the judicial system;

K. Allow the return of all Chilean citizens now living abroad who wish to return.

8. Requests that the government of Chile continue and increase its cooperation with the special rapporteur and fully implement his recommendations, and invites the government to submit any comments it may have to the commission on human rights at its forty-third session.

9. Decides to extend the mandate of the special rapporteur for one year and to request him to report on the situation on human rights in Chile to the General Assembly at its forty-first session and the Commission on Human Rights at its forty-third session.

10. Recommends to the Economic and Social council that it make appropriate arrangements to ensure that the necessary financial resources and sufficient staff are provided to implement this resolution.●

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY AND AMERICAN ACADEMICS

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, one of the great tragedies of the 1960's and 1970's was the withdrawal, by American academics, of cooperation with the analytic arms of U.S. intelligence. This country produces some of the finest research and writing on foreign countries and foreign policy that the world has ever seen. American academics, with their fine training and years of experience, frequently develop expertise on particular countries that no intelligence organization can match, despite its access to secret sources.

U.S. intelligence agencies want and need the help of academic experts. They need the "reality check" that an outside expert can provide by critiquing their analyses. They need the fresh ideas that an outsider can inject into the intelligence process. Often, because of personnel turnover, they need the basic guidance that a seasoned expert can provide to get a new analyst off to a good start.

Intelligence is a vital part of the policy process. Academics should be proud to help make the policy process more rational by ensuring that it is based upon the best possible information and analysis.

American academics, in turn, need some things from U.S. intelligence agencies. They need the freedom to state their views without censorship—except as required to delete sensitive intelligence sources and methods or other classified information. They need enough insulation from the operational side of U.S. intelligence that their cooperation with analysts will not lessen their ability to conduct research in foreign countries. And they need the right and encouragement to be forthright with their employers and the public regarding any financial support received from U.S. agencies.

The recent case of Nadav Safran, a truly distinguished professor at Harvard University who was faulted for not disclosing CIA support for an academic conference, illustrates very well both our need for academics to help U.S. intelligence and the need to guard against accidental harm to those academics and to free academic enquiry everywhere. Professor Safran exemplifies the type of insightful scholar who can really make a difference by applying his rigorous analytic approach to problems of U.S. intelligence. His resignation as director of Harvard's Center for Middle Eastern Studies is a good example of the harm that can come from keeping the service to his country so secret that it offends scholarly canons or university rules.

The CIA has learned from this case; they are both changing their rules regarding contracts with academics and reaching out to the academic community to exchange views on this issue. Recently, the CIA's Deputy Director for Intelligence, Robert M. Gates, presented the CIA's latest position in a thoughtful address at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government. His discussion may not be the last word, but it is well worth reading. Both the CIA and the Select Committee on Intelligence would be most interested in hearing the reactions of American scholars, for we are serious when we say that America needs their contributions to the intelligence and policy processes.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of Mr. Gate's address on "CIA and the University" be printed in the RECORD.

The address follows:

CIA AND THE UNIVERSITY

I welcome this opportunity to come to Harvard and speak about the relationship between the Central Intelligence Agency, especially its analytical/research arm, and the academic community. Recent events here have again sparked broad discussion of both the propriety and wisdom of university scholars cooperating in any way with American intelligence. On December 3rd of last year the Boston Globe stated "The scholar who works for a government intelligence agency ceases to be an independent spirit, a true scholar." These are strong words. In my view they are absolutely wrong. Nonetheless, there are real concerns that should be addressed.

My remarks tonight center on two simple propositions:

First, preserving the liberty of this nation is fundamental to and prerequisite for the preservation of academic freedom; the university community cannot prosper and protect freedom of inquiry oblivious to the fortunes of the nation.

Second, in defending the nation and our liberties, the Federal Government needs to have recourse to the best minds in the country, including those in the academic community. Tensions inevitably accompany the relationship between defense, intelligence and academe, but mutual need and benefit require reconciliation or elimination of such tensions.

THE HISTORY OF CIA-UNIVERSITY RELATIONS

In discussing the relationship between the academic community and American intelligence, and specifically the research and analysis side of intelligence, it is important to go back to antecedents which, coincidentally, have important links to Harvard. In the summer of 1941, William J. Donovan persuaded President Roosevelt of the need to organize a coordinated foreign intelligence service to inform the government about fast moving world events. He proposed that the service "draw on the universities for experts with long foreign experience and specialized knowledge of the history, languages and general conditions of various countries." President Roosevelt agreed and created the Office of the Coordinator of Information, later renamed the Office of Special Services, under Donovan's leadership. The prominent Harvard historian, William L. Langer, was recruited as the Director of Research and he in turn, recruited some of the finest scholars in America for the OSS, many of them from Harvard, Yale, and Columbia Universities.

When CIA was established by the National Security Act of 1947, this pattern was repeated. Langer returned to establish the Board of National Estimates. Robert Amory of the Harvard Law School faculty was named CIA's Deputy Director for Intelligence in 1952, and served in that capacity for nearly ten years. Other academicians who joined included: Historians such as Ludwell Montague, Sherman Kent, Joseph Strayer and DeForrest Van Slyck; economist Max Millikan, who organized the economic intelligence effort; economist Richard Bissell, who later headed the clandestine service; and even Willian Sloane Coffin who left the Union Theological Seminary to join CIA for the duration of the Korean War before becoming Chaplain at Yale. He is quoted as recalling that he joined the Agency because "Stalin made Hitler look like a Boy Scout." It was a common reason for academicians to join the Agency in the early years.

Relations between the scholarly community and CIA were cordial throughout the 1950s. The cold war at its height and faculty or students rarely questioned the nation's need for the Agency and its activities. Some of the most noted university professors of the time served on a regular basis as unpaid consultants, helping CIA to form its estimates of probable trends in world politics.

These halcyon days were soon to change. There was some criticism on campuses over CIA's involvement in the Bay of Pigs expedition in 1961. But the real deterioration in relations between CIA and the academe paralleled the wrenching divisions in the country over the Vietnam War, despite continuing academic cooperation with the Directorate of Intelligence. The decline in CIA-academia ties accelerated with the February 1967 disclosure in Ramparts magazine that CIA had been funding the foreign activities of the National Student Association for a number of years.

Sensational allegations of wrongdoing by CIA became more frequent in the media in the early 1970s, culminating the establishment of the Rockefeller Commission and subsequently both the Church Committee in the Senate and the Pike Committee in the House of Representatives.

Even the Church Committee, however, so critical of other intelligence activities, recognized that CIA "must have unfettered access to the best advice and judgment our universities can produce." The Committee recommended that academic advice and judgment of academics he openly sought. The Committee concluded that the principal responsibility for setting the terms of the relationship between CIA and academe should rest with college administrators and other academic officials. "The Committee believes that it is the responsibility of . . . the American academic community to set the professional and ethical standards of its members."

This paralleled considerable debate within academic ranks and numerous articles about the relationship between the universities and CIA. In response to a letter from the President of the American Association of University Professors, then CIA Director George Bush replied that the Agency sought "only the voluntary and willing cooperation of individuals who can help the foreign policy processes of the United States." The Director stated that where relationships are confidential they are usually so at the request of the scholars, rather than the Agency, and he refused to isolate the Agency from "the good counsel of the best scholars in our country."

Adopting this approach, Director Stansfield Turner engaged in a long and eventually unsuccessful effort to reach agreement with President Bok of Harvard on relations between this university and the Agency. (Ironically, at this time, another Harvard professor, Robert Bowie, was my predecessor as head of the analytical element of the Agency.) Some academic institutions adopted guidelines similar to the restrictive regulations established at Harvard; in most cases less severe guidelines were proposed. In a great majority of schools where the issue arose, however, the faculty and administration rejected any guidelines, usually on the grounds that existing regulations or practices were adequate to protect both the institution and individuals.

The Agency's relations with the academic would have improved in recent years for a variety of reasons, including developments abroad and recognition in the academic community that CIA, together with the Departments of State and Defense, has been an important and useful supporter of area and regional studies and foreign language studies in the United States. The agencies of the American intelligence community as well as the Department of State have long been a primary source of employment for specialists in these areas. The academic community also consulted closely with senior officials of the intelligence community in their successful campaign to win support for a Congressional-approved endowment of Soviet studies. Intelligence agencies informally strongly supported this endeavor.

In some areas of research, such as on the Soviet Union, our cooperation for nearly 40 years has remained both close and constant. This also has been the case often in the fields of economics and physical sciences. On the other hand, there have been much more pronounced ups and downs in our relationships with political scientists and allied social sciences, particularly among those with expertise in the Third World.

WHY CIA NEEDS ACADEME

There is, however, one constant in the history of this relationship and in its future as well: our need for your help, and the opportunity you have to contribute to a better informed policymaking process by cooperating with us. Let me describe how and why.

In just the last dozen years, we have been confronted with a large number of new issues and developments and also have had to pay attention to problems too long neglected. The oil embargo of 1973, the subsequent skyrocketing of oil prices and now their plunge; the related dramatic changes in the international economic system, the growth of debt in Third World countries and now repayment problems; revolutions in Iran, Ethiopia, and Nicaragua; the final passage of European colonialism from Africa; new Soviet beachheads and surrogates in the Third World; changing patterns in international trade; and the growth of technology transfer, international narcotics networks and terrorism all have demonstrated vividly that our national security is greatly affected by developments and events in addition to the number and capabilities of Soviet strategic weapons.

Accordingly, the subjects we deal with today are staggering in their diversity. They include problems such as the implications of the enormous indebtedness of key Third World countries; problems of political, economic and social instability and how to forecast them; human rights; narcotics; the illicit arms market; the implications of immigration flows in various regions of the world; population trends and their political and security implications; the global food supply; water resources; energy; technology transfer; terrorism; proliferation of chemical/biological and nuclear weapons; changing commodity markets and their implications for Third World countries; and others too numerous to recount.

But nearly all of these problems have something in common: while CIA has experts in virtually all subjects of concern, there is a vast reservoir of expertise, experience, and insight in the community of university scholars that can help us, and through us, the American government, better understand these problems and their implications for us and for international stability.

With this diversity of issues and problems in mind, the Directorate of Intelligence several years ago initiated an intensified effort to reach out to the academic community, think tanks of every stripe, and the business community for information, analysis and advice.

Senior managers in charge of each of our substantive areas were directed to undertake an expanded program of sponsorship of conferences on substantive issues of concern to us and to encourage participation of our analysts in such conferences sponsored by the private sector. Since 1982, CIA has sponsored more than 300 conferences, nearly all of them involving considerable participation by the academic community and touching on many of the issues I noted. In addition, we have recorded more than 1,500 instances of our analysts attending conferences sponsored by the private sector—and doing so as openly acknowledged CIA employees.

We have increasingly turned to the academic community to test our assessments in ways consistent with protecting intelligence sources and methods. We have helped scholars get security clearances so that they could examine the actual drafts of our studies. A growing percentage of our work is reviewed by specialists outside the government—in the academic community and various think tanks, and by retired senior military officers, independent specialists, and others.

We have established panels of security cleared specialists from business and the academic community to meet with us regularly not only to help improve specific research papers but to help develop new research methods, review performance, and help us test new approaches and hypotheses.

Our analysts are required to refresh their own substantive credentials and expand their horizons by obtaining outside training at least every two years. This requirement can be met through taking university courses, participating in business or other outside sponsored seminars and conferences, attending military training courses, and so forth.

Our involvement with the academic community takes several forms:

Consulting: This is the most prevalent. It can be formal, under a contractual arrangement in which the individual is paid a set government rate, or it can be informal and unpaid—an exchange of views between interested specialists. We are particularly interested in ideas that challenge conventional wisdom or orthodoxy. We know what we think, but we need to know what others think also.

Sponsorship of conferences: We generally organize our own, but occasionally we contract with others to organize a conference for us. And, of course, our analysts attend conferences sponsored by business, academic and professional organizations, think tanks, and universities.

Research: In some areas, scholars in universities have the experience and expertise to carry out basic research for us, for example, on demographic and economic subjects. The recent controversy at Harvard and the media have focused on this area of cooperation. In fact, it presently is a very minor element in our overall relationship with the academic community. It is hardly a program, as recently alleged, of "covert fees and fellowships" with which we can "buy scholastic priorities."

Scholars in Residence: We have had a scholars-in-residence program for a number of years under which individuals from the academic world can spend a year or two working with us, with full security clearances, on topics of interest to them and us.

Information: Finally, we are interested in talking with scholars who are willing to share with us their impressions after traveling to places of interest or participating in events of interest abroad.

A principal factor in our pursuit of contact with scholars is our perception that quality analysis on the incredible range of issues with which we must cope requires not only dogged research but also imagination, creativity, and insight. Large organizations, and particularly government bureaucracies, are not famous for their encouragement of these characteristics—although there is surprisingly more than you might think. Similarly, to rely solely on information funneled through government channels inevitably would constrict the range of views and information needed. We are looking for people to challenge our views, to argue with us, to criticize our assessments constructively, to make us think and defend and to go back to the drawing board when we have missed something important. In short, we don't want scholars to tell us what they think we want to hear. That would make our entire effort pointless.

Finally, this relationship is not necessarily a one-way street. Just as we are conscious of our need for the injection of ideas and information from outside government channels, I believe you should concede that there is at least the possibility that you might learn something from discussions with us.

YOUR CONCERNS

Let me now address some of the major concerns that have been raised by scholars, deans, and institutions about dealing with us. I would note that certain of these concerns reach well beyond just CIA and involve the entire question of relations between outside sources of funds and the university community.

1. Doesn't research or analysis under CIA auspices of events abroad inevitably compromise academic freedom and the honesty of academic research?

First of all, when we contract for research, we insist on honest work. We do not permit our analysts to cook the books and we would never consult or contract with a scholar a second time who did that. Our research and analysis must stand up to close scrutiny, not only by other intelligence agencies, but by other elements of the executive branch, the oversight committees of the Congress, the Congress as a whole, the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board, and a variety of other panels and organizations that have access to our information. While we acknowledge we can be and have been wrong in the past, our very existence depends on our reputation for integrity and for reliable and objective assessments. Any research we use should have the same qualities.

Second, it seems to me that academic freedom depends on a scholar not being beholden to any outside influence or rigid ideological conceptions but only to the pursuit of truth. The scholar should be free to search where he or she wishes and should not be constrained by any improper influences, including the preferences of colleagues or prevailing cultural winds. Actually, improper influence potentially can be exerted on a scholar in a number of ways: funding from contracts and consultantships with business, foundations and foreign governments—or even the threat of withholding tenure. American academics have long consulted with officials of foreign governments of all stripes. In light of this, singling out a US government agency as a particular threat to honest inquiry represents a double standard if not outright hypocrisy. If a university requires public exposure of any relationship with CIA, then surely logic and equity require a similar practice for relationships with foreign governments and, in fact, all other outside relationships. And, indeed, if our funding should be openly acknowledged, should not all outside funding, of whatever source, be openly acknowledged? You are rightly proud of your ability to do objective research. CIA does not threaten it.

Third, I agree with the proposition that it is the responsibility of the university itself to establish and monitor the rules governing all these relationships. It is both foolish and irresponsible to do so by isolating the scholar from any outside contact under the guise of protecting academic freedom.

2. Won't publicly acknowledged contacts with CIA hinder a scholar's access and freedom of inquiry overseas? I acknowledge this might be a problem for some individuals. Indeed, in some places around the world, all Americans are suspected of working for CIA. However, many who have worked with us for years have not had any difficulty.

3. Can't a colleague's contacts even with CIA analysts compromise an entire department? I have been asked before about the danger of one scholar's association with us involving his or her faculty colleagues through some sort of guilt by association. I would simply offer two observations. First, the university community is a remarkably diverse one and I am sure that in many departments there are scholars who are involved in some sort of activity with which their colleagues disagree or which they do not support. So again, this problem is not limited just to CIA. Some form of reporting to the university on such relationships that could be kept confidential would seem to me an appropriate way to minimize this problem. My second observation, however, is that at some point some courage is called for. The freedom of those who do wish to consult with us can be infringed upon by the fears of their colleagues. We do not believe that working with your government to help bring about better informed policy is shameful; indeed, it should be a source of pride and satisfaction. Contributing to a better understanding of some of the most difficult and occasionally dangerous problems of the world, in my view, is responsive to the scholar's highest calling.

4. Isn't prepublication review tantamount to CIA censorship of independent ideas, opinions and judgments? No. Our review is only to ensure that no classified information is included in a book or article and that the text does not reveal intelligence sources and methods. We have no interest in altering the substance or conclusions of writings we review and take great care to avoid asking for such changes. And the fact is: we don't. Where a consultant has no access to classified information, there is no prepublication review.

5. What about the view that CIA engages in covert action as well as collection and analysis and a variety of "immoral" acts and therefore association with any part of CIA is unacceptable? Activities at CIA are carried out within the law with the approval of appropriate authorities, and with the oversight of the Congress. They are activities mandated by the decisions of elected officials in both the Executive and Legislative branches. As we have seen recently Congress can and does deny funds for legal intelligence activities with which they disagree, thereby terminating such activities.

The Central Intelligence Agency is a foreign policy instrument of the elected representatives of the American people, just like the military, USIA or the Department of State. If you find some element of the government's foreign policy or activity inconsistent with your professional judgment, I would encourage you first to do all you can to test the validity of your position. You also can decline to have any association with us at all. But in the latter case, the decision whether to associate with us should be left to the individual. One individual's freedom of association should not be denied because of another's personal point of view. A university steps on precarious ground and itself endangers academic freedom if it starts making arbitrary rules about which organizations a scholar may participate in or talk with—and, I would add, especially if one of those organizations is a branch of our society's own democratically chosen government.

OUR RULES

Before I close, let me review the rules and policies of the analytical arm of CIA for dealing with the university community. We continually review our regulations and policies in the light of new opportunities, new problems and new issues. For example, well before the recent controversy here at Harvard, we revised our contract language with respect to prepublication review, narrowing that review—which again, is simply to avoid the compromise of classified information—to the specific subject area in which a scholar had access to classified information. For example, if a scholar consults with us about nuclear proliferation and has access to classified information, writings on unrelated subjects need not be submitted.

We have again looked at our rules and policies as a result of the controversy here at Harvard, and this too has produced some modifications. For example, the Directorate of Intelligence now explicitly tells any organization or individual organizing a conference on our behalf that the participants in the conference should be informed in advance of our sponsoring role. Quite frankly, because we organize the overwhelming majority of our conferences ourselves, this problem had not arisen before.

Let me review three key policies of particular interest to the university community:

First, while the Directorate of Intelligence presently has no contracts for classified research at any academic institution, we can and will let contracts for classified research where university rules permit, where appropriate facilities and circumstances allow, and when a genuine need exists.

Second, when we contract for unclassified research, we spell out explicitly for the scholar the conditions governing use of that research. In some cases, the research will be done strictly for us, and we will be the only recipient. In other cases once we have received the research and assured ourselves that the terms of the contract have been carried out, we will acquiesce in a scholar's request to publish a book or article drawing on that research. We do not commission or contract for books or articles. We are realistic about pressures on scholars to publish, however, and, in order to attract some of the best people to work with us, we try to accommodate their desire to draw on unclassified research they have done for us for publication for their own purposes. And, finally, there are cases where we allow research done for us later to be published under the scholar's name without any prepublication review on our part.

But in any of these circumstances, our review is simply to ensure that the work we contracted to be done has been done, meets appropriate standards of quality and does not contain classified information. Taxpayers justifiably would be displeased if we were not to ensure that we had received true value for their money.

Third, we also have looked again at the question of whether our funding of research that is subsequently used in a publication by a scholar should be openly acknowledged. There are several good reasons that argue against such an approach, including the possibility of difficulty with a foreign government by virtue of acknowledged CIA interest in its internal affairs; the possibility that acknowledged CIA interest in a specific subject—such as the financial stability of a particular country—could affect the situation itself; and, finally, concern that readers might assume the scholar's conclusions were, in fact, CIA's

As a result of the controversy here at Harvard and expressions of concern about this policy, we reexamined this issue with considerable care. In the first place, there are certain circumstances under which disclosure of our funding of research may be required, and we of course comply. Beyond this, we have decided that our interest in obtaining the cooperation of this country's scholars and allaying the misunderstandings and suspicions that have grown out of our earlier approach warrants at least some change in our policy. Accordingly, CIA will henceforth permit acknowledgement of our funding of research that is later independently published by a scholar unless (1) the scholar requests privacy or (2) we determine that formal, public association of CIA with a specific topic or subject would prove damaging to the United States. Any acknowledgement of CIA funding would be accompanied by a statement to the effect that the views expressed are those of the author and do not necessarily reflect the views of CIA or of the US government. I assume, of course, that universities also will press hard for public disclosure of other sources of funding for research.

Fourth, we expect any scholar or individual who consults or works with us to abide fully by the rules of his or her home institution in terms of reporting the relationship with us. But, in our view, it is, in the first instance, the responsibility of the institution to set such rules and to enforce them, and the responsibility of the scholar to comply.

CONCLUSIONS

The world is increasingly complex. The challenges to the security and well being of the American people are increasingly diverse and subtle. Director Casey and I, and others in the Executive Branch and our Congressional oversight committees believe that contacts with universities and others in the private sector are imperative if we are properly and effectively to carry out our mission of informing, improving understanding, and warning the government about developments around the world—the same mission identified by General Donovan and President Roosevelt. Our ability to carry out our mission, as in the days of Langer and Donovan, depends on voluntary cooperation between those of us who carry this responsibility in intelligence, and those in the university, business, retired military, and others who can help us understand these challenges better and forecast them more accurately. Our country is the ultimate beneficiary.

Consultation and cooperation with CIA on the problems this nation faces abroad do not threaten academic freedom. However, I believe that freedom of inquiry is limited, a desire to render public service sometimes tragically thwarted, and our nation disadvantaged, by those who would deny a scholar's willingness to work with the American intelligence service in assessing the world around us.

The government cannot coerce any scholar to cooperate or work with the Department of Defense, Department of State, or CIA. By the same token, no scholar should be prevented by acedemic institutions or colleagues from doing so. And none should have to worry that his or her reputation will suffer because of a public-spirited, patriotic willingness to help us better understand and forecast developments abroad affecting our national well-being and the forces that threaten our freedom.

BUILT FOR THE PEOPLE: FIFTY YEARS OF TVA ARCHITECTURE

● Mr. GORE. Mr. President, last night I had the opportunity to attend the opening of an exhibit at the National Building Museum entitled "Built for the People: Fifty Years of TVA Architecture." I recommend the splendid exhibit to my colleagues.

As one who grew up in TVA country, I am especially pleased to see the legacy of TVA gain national recognition. It is a fitting tribute to commemorate TVA in the National Building Museum, for the Tennessee Valley Authority has served a region but inspired an entire nation. We are glad for the opportunity to share our pride in TVA's remarkable accomplishments.

We don't think too much about public architecture any more. In fact, we often take it for granted. Rarely do we recognize its place in history and in our hearts. But we owe it to our parents, ourselves, and future generations to look back at what TVA has built.

The Tennessee Valley Authority arrived at a critical time in our history—at time when the American people were looking for symbols to boost them out of despair. For millions, TVA was that symbol. The day they turned on the lights was the day that folks put the darkness of the depression behind them.

Those who designed the TVA system understood America's need for symbolic architecture. Like so much of the New Deal, from the CCC to the WPA, its creations showed us the potential of public and private cooperation. They endure as a testament to progressive ideals and to progress.

I commend the efforts of the National Endowment for the Arts, the National Building Museum, and TVA itself for helping to make the exhibit possible. Washington and its many visitors are fortunate to get a glimpse of our Nation's finest public works.

The Tennessee Valley Authority was indeed "built for the people." As the program that brought power to the people, it has always stood for something still larger than its greatest dams. Mr. President, look around the exhibit, and you will see monuments not just to what man can do, but to what people can do for one another.●

BALANCED BUDGET CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT—UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, after conferring with the minority leader, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be advanced to third reading immediately following the disposition of amendment No. 1652, as amended.

I ask unanimous consent that the vote occur on adoption of Senate Joint Resolution 225, at 6 p.m., on Tuesday, March 25, and that paragraph 4 of rule XII, be waived.

I also ask unanimous consent that a colloquy be placed in the RECORD to be prepared by Senators HATCH, THURMOND, DECONCINI, SIMON, METZENBAUM, MELCHER, and HEFLIN, no later than Friday, March 21, that would discuss the definitions of several items, and that in the event the Senators named above cannot agree on a colloquy, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] be recognized at 2 p.m., on Tuesday, March 25, to offer a technical amendment on behalf of himself and Senator MELCHER, which would add to the joint resolution a definition section, and that the Heflin amendment be limited to 2 hours, to be equally divided in the usual form.

I further ask unanimous consent that no amendments be in order to the Heflin amendment, and that the agreement be in the usual form.

Further, I ask unanimous consent that following disposition of the Heflin amendment, if offered, or at 2 p.m., on Tuesday, March 25, if the Heflin amendment is not offered, the Senate begin the debate on Senate Joint Resolution 225, to be equally divided and controlled by the majority and minority leaders, or their designees.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I discussed this matter in my conference today as I had assured the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished President pro tempore that I would. I found no objections and in the follow-up on the cloakroom lines I found no objections.

So I am happy to say I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I request the yeas and nays on the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I also inform all Senators that any Senator interested in the colloquy, please contact the Senators' offices as just itemized. The colloquy will be prepared beginning Wednesday, March 19, 1986. Therefore, any suggestions that any Senator may have must be in prior to Wednesday.

DEFICIT DEDUCTION AND PROGRAM IMPROVEMENT

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, after conferring with the minority leader, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on H.R. 3128, the reconciliation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3128) entitled "An Act to make changes in spending and revenue provisions for purposes of deficit reduction and program improvement, consistent with the budget process", and concur therein with the following amendment:

In section 4016, insert "or seasonal suspension" after "adjustment in frequency"; and insert "adjustment or" after "service unless such".

In subparagraph (F)(ii) of paragraph (10) of section 204(b) of the Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act, as proposed to be amended by section 6021, strike out "from such nations".

In subsection (b)(2)(B) of section 315 of the Coastal Zone Management Act, as proposed to be amended by section 6044, strike out "environmental" and insert "environment".

In section 3A of the National Ocean Pollution Planning Act of 1978, as proposed to be added by section 6072(2)—

(1) amend subparagraph (B) of subsection (a)(2) to read as follows:

" '(B) be headed by a director who shall—

" '(i) be appointed by the Administrator,

" '(ii) serve as the Chair of the Board, and

" '(iii) be the spokesperson for the program;' ";

(2) insert a quotation mark and a period after the period at the end of subparagraph (D) of subsection (b)(2); and

(3) strike out paragraph (3) of subsection (b).

In section 6085—

(1) insert "and duties" after "functions" in the long title of the Act of August 6, 1947 cited in such section; and

(2) strike out "'or subdivision thereof'" and insert "'or subdivision thereof,'" in paragraph (2).

In section 8003, amend the first sentence of the proposed section 8(g)(2) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act to read as follows: "Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Secretary shall deposit into a separate account in the Treasury of the United States all bonuses, rents, and royalties, and other revenues (derived from any bidding system authorized under subsection (a)(1)), excluding Federal income and windfall profits taxes, derived from any lease issued after September 18, 1978, of any Federal tract which lies wholly or partially within three nautical miles of the seaward boundary of any coastal State.".

In section 8004(a), strike out "January 1, 1986" and insert in lieu thereof "April 15, 1986".

In section 8006(a), insert "issued after September 18, 1978" after "any Federal leases".

In section 8006(a)(1), insert "issued after September 18, 1978" after "derived from any lease".

Amend section 8201 by striking out the close quote and period at the end and inserting in lieu thereof the following new paragraph:

"(4)(A) Notwithstanding the provisions of this subsection, a lessee may petition the Secretary for a waiver of the requirements of this subsection.

"(B) The Secretary shall assign an Administrative Law Judge to conduct a hearing on the record on the petition and make a finding for the Secretary.

"(C) The Administrative Law Judge shall recommend to the Secretary that the Secretary grant such waiver if the Administrative Law Judge finds that the lessee's exploration or development and production plan cannot be carried out solely because of the additional costs that would be incurred as a result of the requirements of this subsection.

"(D) If the Secretary receives the recommendation from the Administrative Law Judge provided in paragraph (C), the Secretary may grant the waiver if the Secretary concurs with the finding of the Administrative Law Judge.".

" '(e) No trade readjustment allowance shall be paid to a worker under this part for any week during which the worker is receiving on-the-job training.'.

"SEC. 13004. JOB TRAINING FOR WORKERS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 236 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2296) is amended—

"(1) by striking out 'for a worker' in subsection (a)(1)(A) and inserting in lieu thereof 'for an adversely affected worker',

"(2) by striking out 'may approve' in the first sentence of subsection (a)(1) and inserting in lieu thereof 'shall (to the extent appropriated funds are available) approve',

"(3) by striking out 'under paragraph (1)' in subsection (a)(2) and inserting in lieu thereof 'under subsection (a)',

"(4) by striking out 'this subsection' in subsection (a)(3) and inserting in lieu thereof 'this section',

"(5) by redesignating paragraphs (2) and (3) of subsection (a) as subsections (e) and (f), respectively,

"(6) by inserting at the end of subsection (a) the following new paragraphs:

" '(2) For purposes of applying paragraph (1)(C), a reasonable expectation of employment does not require that employment opportunities for a worker be available, or offered, immediately upon the completion of training approved under this paragraph (1).

" '(3)(A) If the costs of training an adversely affected worker are paid by the Secretary under paragraph (1), no other payment for such costs may be made under any other provision of Federal law.

" '(B) No payment may be made under paragraph (1) of the costs of training an adversely affected worker if such costs—

" '(i) have already been paid under any other provision of Federal law, or

" '(ii) are reimbursable under any other provision of Federal law and a portion of such costs have already been paid under such other provision of Federal law.

" '(C) The provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to, or take into account, any funds provided under any other provision of Federal law which are used for any purpose other than the direct payment of the costs incurred in training a particular adversely affected worker, even if such use has the effect of indirectly paying or reducing any portion of the costs involved in training the adversely affected worker.

" '(4) The training programs that may be approved under paragraph (1) include, but are not limited to—

" '(A) on-the-job training,

" '(B) any training program provided by a State pursuant to section 303 of the Job Training Partnership Act,

" '(C) any training program approved by a private industry council established under section 102 of such Act, and

" '(D) any other training program approved by the Secretary.', and

"(7) by inserting after subsection (c) the following new subsection:

" '(d) Notwithstanding any provision of subsection (a)(1), the Secretary may pay the costs of on-the-job training of an adversely affected worker under subsection (a)(1) only if—

" '(1) no currently employed worker is displaced by such adversely affected worker (including partial displacement such as a reduction in the hours of nonovertime work, wages, or employment benefits),

" '(2) such training does not impair existing contracts for services or collective bargaining agreements,

" '(3) in the case of training which would be inconsistent with the terms of a collective bargaining agreement, the written concurrence of the labor organization has been obtained,

" '(4) no other individual is on layoff from the same, or any substantially equivalent, job for which such adversely affected worker is being trained,

" '(5) the employer has not terminated the employment of any regular employee or otherwise reduced the workforce of the employer with the intention of filling the vacancy so created by hiring such adversely affected worker,

" '(6) the job for which such adversely affected worker is being trained is not being created in a promotional line that will infringe in any way upon the promotional opportunities of currently employed individuals,

" '(7) such training is not for the same occupation from which the worker was separated and with respect to which such worker's group was certified pursuant to section 222,

" '(8) the employer certifies to the Secretary that the employer will continue to employ such worker for at least 26 weeks after completion of such training if the worker desires to continue such employment and the employer does not have due cause to terminate such employment,

" '(9) the employer has not received payment under subsection (a)(1) with respect to any other on-the-job training provided by such employer which failed to meet the requirements of paragraphs (1), (2), (3), (4), (5), and (6), and

" '(10) the employer has not taken, at any time, any action which violated the terms of any certification described in paragraph (8) made by such employer with respect to any other on-the-job training provided by such employer for which the Secretary has made a payment under subsection (a)(1).'.

"(b) ON-THE-JOB TRAINING DEFINED.—Section 247 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2319) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

" '(16) The term "on-the-job training" means training provided by an employer to an individual who is employed by the employer.'.

"(c) AGREEMENTS WITH THE STATES.—Section 239 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2311) is amended—

"(1) by amending subsection (a)(2) by inserting 'but in accordance with subsection (f),' after 'where appropriate,'; and

"(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

" '(e) Agreements entered into under this section may be made with one or more State or local agencies including—

" '(1) the employment service agency of such State,

" '(2) any State agency carrying out title III of the Job Training Partnership Act, or

" '(3) any other State or local agency administering job training or related programs.

" '(f) Each cooperating State agency shall, in carrying out subsection (a)(2)—

"'(1) advise each adversely affected worker to apply for training under section 236(a) at the time the worker makes application for trade readjustment allowances (but failure of the worker to do so may not be treated as cause for denial of those allowances), and

"'(2) within 60 days after application for training is made by the worker, interview the adversely affected worker regarding suitable training opportunities available to the worker under section 236 and review such opportunities with the worker.'.

"SEC. 13005. JOB SEARCH ALLOWANCES.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 237 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2297) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"'(c) The Secretary shall reimburse any adversely affected worker for necessary expenses incurred by such worker in participating in a job search program approved by the Secretary.'.

"(b) DEFINITIONS.—Section 247 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2319), as amended by section 13004(b) of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"'(17)(A) The term "job search program" means a job search workshop or job finding club.

"'(B) The term "job search workshop" means a short (1 to 3 days) seminar designed to provide participants with knowledge that will enable the participants to find jobs. Subjects are not limited to, but should include, labor market information, résumé writing, interviewing techniques, and techniques for finding job openings.

"'(C) The term "job finding club" means a job search workshop which includes a period (1 to 2 weeks) of structured, supervised activity in which participants attempt to obtain jobs.'.

"SEC. 13006. ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE FOR FIRMS.

"(a) TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE.—

"(1) Paragraph (1) of section 252(b) of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2342(b)(1)) is amended to read as follows:

"'(1) Adjustment assistance under this chapter consists of technical assistance. The Secretary shall approve a firm's application for adjustment assistance only if the Secretary determines that the firm's adjustment proposal—

"'(A) is reasonably calculated to materially contribute to the economic adjustment of the firm,

"'(B) gives adequate consideration to the interests of the workers of such firm, and

"'(C) demonstrates that the firm will make all reasonable efforts to use its own resources for economic development.'.

AMENDMENT NO. 1673

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment with a further amendment, which I send to the desk on behalf of Senators DOMENICI, PACKWOOD, and MCCLURE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON], on behalf of Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. PACKWOOD, and Mr. MCCLURE, proposes an amendment numbered 1673.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment reads as follows:

(3) strike out paragraph (3) of subsection (b).

In section 6085—

(1) Insert "and duties" after "functions" in the long title of the Act of August 6, 1947 cited in such section; and

(2) strike out "'or subdivision thereof'" and insert "'or subdivision thereof,'" in paragraph (2).

In title VIII, strike out the heading for subtitle A.

In section 8001, strike out "subtitle" and insert in lieu thereof "title".

In section 8(g) of the Outer Continental Shell Lands Act, as proposed to be amended by section 8003, strike out paragraph (2) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(2) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Secretary shall deposit into a separate account in the Treasury of the United States all bonuses, rents, and royalties, and other revenues (derived from any bidding system authorized under subsection (a)(1)), excluding Federal income and windfall profits taxes, and derived from any lease issued after September 18, 1978 of any Federal tract which lies wholly (or, in the case of Alaska, partially until seven years from the date of settlement of any boundary dispute that is the subject of an agreement under section 7 of this Act entered into prior to January 1, 1986 or until April 15, 1993 with respect to any other tract) within three nautical miles of the seaward boundary of any coastal State, or, (except as provided above for Alaska) in the case where a Federal tract lies partially within three nautical miles of the seaward boundary, as percentage of bonuses, rents, royalties, and other revenues (derived from any bidding system authorized under subsection (a)(1)), excluding Federal income and windfall profits taxes, and derived from any lease issued after September 18, 1978 of such tract equal to the percentage of surface acreage of the tract that lies within such three nautical miles. Except as provided in paragraph (5) of this subsection, not later than the last business day of the month following the month in which those revenues are deposited in the Treasury, the Secretary shall transmit to such coastal State 27 percent of those revenues, together with all accrued interest thereon. The remaining balance of such revenues shall be transmitted simultaneously to the miscellaneous receipts account of the Treasury of the United States.

In section 8(g)(5) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, as proposed to be amended by section 8003, strike out subparagraph (A) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(5)(A) When there is a boundary dispute between the United States and a State which is subject to an agreement under section 7 of this Act, the Secretary shall credit to the account established pursuant to such agreement all bonuses, rents, and royalties, and other revenues (derived from any bidding system authorized under subsection (a)(1)), excluding Federal income and windfall profits taxes, and derived from any lease issued after September 18, 1978 of any Federal tract which lies wholly or partially within three nautical miles of the seaward boundary asserted by the State, if that money has not otherwise been deposited in such account. Proceeds of such account shall be distributed as follows:

"Upon the settlement of any boundary dispute which is subject to a section 7 agreement between the United States and a State, the Secretary shall pay to such State all monies due such State from amounts deposited in the escrow account. If there is insufficient money deposited in the escrow account, the Secretary shall transmit, from any revenues derived from any lease of Federal lands under this Act, the remaining balance due such State in accordance with the formula set forth in section 8004(b)(1)(B) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act Amendments of 1985.".

Strike out section 8004 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 8004. DISTRIBUTION OF SECTION 8(g) ACCOUNT.

(a) Prior to April 15, 1986, the Secretary shall distribute to the designated coastal States the sum of—

(1) the amounts due and payable to each State under paragraph (2) of section 8(g) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, as amended by this title, for the period between October 1, 1985, and the date of such distribution, and

(2) the amounts due each such State under subsection (b)(1)(A) of this section for the period prior to October 1, 1985.

(b)(1) As a fair and equitable disposition of all revenues (including interest thereon) derived from any lease of Federal lands wholly or partially within 3 miles of the seaward boundary of a coastal State prior to October 1, 1985, the Secretary shall distribute:

(A) from the funds which were deposited in the separate account in the Treasury of the United Stats under section 8(g)(4) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act (43 U.S.C. 1337(g)(4)) which was in effect prior to the date of enactment of section 8003 of this title the following sums:

(4) by striking out "this subsection" in subsection (a)(3) and inserting in lieu thereof "this section",

(5) by redesignating paragraphs (2) and (3) of subsection (a) as subsections (e) and (f), respectively,

(6) by inserting at the end of subsection (a) the following new paragraphs:

"(2) For purposes of applying paragraph (1)(C), a reasonable expectation of employment does not require that employment opportunities for a worker be available, or offered, immediately upon the completion of training approved under this paragraph (1).

"(3)(A) If the costs of training an adversely affected worker are paid by the Secretary under paragraph (1), no other payment for such costs may be made under any other provision of Federal law.

(B) No payment may be made under paragraph (1) of the costs of training an adversely affected worker if such costs—

"(i) have already been paid under any other provision of Federal law, or

"(ii) are reimbursable under any other provision of Federal law and a portion of such costs have already been paid under such other provision of Federal law.

"(C) The provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to, or take into account, any funds provided under any other provision of Federal law which are used for any purpose other than the direct payment of the costs incurred in training a particular adversely affected worker, even if such use has the effect of indirectly paying or reducing any portion of the costs involved in training the adversely affected worker.

"(4) The training programs that may be approved under paragraph (1) include, but are not limited to—

"(A) on-the-job training,

"(B) any training program provided by a State pursuant to section 303 of the Job Training Partnership Act,

"(C) any training program approved by a private industry council established under section 102 of such Act, and

"(D) any other training program approved by the Secretary.", and

(7) by inserting after subsection (c) the following new subsection:

"(d) Notwithstanding any provision of subsection (a)(1), the Secretary may pay the costs of on-the-job training of an adversely affected worker under subsection (a)(1) only if—

"(1) no currently employed worker is displaced by such adversely affected worker (including partial displacement such as a reduction in the hours of nonovertime work, wages, or employment benefits),

"(2) such training does not impair existing contracts for services or collective bargaining agreements,

"(3) in the case of training which would be inconsistent with the terms of a collective bargaining agreement, the written concurrence of the labor organization concerned has been obtained,

"(4) no other individual is on layoff from the same, or any substantially equivalent, job for which such adversely affected worker is being trained,

"(5) the employer has not terminated the employment of any regular employee or otherwise reduced the workforce of the employer with the intention of filling the vacancy so created by hiring such adversely affected worker,

"(6) the job for which such adversely affected worker is being trained is not being created in a promotional line that will infringe in any way upon the promotional opportunities of currently employed individuals,

"(7) such training is not for the same occupation from which the worker was separated and with respect to which such worker's group was certified pursuant to section 222,

"(8) the employer certifies to the Secretary that the employer will continue to employ such worker for at least 26 weeks after completion of such training if the worker desires to continue such employment and the employer does not have due cause to terminate such employment,

"(9) the employer has not received payment under subsection (a)(1) with respect to any other on-the-job training provided by such employer which failed to meet the requirements of paragraphs (1), (2), (3), (4), (5), and (6), and

"(10) the employer has not taken, at any time, any action which violated the terms of any certification described in paragraph (8) made by such employer with respect to any other on-the-job training provided by such employer for which the Secretary has made a payment under subsection (a)(1).".

(b) ON-THE-JOB TRAINING DEFINED.—Section 247 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2319) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(16) The term on-the-job training means training provided by an employer to an individual who is employed by the employer.".

(c) AGREEMENTS WITH THE STATES.—Section 239 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2311) is amended—

(1) by amending subsection (a)(2) by inserting "but in accordance with subsection (f)," after "where appropriate,"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(e) Agreements entered into under this section may be made with one or more State or local agencies including—

"(1) the employment service agency of such State,

"(2) any State agency carrying out title III of the Job Training Partnership Act, or

"(3) any other State or local agency administering job training or related programs.

"(f) Each cooperating State agency shall, in carrying out subsection (a)(2)—

"(1) advise each adversely affected worker to apply for training under section 236(a) at the time the worker makes application for trade readjustment allowances (but failure of the worker to do so may not be treated as cause for denial of those allowances), and

"(2) within 60 days after application for training is made by the worker, interview the adversely affected worker regarding suitable training opportunities available to the worker under section 236 and review such opportunities with the worker.".

SEC. 13005. JOB SEARCH ALLOWANCES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 237 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2297) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to smokeless tobacco removed after June 30, 1986.

(2) TRANSITIONAL RULE.—Any person who.—

(A) on the date of the enactment of this Act, is engaged in business as a manufacturer of smokeless tobacco, and may, notwithstanding such subchapter B, continue to engage in such business pending final action on such application. Pending such final action, all provisions of chapter 52 of such Code shall apply to such applicant in the same manner and to the same extent as if such applicant were a holder of a permit to manufacture smokeless tobacco under such chapter 52.

(B) before July 1, 1986, submits an application under subchapter B of chapter 52 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to engage in such business.

Strike out subsection (c) of section 13203 and insert the following:

(c) EXISTING REDUCTION IN RATES FOR PERIOD AFTER TEMPORARY INCREASE RETAINED.—So much of subsection (e) of section 4121 (relating to temporary increase in amount of tax) as precedes paragraph (2) is amended to read as follows:

"(e) REDUCTION IN AMOUNT OF TAX.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Effective with respect to sales after the temporary increase termination date, subsection

(b) shall be applied—

"(A) by substituting '$.50' for '$1.10',

"(B) by substituting '$.25' for '$.55', and

(2) strike out "November 1, 1986, and November 1, 1987," in subsection (f) and insert in lieu thereof "February 1, 1987, and February 1, 1988,".

EXTENDING MORNING BUSINESS UNTIL 10:30 P.M.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that morning business be extended until 10:30 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER TO HOLD HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 563 AT THE DESK

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, after conferring with the minority leader, I ask unanimous consent that House Joint Resolution 563, dealing with housing extension, be held at the desk pending further disposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

OLDER AMERICANS ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1986—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on H.R. 2453 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2453) to amend the Older Americans Act of 1965 to increase the amounts authorized to be appropriated for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987 for commodity distribution, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses this report, signed by all of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

(The conference report is printed in the House proceedings of the RECORD of March 10, 1986.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the injunction of secrecy be removed from a Tax Convention with Tunisia—Treaty Document No. 99-13—which was transmitted to the Senate today by the President of the United States.

I further ask that the treaty be considered as having been read the first time; that it be referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed; and that the President's message be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without, objection, it is so ordered.

The message of the President is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for Senate advice and consent to ratification, the Convention between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Tunisian Republic for the Avoidance of Double Taxation and the Prevention of Fiscal Evasion with Respect to Taxes on Income (referred to hereafter as "the Convention"), together with a related exchange of notes, signed at Washington on June 17, 1985. I also transmit the report of the Department of State on the Convention.

The Convention is the first income tax treaty to be negotiated between the United States and Tunisia. It is based on model income tax treaties developed by the Department of the Treasury, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, and the United Nations. It deviates in some respects from the models to reflect Tunisia's status as a developing country and an importer of capital.

The Convention provides rules with respect to the taxation of various types of income, such as business profits, personal service income, and investment income. It also contains standard provisions guaranteeing a foreign tax credit, ensuring nondiscriminatory tax treatment, and providing for exchanges of information and administrative cooperation to avoid double taxation and prevent tax evasion.

I recommend that the Senate give early and favorable consideration to the Convention, together with the related exchange of notes, and give its advice and consent to ratification.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 13, 1986.

ORDERS FOR FRIDAY

RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, after conferring with the minority leader, I ask unanimous consent that once the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until the hour of 9:30 a.m. on Friday, March 14, 1986.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, I ask unanimous consent that the following Senators be recognized for special orders for not to exceed 5 minutes each: Senator HAWKINS, Senator PROXMIRE, and Senator BAUCUS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, following the special orders just identified, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to extend beyond the hour of 10 a.m. with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. SIMPSON. At the conclusion of routine morning business, the Senate will resume consideration of the House message to accompany H.R. 3128, budget reconciliation.

The Senate could also be asked to turn to any of the following items:

S. 1567, water resources bill; Fitzwater nomination to be U.S. district judge; or, any other Legislative or Executive Calendar items cleared for action.

As the majority leader has indicated, rollcall votes can be expected throughout Friday's session.

Mr. President, does the Democratic leader have any further business?

Mr. BYRD. I have a question.

Does the distinguished assistant Republican leader foresee rollcall votes into the midafternoon, or early afternoon, or late afternoon tomorrow?

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, the foreseeing capabilities of the assistant majority leader are cloudy at this point in the evening. But I can say that I believe that late afternoon votes will not be the prospect. I would think perhaps 3 in the afternoon, or around that time, but I cannot assure my colleague of that.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished assistant Republican leader.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I think, obviously, the minority leader knows that it does depend a bit on the progress that we make. I hope we can make progress. We have that important measure to take care of with regard to the water resources bill, and reconciliation.

RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, there being no further business to come before the Senate, I move in accordance with the previous order that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 9:30 a.m. on Friday, March 14, 1986.

The motion was agreed to; and, at 10:23 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorow, Friday, March 14, 1986, at 9:30 a.m.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

CURRENT AGRICULTURAL ENVIRONMENT

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, this Member has never doubted the sagacity of people in my home county, Seward County, NE, but three outstanding editorials or articles on the current agricultural environment in recent editions of the Seward County Independent are particularly incisive and compelling. I commend these statements to my colleagues.

The first, a guest editorial in the issue of February 22, 1986, is written by Mr. Albert Ebers, a retired Seward farmer who is still active in numerous community activities and as a farm credit adviser. It is altogether appropriate that Mr. Ebers, the former master of the Nebraska Grange, begins his editorial quoting Ben Franklin, for he parallels that great patriot in ingenuity, wisdom, conscientious concern for his fellow Americans, and his dedication to the public interest.

COPING WITH LESS

Our famous American patriot, the wise Ben Franklin, said it long ago, "There are two ways of being happy. We must either diminish our wants or augment our means—either may do—the result is the same, and it is for each man to decide for himself as to that which happens to be easier."

Every meeting I attend, every news article I read, whether it deals with national, state or local affairs, groans over how and what can we do with less money, lower wages and less income.

Every time, the thinking dwells upon which services will be cut, which school or department will be closed, which jobs will be terminated, etc. This is one way of coping with less money.

Of course, this method results in unemployment, curtailed or no services for people in need, a slack in growth and development.

We all would like a constant increase in salary, wages and income to help satisfy our insatiable wants, and as long as the money is available, well and good.

Can we live happily and still perform services when money is diminished?

Consider Ben Franklin's quote above. There is another way. Think first of industry and business. If salaries, wages and fringe benefits would be lowered a little, prices of the product they sell could be decreased. Now many more people could buy the product, and more people would get jobs to satisfy the demand. Or, if consumers somehow could get more money, they could buy more of the products for sale. This plan was tried by our government in the 1930s. It was foiled by the greed of industry and business. They raised the prices.

Human services is the growing segment in our economy. If people performing these services would take a little less salary, services for the people would not have to be curtailed.

Many grain family farmers have taken a 50 percent cut in income during the past several years, but they don't think of not planting or seeding a crop, because they live from the income produced of the harvested crop. That's why they ask for government help when curtailing acres in crops in hopes that, if many farmers cut acres planted, there will be a reduction in supply and influence the price. It's a characteristic of family farming that more and more people outside of agriculture do not understand.

Where the family farmer was wise enough not to incur too many debts during the inflationary period of the 1970s and where he used good management, he is still making a living, even if his income is much less. And those family farmers are happy, doing what they love, growing food for livestock and people.

When the mechanic restores the auto for the longing owner, when the teacher helps the developing student, when the doctor, dentist, drugist and hospital reproduce good health, when the shoeman and clothier take pride n a sell-dressed public, when government workers see the good people receive from their labors, when people look less for the dollar sign and more for the value of their labor for the benefit of people, rewards for living and happiness emerge.

One brilliant and very distinguished Nebraskan who fits the idea humbly presented is John G. Neihardt. He wasn't much of a figure financially. On his 90th birthday celebration in the rotunda of our State Capital, he said this: "When I was a youngster, I became indebted to the world for the privilege of living in it. I became deeper in debt to the world all the time, and if there are any more turnouts like this one tonight, I think I will end up in joyous bankruptcy. The heart in me tonight is like a singing bird."

Yes, we can live happily with with Gramm-Rudman, if we dwell less on salary and income and more on the values of our labors and benefit our fellowman.

The second item from the March 5, 1986, edition, one of the first in what will hopefully be a very long series of columns by Mr. Dennis Richters from Utica, NE this Member's hometown, follows other such columns written over many months under a pseudonym. Dennis Richters, a high school classmate, lifelong friend and best man at this Member's wedding, was born into a farming family and has agriculture permanently in his blood no matter what course his life may take. His pragmaticism, deeply held views and thoughtful attitude are well demonstrated in the following column:

FIGHT FOR THE BEST SYSTEM IN THE WORLD

Newspapers, politicians, economists and a lot of other people say they are hearing way too much gloom and doom about the farm problem.

And a lot of them * * * say the doom and gloom aren't necessary because a certain percent of farmers leave the farm all the time, so it's no problem. Somebody should explain * * * that these aren't just numbers they're talking about. They're talking about human beings and about communities.

Some of us being forced off our farms will miss, and be missed by, our friends and our communities. I would also remind * * * that there is a world of difference between leaving the farm of your own volition when you can sell out at a profit and being forced out of your home and losing your land.

Farmers are used to combating nature, the droughts and the blizzards and the insects. We knew we had to deal with nature when we decided to farm. Farmers have been so successful at dealing with nature's whims that we have priced ourselves out of a reasonable profit.

The gloom and doom is not a result of nature's calamities. We accept that risk. It is a result of the knowledge that most of the farm failures are caused unnecessarily by people, not by nature or by change. The doom and gloom comes from the realization that political cowardice and Federal Reserve Board actions have created most of the problems. Some of these people say this will lead to a cure within the next decade. That's like telling somebody that you will dig them up from the grave five years from now and administer an antidote for whatever caused their death. Thanks for nothing.

I heard one of our * * * candidates for Governor give a typically simplistic political statement on why agriculture is in trouble. She said it was the fault of an ineffective farm program for decades and too liberal lending policies by our Farm Credit groups. That's garbage.

The new farm bill is called the Food Security Act. People who say our farm programs have failed miserably never take note of the fact that you can walk down row after row of aisles at supermarkets and see the best, freshest, cheapest food in the world. The food never runs out, and it costs less, comparatively, then at any other place on earth, so the farm program is NOT an utter failure.

The farm programs definitely need to be improved, but they have not all been failures.

As for the Farm Credit System's liberal lending practices, the loans they made were not all bad loans when they made them. And they would not have turned out to be bad loans if they would have been made to any other business that had the ability to pass on the rapidly increasing interest costs to its customers.

Unlike other businesses, farmers cannot simply raise their prices to compensate for higher costs of production. It took a certain period of years to infuse the extra amount of capital into agriculture, and it will take a certain period of years to squeeze the excess capital out. A lot of people going broke now and a number of small banks going down does not mean we will end up with better, more able producers in the industry to better serve the nation and consumers.

The doom and gloom will pass and must pass. Perhaps mother nature will cut down our production or the world's production because we aren't able to cut down by ourselves. Perhaps governments and world leaders will decide it is more important to feed their populations than it is to buy arms to destroy people.

One of the best ways to alleviate the doom and gloom is for us to get angry.

Human, community and societal losses are occurring today which are not necessary or fair. Man's decisions are the cause of many of our troubles, and correcting these decisions or changing the people who make the decisions can solve most of these troubles.

There's a saying. "What goes around comes around." "People who use this saying today to justify what is happening to farmers are wrong. They are saying that what has happened before is okay, and it just has to happen again.

* * * Using the same logic would have implied that the plaque during Europe's Dark Ages was okay, and we should let it happen again. The same logic would have said we shouldn't have developed the Salk vaccine, just let the polio come back whenever it wants to.

During the Depression a lot of people lost the money they had deposited when the banks went broke. We simply decided that was not acceptable and established the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to make sure it wouldn't happen again. The FDIC system is an interference with free enterprise, and the system is not free. But we made the correct decision that it was not necessary to go by the old axiom of "What goes around comes around," and we improved the situation.

The gloom and doom will leave when we decide we do not have to sit passively by and accept an unfair system or a bunch of screwups running the system. We have the best and cheapest food production system in the world. Instead of being apologetic about it, we should feel good about being part of it and fight for it.

The remaining item, also from the March 5, 1986, edition, is an editorial which also offers reflections on the "gloom and doom" comments that prompted Mr. Richters' column. It was written by Charlyne Berens, the female half of a dynamic husband-wife team that publishes the Seward County Independent. That paper, recently moving to a biweekly status, has become a truly outstanding newspaper in the Plains States. Its dedication to community affairs, excellence in agricultural coverage, and general concern for the improvement of the human condition are reflected in the following editorial.

UNCHANGING CHANGE

It's been said that perhaps the best thing that could happen to agriculture today is to close all the coffee shops. Bad news is contagious. Hearing a person's five-minute recitation of woe can negatively influence the listener's attitude toward a subject for the rest of the day. Add a few of those recitations together, and a listener can feel depressed indefinitely.

Maybe, after reading the special agriculture section in today's paper, you'll feel the second best thing that could happen to agriculture is to stop printing stories about its problems.

Realistically, the situation is not all rosy. Farmers are, generally, working harder to make less. Some are staying even, some are looking for outside work to enable them to stay on the farm and others are giving up farming entirely. "Farm life" as we think of it is definitely changing.

Is this a new phenomenon? Are we in danger of losing a classic way of life which we have come to value here in the Midwest?

A few weeks ago I came across a passage in Alistair Cooke's America which put the current problem in another perspective. Writing about the settling of the plains, Cooke points out that only a few decades elasped between the time when the first pioneers put up sod houses and put the plow to the prairie and the time when each little town boasted its collection of frame houses, complete with wallpaper and parlor organs and meetings of the cultural society.

And what did people think of these changes? Many of them lamented the loss of the self-sufficient family farm. They began immediately to mourn a way of life they saw disappearing.

Now I don't mean to put down those who worry about much the same thing today. However, as we come to our own accommodations with the change around us, we will be better off if we remember one basic thing: nothing ever stays the same. Change is one of the few constants in life. We cannot turn back the clock to some time or way that we recall as "better."

The best we can do is to try to manage the change which affects us, to do all we can to turn it to our advantage and to the benefit of our community.

I know, I know. That's easier said than done. I'm not suggesting that I have all the answers—nor do I know anyone else who does. But as we all live through times that are less than pure fun, we must search for ways to direct the change around us rather than just let it sweep us along. That would give us something real to mourn, and it would be our own demise.

So rather than either wallowing in our troubles or trying to pretend that they do not exist, we need to find a middle ground where we can face the situation and do what we can to turn it to good. Nobody said living in Nebraska in 1986 would be easy. But I doubt that living in Nebraska in 1886 was exactly a snap, either.

We're still here, alive and kicking. We'll make it.

DONALD CALVIN NEY BECOMES EAGLE SCOUT

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, it is my honor to bring to the attention of my colleagues the outstanding achievement of Mr. Donald Calvin Ney, a member of Boy Scouts in Gordon, PA, and the son of Gerald and Marie Ney.

Donald is a fine young man who recently passed his Eagle Scout Board of Review for advancement to the rank of Eagle Scout. This is indeed a most important achievement and I am very glad to commend and congratulate him before all of you here today. A Court of Honor will be held on March 22, 1986, to honor Mr. Donald Ney for attaining the rank of Eagle Scout.

This honor is not easily achieved and is awarded only to those few who have excelled in many dimensions of citizenship. It is testimony to Donald's character, integrity, intelligence, perseverance, dedication and loyalty to Scouting and our Nation.

I am very happy for Donald and I know he must be extremely proud of his noteworthy achievement. It is young people such as Donald who renew our confidence in the next generation to carry the mantle of leadership in building a better America. I know that all of my colleagues will join me in congratulating Donald and in wishing him the very best in his future endeavors. Undoubtedly, Donald Calvin Ney will serve as an inspiration to other young Americans.

DEPENDENCE ON JAPANESE COMPUTER CHIPS

HON. RICHARD STALLINGS

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Speaker, a headline on the front page of the March 11, 1986, Washington Post read: "U.S. Dependence on Japan for Parts Worries Pentagon." According to the article, the part which causes the Pentagon concern is the backbone of all our technologically advanced defenses—the computer chip. If we ask what has forced America to depend on a foreign country for its most important programs, we need only to look at the next day's paper to find our answer. A headline in that edition says "Japan Found Dumping Chips, Semiconductors Sold Below Production Cost, Commerce Rules."

Several investigations of Japanese trade practices led to the same conclusion. The Japanese have used unfair trade practices to control the development of high technology.

The Washington Post article of March 11 gives a clear account of some of the dangers of depending on foreign sources for high tech components. Therefore, I would like to place it in the RECORD and recommend for my colleagues' attention.

U.S. DEPENDENCE ON JAPAN FOR PARTS WORRIES PENTAGON

(By Michael Schrage)

America's most sophisticated weapons are rapidly becoming dependent on components imported from Japan—a development that has touched off debate inside the Pentagon over what, if anything, should be done about it.

Defense industry sources are particularly concerned about the Strategic Defense Initiative—or "Star Wars"—system, where Japanese high-technology companies now outstrip U.S. defense contractors in several key technologies vital to the development of such a system.

While U.S. companies are able to do most of the SDI systems design work, the cheapest and most reliable hardware—ranging from lasers to new materials—is produced by the Japanese. For example, the Japanese have become the world's dominant supplier of computer memory chips—a key element in many electronics-based weapons systems.

"It's a matter of fact that the Japanese have taken the technical lead in many of these key technologies . . .," said Hewlett-Packard Co.'s materials research laboratory director, Robert Burmeister, who serves on a National Academy of Science panel on electronic components.

"Japan today has the technology base to be a major supplier to the SDI," said Richard Reynolds, director of the defense sciences office at the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, who added that the Pentagon now can buy advanced technology from Japan not yet available from U.S. suppliers.

"In some cases," he said, "you either buy from Japan or you don't get it."

This has raised serious policy concerns over whether the Pentagon should dramatically shore up this nation's high-tech manufacturing base—potentially a very expensive undertaking—or whether it simply should buy the best technology at the best price from a close ally.

Three high-level commissions are examining the military's growing reliance on overseas electronics: a newly formed Defense Sciences Board Task Force on Semiconductor Dependency; a panel of the Pentagon's joint logistics commanders; and a National Academy of Science Electronics Components Committee, which is expected to release a report next month asserting that "there is a very large and increasing dependence on Japanese components."

"There's no doubt that—because of cost and quality considerations—many defense groups are already buying from Japan," said Harvey Nathanson, a Westinghouse research director who leads an industry group pushing for increased defense funding for electronics materials research. "The question has got to be, is that good for us in the long term? A lot of the technologists are more concerned about the Japanese ascendancy. The 'equipment at the best price' procurement types aren't worried."

Largely through its strength in commercial electronics, Japan has rapidly become a strategic supplier of defense technologies to the Pentagon. Pentagon expenditures for defense electronics approach $56.5 billion a year, according to the Electronics Industries Association.

The Nakasone government in Japan has been encouraging the transfer of the country's advanced electronics to the U.S. military, and top Pentagon officials have welcomed increased participation by the Japanese.

"The change in the electronics has been the most striking and significant in the past few years," said Jacques S. Gansler, a deputy assistant secretary of Defense for material acquisition during the Ford administration and now a defense industry consultant.

Currently, there are no good estimates on what percentage of defense electronics components are produced overseas. However, House Armed Services subcommittee staff feels that roughly 80 percent of the military's silicon chips are manufactured in Asia.

Meaningful estimates of Japanese content of U.S. defense electronics are further complicated because U.S. contractors do not always have to disclose where the components for their electronics systems were originally made.

"There's no question that what the [Pentagon] needs to do is recognize the 'dual economy' that exists in the defense industry," asserted Gansler, who serves on the National Academy of Science panel. "We have large prime contractors providing systems, and we don't pay attention to the lower tier [of contractors] on which these systems are dependent. So we have this awkward system where the lower tiers are disappearing and going offshore; their significance isn't recognized.

"While we focus so much of our resources on the prime-contractor level, the real advances [in technology] often come from these parts and components."

In addition to volume supply, Japanese companies recently have begun to provide "critical" components for such weapons systems as missiles and electronic-warfare devices, according to Pentagon and industry officials.

Exacerbating that situation is the fact that, in some areas, Japanese companies have become the sole providers of high-quality, low-cost key electronics materials after winning price wars with American companies.

After Monsanto Co. dropped out of the market three years ago, for example, the United States no longer has a domestic supplier of "float-zone" silicon—a special kind of silicon used in fabricating high-power electronic switching devices that would be indispensable for space-based weaponry. Japanese companies are the key U.S. defense suppliers.

Japan's dominance in the computer memory-chip market means that "we are captive of the Japanese in this commodity," said former assistant Defense Secretary Robert Cooper, "but that's no worse than saying our Navy is captive to the supply of foreign oil."

Japanese companies also enjoy significant cost, quality and technical advantages in the production of gallium arsenide computer chips—chips capable of processing data far faster than conventional silicon chips. The Defense Department has publicly identified gallium arsenide as a critical technology for the SDI. Japan provides the bulk of the Pentagon's gallium arsenide, according to defense electronics sources.

According to former Defense undersecretary of engineering Richard DeLauer, Japan also leads the United States in computer-chip packaging and fiber-optic technology.

Consequently, key U.S. electronics defense suppliers are pushing the Pentagon to invest more heavily in domestic suppliers and to reexamine procurement policies. They argue that the United States already is being hurt technologically by its dependence on Japanese high-technology materials.

"Even now, the Japanese are preselecting the quality of the silicon they ship," said Westinghouse's Nathanson, "In some Westinghouse plants, we're finding it difficult to get the [more advanced] silicon wafers [for power device production]. They themselves are now using higher-order material than they're willing to ship us."

However, Nathanson concedes, and several defense industry sources confirm, that prime U.S. defense contractors are becoming more reliant on Japanese companies to do the actual production work for systems components because of potentially superior manufacturing and price performance.

"This trend toward 'teaming up' with the Japanese is going to continue," asserts former Defense undersecretary William J. Perry.

That poses potentially awkward procurement situations for the SDI because leading advocates such as Assistant Secretary of Defense Richard N. Perle and SDI program director Gen. James Abrahamson have assured that the program will seek low-cost suppliers.

"We're trying to get the best technology at the lowest cost," said Perle, who added that he expects Japan to participate in the SDI.

However, most technology experts agree that, if the Pentagon is serious about obtaining the best high technologies at the most reasonable cost, most of the component production will be done offshore by Japanese high-technology concerns—unless there are specific policies designed to minimize foreign involvement.

ETHIOPIA'S MISERIES

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend to the attention of my colleagues who have not already seen it the following editorial from the Washington Post on Tuesday, March 11, 1986. It responds to an article discussing Ethiopia's resettlement policies that appeared in the previous day's edition of the Post. The editorial accurately points to the dilemma the Western donor nations face, in continuing to provide relief for people in distress even though such relief is a form of assistance to the Government that exacerbates that distress. The article also calls upon the West to air this terrible policy dilemma, even though such international discussion will be resented by the Ethiopian Government.

Congress too has a role in this public debate. Congresswoman MARGE ROUKEMA, Congressman COOPER EVANS and this Member have introduced a resolution, House Concurrent Resolution 285, concerning this volatile matter. The resolution calls upon the Ethiopian Government to refrain from using donor resources for resettlement purposes, calls upon that Government to suspend its resettlement program for the duration of the famine, and calls upon the international donor community to join in petitioning the Ethiopian Government to end coercive resettlement activities. There are 94 Members of Congress who have added their names as cosponsors, and additional congressional support will serve to further underscore the deep concerns of the United States regarding inhumane resettlement policies.

Following is the Washington Post editorial.

ETHIOPIA'S CRUELTIES

Just when you think you have mentally catalogued the full range of Marxist Ethiopia's abuses of its hapless citizens, a report comes along to remind you of the poverty of the bourgeois imagination. Post reporter Blaine Harden's account of a young Ethiopian mother, lured by a false promise of free food into abandoning her home in the drought-stricken northern highlands, is the latest evidence.

The government of Mengistu Haile Mariam says it is relocating citizens for their own good. But the international relief agencies believe the government is deliberately using a massive relocation scheme to depopulate rebel-dominated northern areas and assert political control. It is, in short, attempting to dry up the "sea" in which the insurgent "fish" swim. It is doing so, it seems, with the active collaboration of its Soviet patrons, themselves no strangers to dealing brutally with peasant unrest.

Caught in the maw are people like the woman interviewed by reporter Harden. Virtually every form of privation that could befall a human—decimation of the family and destruction of a way of life—had befallen her by the time she reached the succor of a refugee camp across the border in Sudan.

No one reading of her ordeal will have difficulty understanding why the Ethiopian government is despised by so many people forced to live under it. For Westerners, however, the situation has long posed a special dilemma. Should the West provide relief for people in distress, even though the providing of relief is a form of assistance to the government that causes and aggravates the distress? The broad response of the international relief community, including that considerable part of it financed by the United States government, has been to attempt to help starving and needy people, but at the same time to try to press the Ethiopian government into less anti-humanitarian ways.

The resettlement question is tricky. The government uses resettlement for its own political purposes. There is doubtless an humane and rational justification for some amount of resettlement—though there can be little or none for the even more massive official effort to herd peasants into villages where they can be kept under tighter control.

Relief agencies cannot solve these conundrums. But they and the Western publics that support them can at least air the dilemma. The Ethiopian government deeply resents this sort of intervention, but it has no standing to protest as long as it generates human suffering on such a massive scale. One can hope that the Ethiopian people are able to distinguish those who cause its misery from those who attempt to lighten it.

PENNSYLVANIA KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS DAY

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, March 23, 1986 has been designated Pennsylvania Knights of Columbus Day. Councils throughout Pennsylvania will be celebrating on that day with a variety of special events. In Berks County, the Light of Christ Council, No. 8726, is planning a membership mass and open house at St. Ignatius Parish in Sinking Spring, PA.

This year's program will emphasize the "Grow With Us" theme as well as continuing efforts to exemplify the order's principles of charity, unity, fraternity and patriotism. It is indeed an honor to bring to the attention of my colleagues this important observance and the outstanding contributions of the Knights of Columbus and, in particular, the fine work of the Light of Christ Council, No. 8726, of Sinking Spring.

I want to wish the entire council family a most successful celebration on the 23d and continued success in the future. The Knights of Columbus exemplify the type of community spirit that is so important to our way of life. They have brightened the lives of so many people and it is indeed fitting that we pay tribute to the Light of Christ Council, No. 8726. I know that my colleagues will join me in honoring them for their important good works and deeds. We wish them continued success and good fortune.

IN THE ENDLESS TUNNEL OF HISTORY

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, William V. Shannon of the Boston Globe has written a tough critical analysis of the differences between authoritarian regimes like those of Duvalier and Marcos, where control of life is not complete and revolt is possible, and those of the Marxist-Leninists, where control of life is absolute and every hint of restlessness is forcibly quieted.

Published in the Home News of New Brunswick, NJ, the article is well worth the attention of my colleagues, and I ask that it be reprinted here in the RECORD. As Mr. Shannon states, every oppressed people looks to the end of the tunnel, and in the empire in the East the tunnel is without end.

REPRESSION, CORRUPTION THAT CAN'T BE BEATEN

One can imagine the headlines: "Gorbachev flees to Finland . . . Rebel government takes over in Moscow . . . Joyous crowds surge through Kremlin . . . Sakharov, other dissidents freed."

If they were ever printed, those headlines would report events that would truly change the world. We can all rejoice for the people of the Philippines and Haiti that their dictators are gone, but the return of freedom to those countries does little to shift the outlook for most of mankind. Only a revolution in the Soviet Union could lift the shadow of nuclear war from the world.

The government of the Soviet Union remains the world's most fearsome and despicable tyranny. By Soviet standards, Ferdinand E. Marcos, who imprisoned 600 political prisoners in the Philippines, seems almost benevolent. Mikhail S. Gorbachev's secret police crack the whip over 4 million prisoners in the "gulag," the Soviet network of forced-labor camps. They hold tens of thousands of others in prison or in the nightmare world of psychiatric "hospitals."

Marcos and Jean-Claude Duvalier and their families are rightly stigmatized for their corruption. They were mere pests compared with the Soviet ruling class, which has been battening off the workers and farmers of the country for three generations.

Ordinary Soviet citizens stand in line for three or four hours to buy a kilo of potatoes or a new pair of shoes—which may or may not fit. The members of the Soviet elite shop at special stores, which only they may enter and where luxury goods imported from the West are readily available. They have servants, large apartments, country houses and other perks.

Like a vast toad, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union squats at the top of the nation's society, skimming the profits, censoring what can be heard and read, terrorizing those who dare to protest and bullying everyone below them. Wealth that should be invested in automobiles, decent housing and vacations for ordinary citizens is diverted to an enormous war machine designed to overawe neighboring countries and spread this sinister tyranny whenever opportunity appears.

Why has there never been a revolt? Why do the diverse and immensely gifted people who populate the Soviet Union submit like sullen beasts of burden to this relentless exploitation?

The Russian people are victims of their history. They were one to three centuries behind the countries of Western Europe in breaking away from feudalism. Their ancestors were held as serfs until 1861. They then had less than 60 years to find their economic and political footing and gain self-confidence as independent human beings before the Bolshevik coup in 1917 plunged them into a new tyranny, more efficient and more comprehensive than anything the Romanov czars had ever attempted.

In the name of communism and the "withering away of the state," V.I. Lenin and Josef Stalin systematically destroyed all centers of independent power in the society. Private property was abolished. The Russian Orthodox Church, which, unlike the Catholic Church in the West, always lacked a tradition of standing up to the government, lost all vestiges of autonomy and became a puppet of the secret police. Universities, trade unions, newspapers and ethnic organizations were likewise deformed into servicle instruments of the Soviet state.

In both Haiti and the Philippines, businessmen and progressive priests encouraged the people to resist the dictatorship. In Moscow, there is no Cardinal Sin, there are no businessmen. The totalitarian state has devoured every institution and left the people stripped and defenseless, without leaders and without hope.

Milan Kundera, the Czech novelist, has written: "When it comes to the misfortunes of nations, we must not forget the dimension of time. In a fascist dictatorial state, everyone knows that it will end one day. Everyone looks to the end of the tunnel. In the empire to the East, the tunnel is without end, at least from the point of view of a human life. This is why I don't like it when people compare Poland with, say, Chile. Yes, the torture and the suffering are the same, but the tunnels are of very different lengths. And this changes everything."

Russians and the Eastern Europeans who share their fate know that the revolution that would transform their lives—and ours—is an impossible project.

If they are Jews, they can dream of a visa to Israel. Other Russians have no escape, except into vodka.

HOW NOT TO STOP DRUG USE

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, the editorial board of the Rocky Mountain News, a Denver-based newspaper, has joined the chorus of opposition to the recommendation of the President's Commission on Organized Crime that all Federal employees be subjected to drug testing. The editorial column follows:

[From the Rocky Mountain News, March 7, 1986]

HOW NOT TO STOP DRUG USE

The average federal civil servant is a 41-year-old male holding down a white-collar job and earning less than $30,000. Does his personal profile also include illegal drug use?

That's not a frivolous question in light of a presidential commission's recommendation that all federal workers be forced to undergo drug tests. In fairness, the commission didn't stop there. It urged that federal contractors be required to test their employees, too—that in fact all employers, public or private, periodically test their workers.

If you used drugs, in short, it would be almost impossible to get a job in America if the commission had its way.

Frankly, we hope it doesn't.

Not that we approve of illegal drug use. Of course not. But the elimination of drugs hardly justifies any and all tactics, no matter how intrusive to personal freedom, demoralizing to workers or destructive of their dignity.

Rep. Pat Schroeder summed up the proposal quite well in a letter to President Reagan: "The recommendation . . . is an embarrassment to all who are concerned about an efficient and effective federal workforce. It reflects a basic ignorance of government management, civil liberties and drug testing technology."

There are, of course, professions where it is of urgent interest whether or not people take drugs: airline pilots, bus drivers and intelligence operatives, to name a few. And professional athletes, who function as role models for so many young people, also have a special social responsibility to meet.

For most professions, though, the impact of drugs is largely personal. Traditionally an employer's concern does not extend to the behavior of a worker who after hours breaks the law in this fashion and endangers his own health. It has been a matter for the individual and his family, and perhaps ultimately the police or a counselor.

Of course, the situation is entirely different when employees take drugs while on the job. The same is true if their work habits slide because of off-duty drug use, or absenteeism climbs and behavior becomes erratic or odd. In each case, an employer has every right to investigate the reasons.

But in the absence of disturbing or suspicious behavior, workers should expect to be treated as law-abiding citizens, not probable felons. Their private lives should remain their own business.

A presumption of innocense isn't just a legalistic fancy accorded to criminal suspects. All of us deserve its protection.

THE AMRAAM HASN'T BEEN TESTED ENOUGH

HON. DENNY SMITH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of Defense, by act of Congress, certified on February 28, 1986, that the AMRAAM [advanced medium range air-to-air missile] will have an average cost of $305,000 per missile and will meet its performance specifications.

Secretary Weinberger's own test director, Jack Krings, told the Secretary in a memorandum, dated December 17 that there was not enough test information to certify the AMRAAM'S performance. Despite this, Secretary Weinberger certified the performance of the AMRAAM.

Congress cannot sit idly by and allow the taxpayers money to be squandered on a weapon system that hasn't been thoroughly tested. I've included for my colleagues' information my latest correspondences on this matter.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, March 10, 1986.

Hon. LES ASPIN,
Cannon House Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR LES: It's no secret to you that I have been a vociferous supporter of a rigorous "fly before buy" approach to weapons procurement since coming to Congress. In my opinion, the demonstrated lack of serious Congressional and DoD attention focused on realistic operational testing of proposed weapons systems is a mistake we will be forced to revisit time and time again as our young fighting men die needlessly in battle because of untested weapons.

In that light, I have been thoroughly pleased to see the House Armed Services Committee take the lead in excercising a tough oversight role concerning the proposed AMRAAM missile. As you are well aware, Secretary Weinberger recently addressed your Committee's concerns for the AMRAAM program by certifying that the missile would cost an average of $305,000 and perform in accordance with its development specifications. While I certainly count myself among those supportive of the Air Force's goal of increasing its air-to-air capability, I remain skeptical, to say the least, of any claims, assertions, or certifications as to the cost and performance of a weapon that has experienced such huge cost growth and deep technical trouble in the past.

Memorandums, like the one attached, from the DoD Director of Operational Test and Evaluation, only heighten my concern. According to the General Accounting Office (GAO) report on the subject, the prognosis concerning missile performance since the DOT&E 17 December memo has only gotten worse. The report states:

"A fifth air launch test scheduled for December 1985 was postponed until mid January 1986, because ground tests revealed a power problem with the transmitting tube's coil. The missile was returned to Hughes for further testing, evaluation, and component replacement.

"The mid January test was further delayed when a replacement missile was found to have a hardware problem. This missile was returned to Hughes' Canoga Park facility for repair.

"At the end of January another flight test was attempted. The missile self aborted because of internal power problems. This missile was also returned to the contractor for further analysis."

My concern is not that an advanced medium range air-to-air missile cannot be built. It is obviously within the realm of current technology to produce such a weapon. However, I am very wary when a program originally slated for approximately 90 tests by March 1st, 1986 falls so far behind schedule that only four tests can be conducted. To certify the AMRAAM will perform in accordance with all its development specifications after only these four firings, none operational, stretches the limits of ones imagination. In addition, how the final cost of a weapon so early in its test phase could be certified down to the dollar is beyond me, particularly given our horrendous track record with air-to-air missile cost growth in the past.

It is ironical, to put it mildly, that the Secretary's certification of AMRAAM cost and performance arrived on Capitol Hill on the same day the Packard Commission Report was released. Current acquisition policy for AMRAAM is divorced from the common sense policy concerning extensive operational testing during advanced and full-scale development set forth in the Packard Commission Report.

I strongly urge your Committee to (a) ask for a thorough GAO investigation of the adequacy of the factual basis for Secretary Weinberger's certification, and (b) to withhold all funds for production of the AMRAAM until the report of this thorough investigation has been completed. Our fighting men, and the taxpayers, deserve no less.

Best regards,

DENNY SMITH,
Member of Congress.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington DC, December 17, 1985.

AMRAAM SPR

I. SUMMARY

There is a low probability of adequate test results being available for an operational capability forecast before March certification.

II. BASIS

1. Test information gathering rate suggests very limited useful data will be available for March certification.

2. Progress in testing is hampered by missile hardware availability, software development and limited test assets.

3. The key test asset, the ACE 2 POD fits the F16, has AMRAAM size/type hardware and necessary software for three (Stage 3) missile shots. It is 5-6 months late and has not been successfully flown. We are still three missile test flights away from the level of data planned at certification time.

4. Three test firings have been accomplished to date: unplanned test problems requiring repeated tests precluded accomplishment of all scheduled events. This and continued normal test problems will typically accumulate re-test events. This compounds schedule slipping.

5. Testers are successfully controlling tests insuring tests requirements are achievable before expending valuable limited tests assets.

6. There is little realistic potential for acceleration and schedule recovery.

III. SUGGESTIONS

1. A realistic schedule showing "expected" not "possible" test progress is needed to properly prepare for the March certification.

2. HAC/USAF program and test management has been suspect in the past. Little progress through additional manpower/funding increase is possible. Remember AMRAAM is only 5% of Hughes Business.

——— ———.

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, DC, February 28, 1986.

Hon. DENNY SMITH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SMITH: I appreciate your concern for the Advanced Medium Range Air-to-Air (AMRAAM) Program, a weapon critical to the defense of both the United States and our NATO Allies. I will address the concerns you raised in your February 24, 1986 letter and explain why I believe they do not preclude proceeding with the program as it is currently structured.

It is not meaningful to take the FY 1986 procurement budget of $209.0 million and divide it by the second source contractor's 15 qualification missiles to arrive at a $13.9 million unit cost. The FY 1986 missile procurement budget that you refer to as the baseline for the start of production is, in fact, a preproduction effort preparatory to the FY 1987 Lot I Low Rate Initial Production (LRIP). It consists of the continuation of the AMRAAM producibility program, the second source qualification effort, and advance buy funds for the FY 1987 production start. (A more producible missile and the early competition allowed by the early qualification effort are essential to a more affordable missile.) There are no missiles being produced in FY 1986 for operational units. The second source contractor will produce 15 test configured missiles to verify his ability to produce. The costs reflected in the FY 1986 budget are primarily one-time costs necessary to begin the production effort. While these costs are applicable to the average unit cost for the entire missile buy, they do not constitute the baseline for current-year unit costs.

In regard to your concern for our ability to meet the average unit costs reflected in the production cost cap, I am confident that it is possible based on the production learning curves we expect. They are based on actual experience drawn from the production of existing air-to-air missiles. In addition, we have received not-to-exceed prices from the chief executive officers that validate our production cost estimates. Of course, these estimates are based on the assumption that Congress will approve the funds in the amounts and on the schedules requested.

On the topic of operational testing of AMRAAM prior to production decisions, we have a well thought out test plan. This plan provides the necessary data to support the phased production decisions ensuring that AMRAAM will meet our combat requirements. The 90 launches planned coupled with simulation and captive flight test data will provide evaluation of a large variety of operational scenarios. Our program is a combined development test and evaluation/initial operational test and evaluation (DT&E/IOT&E) program that allows the firings in the operational scenarios to build on the results of the development testing. There is a complete sharing of data between the developing and operational testing communities. This approach allows us to obtain sufficient data by the April 1987 LRIP decision and a complete data set necessary to support the planned rate production decision in FY 1989. This test plan is being reviewed by the Director of Operational Test and Evaluation, and he will assure that it is entirely adequate to provide the necessary operational data for the production decisions.

Our operational testing does not end with the DT&E/IOT&E effort. We will begin a follow-on test and evaluation (FOT&E) with the delivery of the LRIP missiles. We appreciate your offer for additional test assets; however, based on the overall testing we have planned, we believe that the current quantities are adequate.

Again, I would like to thank you for your interest in the AMRAAM program. I offer you the services of the Air Force staff to discuss the details of our program with you or your staff.

Sincerely,

———— ————,

Director of Operational Requirements DCS/Research, Development and Acquisition.

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE,
Washington, DC, February 28, 1986.

Hon. DENNY SMITH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SMITH: In response to your letter of 27 January 1986 concerning AMRAAM, I believe our program is consistent with your thinking. Although it contains about half the launches you mentioned, the testing program is well thought out and has been reviewed time and time again to ensure it will provide sufficient information with which to make each production decision.

The AMRAAM Development Program is two-phased. The test program is designed to provide a complete system evaluation and is specifically structured to obtain weapon system assessments consistent with the two phases. Testing planned before the April 1987 DSARC IIIA is sufficient to support the low rate initial production decision. Subsequent testing will focus on completing the entire complement of missile tests. A full set of data will be available at the completion of the development program to support the DSARC IIIB decision for full rate production. To allow for a smooth transition from development to production, the program contains a minimum of concurrency between testing and production.

A combined development and operational test and evaluation structure was established for the AMRAAM program to eliminate redundant testing and provide the most efficient use of resources. It is a completely integrated test plan. Missile firings in operational scenarios will build from the foundation provided by developmental tests and provide the final basis for system effectiveness evaluation. Data from all 90 launches will contribute to our operational evaluation. Live firings will be supplemented by simulation and captive flight test data to expand the variety of operational scenarios including some not feasible with live fire testing.

I believe there has been some lack of appreciation as to the extent and value of nondestructive testing. Hardware-in-the-loop simulation explores, evaluates, and validates launch envelopes and system effectiveness (Pk) in all engagement conditions. Reliability test articles (from the Test, Analyze, and Fix and Captive Carry Reliability Programs) test, evaluate, and validate missile system reliability/durability in storage, captive carriage, and free flight. The AMRAAM Captive Equipment (ACE), which I mentioned in my 15 Nov 85 letter, provides us excellent information on missile acquisition and guidance. Numerous profiles or repetitions can be run during a flight sortie with ACE and far more efficiently and cost-effectively than actually launching a tactical missile.

The current combined development and operational test program is a valid approach, contains the necessary number of live test launches, and will thoroughly explore the many different missile parameters.

Base on the above [your offer for additional test articles is appreciated, but I believe the current program is sufficient to support the decision process appropriately.]

Sincerely,

JOHN M. LOH, Maj. Gen. USAF,

PULASKI DAY IN ILLINOIS

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to thank the Governor of Illinois, James R. Thompson, for making the first Monday in March an Illinois holiday in celebration of Count Casimir Pulaski, Polish hero of the American Revolutionary War. Creating this special day not only recalls the brave contributions Pulaski made to the cause of American independence, but also underscores the commitment to liberty and independence of the Polish people. Unfortunately, today, Poland does not enjoy those inalienable rights of man that the famous count fought and died so gallantly for in this land. It is hoped that commemorations in honor of men like Casimir Pulaski will serve to remind all Americans of the plight of the Polish nation.

I would like to have included as part of my statement an article from the March 1 edition of the polish National Alliance newspaper, Zgoda, that tells of the holiday:

PULASKI DAY IN ILLINOIS, MARCH 3, 1986

As a result of the lasting efforts of the PAC (Polish-American Congress) and PNA (Polish National Alliance) leaders, the Governor of Illinois, James R. Thompson signed on August 22, 1985 legislation which introduced the first Monday in March as a holiday in celebration of Casimir Pulaski, a hero of the American Revolutionary War. For the first time, Pulaski Day will be celebrated in Illinois this year on Monday, March 3 on the eve of the 239th anniversary of his birth.

"His courageous actions during our struggle for independence represent the foundation of patriotism and loyalty upon which this country was constructed. With that history and with the fact that Chicago is home of the largest number of Poles outside of Poland, it's only appropriate that we honor him with this holiday"—said Governor Thompson during the ceremony of signing this legislation in the PNA Home Office.

Born on March 4, 1747 in Winiary, near Warka in Poland, Casimir Pulaski became first a hero of the resistance movement (called Konfederacja Barska) in Poland, where he fought against the Russian forces in the years 1768–1772, then a hero of the American Revolution. He came to America in 1777, and joined the revolutionary forces. Called the "Father of the American Cavalry", Pulaski became famous because of his bold actions that saved Washington's army at Brandywine and Warren Tavern. His Legion marched in 1779 into South Carolina and lifted the impending seige of Charleston. In the defense of Savannah Pulaski was mortally wounded; he died at the age of 32, on October 11, 1779.

The fascinating history of this brave Polish cavalry officer has been presented in many American publications, just to mention "Polish Past in America" by Mieczyslaw Haiman (Chicago 1974).

VOTING RECORD

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, it has become my practice from time to time to list my votes in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I strongly believe that the people of the Second Congressional District of Arizona have a right to know where I stand on the issues decided by this body, and I have found that printing my record here is the best way to provide that information.

This is not an all inclusive list. I have omitted noncontroversial votes such as quorum calls, motions to resolve into the Committee of the Whole House, and motions to approve the Journal of the previous day.

The descriptions are necessarily somewhat short, and I am sure that some of my constituents will have additional questions about the issues described here. So I invite them to write me for more specifics.

The votes are described as follows:

KEY

1. Rollcall Number;
2. Number of the bill or resolution;
3. Title of the bill or resolution;
4. A description of the vote;
5. The outcome of the vote;
6. The vote total;
7. My vote, in the form Y=yes, N=no, and NV=not voting;
8. The vote totals of the Arizona delegation (yes-no-not voting);
9. The date.

201. S 1160. Department of Defense Authorization, Fiscal 1986. Aspin, D-Wis., motion to allow conferees on the bill to meet in closed session to discuss secret information. Motion agreed to 412-2: Y(5-0-0), July 11, 1985.

202. HR 1555. Foreign Assistance Authorization, Fiscal 1986. Siljander, R-Mich., amendment to prohibit non-food economic aid to Mozambique until the president certified to Congress that the number of foreign military advisors and troops in that country did not exceed 55. Adopted 247-177: N(4-1-0), July 11, 1985.

203. HR 1555. Foreign Assistance Authorization, Fiscal 1986. Siljander, R-Mich., amendment to authorize issuance of insurance by the Overseas Private Investment Corp. for business ventures jointly owned by U.S. citizens and non-white South Africans. Rejected 88-337: N(2-3-0), July 11, 1985.

204. HR 1555. Foreign Assistance Authorization, Fiscal 1986. Hall, D-Ohio, amendment to state that Congress may defer future military aid to the Philippines if significant progress is not achieved in various political, economic and military reforms there, or if U.S. aid is used to violate the human rights of the Filipino people. Adopted 254-169: Y(1-4-0), July 11, 1985.

205. HR 99. American Conservative Corps. Passage of the bill to authorize such sums as Congress considers necessary in fiscal 1986-88 to establish an American Conservation Corps to put unemployed youths to work on conservation projects. Passed 193-191: Y(1-4-0), July 11, 1985.

207. HR 2959. Energy and Water Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Derrick, D-S.C., motion to order the previous question (thus ending debate and the possibility of amendment) on the rule (H Res 221) to waive points of order against the bill based on the absence of authorizations for certain programs therein. The rule also waived points of order for failure to comply with provisions of the 1974 Congressional Budget Act (PL 93-344) with respect to the bill to appropriate $15,273,085,000 for energy and water development during fiscal 1986. The same waiver applied to the fiscal 1986 appropriations for Commerce, Justice, State and the Judiciary (HR 2965) and the legislative branch (HR 2942). Motion agreed to 415-6: Y(5-0-0-), July 16, 1985.

208. HR 2959. Energy and Water Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Adoption of the rule (H Res 221) to waive points of order against the bill based on the absense of authorizations for certain programs therein. The rule also waived points of order for failure to comply with provisions of the 1974 Congressional Budget Act (PL 93-344) with respect to the bill to appropriate $15,273,085,000 for energy and water development during fiscal 1986. This budget waiver also applied to the fiscal 1986 appropriations bills for Commerce, Justice, State and the Judiciary (HR 29659) and the legislative branch (HR 2942). Adopted 239-181: Y(3-2-0), July 16, 1985.

209. HR 2959. Energy and Water Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Weaver, D-Ore., amendment to delete $4 million in funds for road building associated with the Elk Creek Dam, Ore. Rejected 142-282: Y(2-3-0), July 16, 1985. (The bill, to appropriate $15,273,085,000 for energy and water development during fiscal 1986, was subsequently passed by voice vote.)

210. HR 2965. Commerce, Justice, State and the Judiciary Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Adoption of the rule (H Res 225) to waive points of order against the appropriations bill for the Commerce, Justice and State departments, the federal judiciary and related agencies, based on the absense of authorizations for certain programs therein. Adopted 234-188: Y(2-3-0), July 17, 1985.

211. HR 2965. Commerce, Justice, State and the Judiciary Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Walker, R-Pa., amendment to delete $206 million for the Economic Development Administration. Rejected en bloc 98-315: N(3-2-0), July 17, 1985. A "nay" was a vote supporting the President's position.

212. HR 2965. Commerce, Justice, State and the Judiciary Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Yates, D-Ill., amendment to delete from the Justice Department budget $500,000 that would be used for attorneys' fees for non-Indian litigants in New Mexico water rights cases. Adopted 244-177: Y(3-2-0), July 17, 1985. (The money was later added to the appropriation for the Legal Services Corporation.)

213. HR 2965. Commerce, Justice, State and the Judiciary Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Rudd, R-Ariz., amendment to delete $20 million from the U.S. contribution to international organizations. Adopted 302-116: Y(5-0-0), July 17, 1985.

214. HR 2965. Commerce, Justice, State and the Judiciary Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Hiler, R-Ind., amendment to cut $95 million from the Business Loan and Investment Fund of the Small Business Administration. Adopted 257-158: N(4-1-0), July 17, 1985.

215. HR 2965. Commerce, Justice, State and the Judiciary Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Frenzel, R-Minn., amendment to trim all discretionary funding in the bill by four percent (about $350 million). Rejected 149-266: N(2-3-0), July 17, 1985.

216. HR 2965. Commerce, Justice, State and the Judiciary Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Smith, D-Iowa, motion that the Committee of the Whole rise and report the bill back to the House. Motion rejected 183-232: Y(3-2-0), July 17, 1985. (This procedural move is used to limit the types of amendments that can be offered to a bill once the House, rather than the Committee of the Whole, is in session. The effect of the vote was to allow consideration of the DeWine, R-Ohio amendment to bar the Legal Services Corporation from using funds for any abortion-related litigation. The DeWine amendment was subsequently passed by voice vote, and the House then agreed to rise from the Committee of the Whole.)

217. HR 2965. Commerce, Justice, State and the Judiciary Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Smith, D-Iowa, motion that the Committee of the Whole rise and report the bill back to the House. Motion agreed to 227-185: Y(2-2-1), July 17, 1985.

218. HR 2965. Commerce, Justice, State and the Judiciary Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Passage of the bill to provide $11,922,021 for the Commerce, Justice and State departments, the federal judiciary and related agencies. Passed 273-136: Y(1-3-1), July 17, 1985.

219. HR 2965. Legislative Branch Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Miller, R-Ohio, amendment to cut $10 million from the amount appropriated for official congressional mail, to limit members' use of the frank. Rejected 204-217: N(4-1-0), July 18, 1985.

220. HR 2942. Legislative Branch Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Brown, R-Colo., amendment to eliminate a $106,000 increase in funds for the House office buildings for five new automatic-elevator operator positions. Rejected 191-221: N(4-1-0), July 18, 1985.

221. HR 2942. Legislative Branch Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Wylie, R-Ohio, amendment to cut $103,000 from the Library of Congress' program for Braille reproductions of magazines for the blind. Adopted 216-193: N(2-3-0), July 18, 1985. (Wylie said the aim was to eliminate funding for Braille editions of Playboy magazine.)

222. HR 2942. Legislative Branch Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Cobey, R-N.C., amendment to cut all funding in the bill by 2.7 percent. Rejected 193-211: N(3-2-0), July 18, 1985.

223. HR 2942. Legislative Branch Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Passage of the bill to provide $1,294,470 in fiscal 1986 for operations of the House of Representatives and legislative branch agencies. Passed 263-136: Y(2-3-0), July 18, 1985.

224. HR 8. Clean Water Act Amendments. Stangeland, R-Minn., amendment to authorize the Environmental Protection Agency, in a five-year demonstration project, to allow up to 40 localities to operate their own programs for "pre-treatment" of industrial wastes, provided the programs achieve results at least as good as those required under national pre-treatment standards. Rejected 167-257: N(3-2-0), July 23, 1985.

225. HR 8. Clean Water Act Amendments. Pursell, R-Mich., amendment to freeze fiscal 1986 spending under the bill, which would reauthorize and strengthen the Clean Water Act, at the fiscal 1985 appropriations level of $2,606,726,000, and to limit increases in fiscal 1987-90 appropriations levels to adjustments for inflation. Rejected 207-219: N(4-1-0), July 23, 1985.

226. HR 8. Clean Water Act Amendments. Passage of the bill to reauthorize and amend the Clean Water Act, authorizing $12,000,000,000 in federal grants and another $9,000,000,000 in fiscal 1986-94 in revolving loan funds. Passed 340-83: Y(3-2-0), July 23, 1985.

227. H Res 231. Special Budget Procedures. Adoption of the resolution to provide that the House-passed first budget resolution for fiscal 1986 (H Con Res 152, S Con Res 32) would be considered to be adopted by Congress for purposes of the 1974 Congressional Budget Act as it applied to the House. The resolution provided that it would no longer be in effect if Congress were to adopt a first budget resolution. The resolution also specified allocation of new budget and entitlement authority to each House committee, in conformance with the House-passed budget resolution. Adopted 242-184: Y(1-4-0), July 24, 1985. (The effect of the vote was to order House committees to change statutes under their jurisdiction to meet reconciliation requirements in the House-passed budget resolution, and to grant a blanket waiver of points of order to allow floor consideration of fiscal 1986 appropriations bills and authorization bills creating new spending authority.)

228. HR 3011. Interior Department Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Adoption of the rule (H Res 227) to waive certain points of order against the bill to provide $8,261,119,000 in fiscal 1986 appropriations for programs in the Department of the Interior and related agencies. Rejected 179-251: Y(2-3-0), July 24, 1985.

229. HR 3038. Housing and Urban Development Department/Independent Agencies Appropriations, fiscal 1986. Adoption of the rule (H Res 233) to waive certain points of order against the bill to provide $57,807,513,781 in fiscal 1986 appropriations for programs of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, Veteran's Administration, Environmental Protection Agency and other independent agencies. Adopted 266-159: Y(1-4-0), July 24, 1985.

230. HR 3037. Agriculture Appropriations, fiscal 1986. Passage of the bill to provide $36,398,686,000 in fiscal 1986 appropriations for programs in the Department of Agriculture and related agencies. Passed 354-71: Y(4-1-0), July 24, 1985.

231. HR 10. National Development Investment Act. Adoption of the rule (H Res 223) to waive certain points of order against and to provide for House floor consideration of the bill to authorize $530 million annually in fiscal 1986-88 for activities of the Economic Development Administration; $723 million for fiscal 1986-90 for non-highway programs of the Appalachian Regional Commission; and $2 billion for fiscal 1986-92 for highway programs of the Appalachian Regional Commission. Adopted 406-12: Y(4-1-0), July 24, 1985.

232. HR 3038. Housing and Urban Development Department/Independent Agencies Appropriations, fiscal 1986. Bartlett, R-Texas, amendment to eliminate the $500 million reserve included in the bill for new housing programs. Adopted 236-172: N(3-1-1), July 25, 1985.

233. HR 3038. Housing and Urban Development Department/Independent Agencies Appropriations, fiscal 1986. Bartlett, R-Texas, amendment to reduce the number of new units of public housing from 10,000 to 5,000, reducing the appropriation for new public housing from $1.98 billion to $990 million. Adopted 213-204: N(3-1-1), July 25, 1985.

234. HR 3038. Housing and Urban Development Department/Independent Agencies Appropriations, fiscal 1986. Bartlett, R-Texas, amendment to reduce the appropriation for assisted housing by 2.5 percent, or $231 million. Rejected 203-213: N(3-1-1), July 25, 1985.

235. HR 3038. Housing and Urban Development Department/Independent Agencies Appropriations, fiscal 1986. Henry, R-Mich., amendments to reduce the appropriation for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration from $7.67 billion to $7.51 billion, and for the National Science Foundation from $1.52 billion to $1.5 billion, the same levels as in fiscal 1985. Rejected en bloc 112-300: N(2-2-1), July 25, 1985.

236. HR 3038. Housing and Urban Development Department/Independent Agencies Appropriations, fiscal 1986. Passage of the bill to provide $56,317,513,781 in fiscal 1986 for the Department of Housing and Urban Development and several independent agencies. Passed 340-73: Y(3-1-1), July 25, 1985.

237 HJ Res 187. Compact of Free Association. Passage of the joint resolution to bestow limited autonomy on the Marshall Islands and the Federated States of Micronesia in the Pacific Ocean. The compact, estimated to cost the United States $2.39 billion over the next 15 years, gives the islands the status of sovereign nations freely associated with the United States for defense and economic support. Passed 360-12: Y(4-0-1), July 25, 1985.

239. HR 3036. Treasury, Postal Service and General Government Appropriations, fiscal 1986. Adoption of the rule (H Res 236) to waive certain points of order against the bill to appropriate funds for the Treasury Department, Postal Service and other programs for fiscal 1986. Adopted 242-135: Y(1-3-1), July 26, 1985.

240. HR 3036. Treasury, Postal Service and General Government Appropriations, fiscal 1986. Nelson, D-Fla., substitute for the Jacobs, D-Ind., amendment, to delete $219,400 from the section of the bill providing expenses for former presidents. Adopted 199-162: Y(4-0-1), July 26, 1985. (The Jacobs amendment would have deleted all non-pension funds for former presidents. The Jacobs amendment, as amended by the Nelson substitute, subsequently was adopted.)

241. HR 3036. Treasury, Postal Service and General Government Appropriations, fiscal 1986. Jacobs, D-Ind., amendment as amended by the Nelson, D-Fla., substitute to reduce expense funds for former presidents. Adopted 219-130: NV(2-0-3), July 26, 1985.

242. S J Res 180. Helsinki Accords Anniversary. Passage of the joint resolution to reaffirm Congress' support for the Helsinki human rights principles, and to request that the president direct the State Department to convey U.S. concerns for human rights to the Soviet Union and its allies. Passed 414-0: Y(5-0-0), July 30, 1985. (The resolution commemorates the 10th anniversary of the August 1, 1975 signing of the Helsinki Final Act.)

243. HR 3036. Treasury, Postal Service and General Government Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Coleman, D-Texas, amendment to the Frenzel, R- Minn., amendment, to exempt the U.S. Customs Service, Internal Revenue Service, Postal Service and several law enforcement agencies from a 2.65 percent spending cut. Adopted 288-133: Y(2-3-0), July 30, 1985. (The Frenzel amendment would have reduced appropriations for all discretionary programs in the bill by 2.65 percent. The Frenzel amendment, as amended by the Coleman amendment, was subsequently adopted by voice vote.)

244. HR 3036. Treasury, Postal Service and General Government Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Roybal, D-Calif., motion that the Committee of the Whole rise and report the bill back to the House. Motion agreed to 238-186: Y(1-4-0), July 30, 1985. (The effect of the vote was to prevent consideration of amendments limiting spending on the appropriations bill, in this case the Cobey, R-N.C., amendment to require the Federal Election Commission to enforce a U.S. Supreme Court ruling prohibiting the use of compulsory union dues for political activities. Such amendments are in order only following a defeated motion to rise and report.)

245. HR 3036. Treasury, Postal Service, and General Government Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Passage of the bill to provide $13,227,868,125 for the Treasury Department, U.S. Postal Service, Executive Office of the President and other independent agencies. Passed 249-172: Y(2-3-0), July 30, 1985. (The president had requested $12,060,171,000 in new budget authority.)

246. HR 3067. District of Columbia Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Dixon D-Calif., motion that the Committee of the Whole rise and report the bill back to the House. Rejected 172-244; Y(1-4-0), July 30, 1985. (The effect of the vote was to allow consideration of amendments limiting spending on the appropriations bill, in this case the Smith, R-N.J., amendment. Such amendments are in order only following a defeated motion to rise and report.)

247. HR 3067. District of Columbia Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Smith R-N.J., amendment to bar the use of any funds in the bill to pay for abortions. Adopted 221-199: N(4-1-0), July 30, 1985.

248. HR 3067. District of Columbia Appropriations, Fiscal 1986. Passage of the bill to provide $532,170,000 in federal funds and $2,689,077,000 in District funds in fiscal 1986. Passed 242-173: Y(2-3-0), July 30, 1985.

249. S 960. Foreign Assistance Authorization. Adoption of the conference report on the bill to authorize $12,774,281,000 in each of the fiscal years 1986 and 1987 for foreign aid programs. Adopted 262-161: Y(4-1-0), July 31, 1985.

250. H Con Res 179. Adjournment Resolution. Adoption of the concurrent resolution to provide for the adjournment of the House from August 1 or 2 to September 4th, 1985, and for the adjournment of the Senate from August 1 or 2 to September 4th or 9th, 1985. Adopted 230-192: Y(3-2-0), July 31, 1985.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICAN YOUTH

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, recently I received word that a constituent of mine, Brian J. Gottstein, a senior at Lockport Senior High School in Lockport, NY, was the winner of the Veterans of Foreign Wars Voice of Democracy Scholarship Program in New York State.

Because Brian's message is one of hope, I thought it fitting to insert it in the RECORD as illustrative of the kind of leadership statement that we can expect from our young men and women. Needless to say, I am very proud of Brian.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

Today's youth have many opportunities to get ahead and achieve their goals more than any other generation has ever had. Each generation has more advantages given to them than the previous one, but, unfortunately, many of us don't realize this until the opportunities have passed us by. New and better opportunities means newer and better horizons for the future.

The opportunities that are given to one throughout one's life are almost limitless. Although we do not all have the same opportunities, we do share many major ones. Free public education, for example, is something given to everyone—and it's so important because it's the basic foundation for our future careers and social interaction with others. After high school, you can go on to learn skilled trades, go to college to get more academic training, or join the armed forces to serve your country and continue your education. Even if you can't afford college, often times you can use your mind and talents to win scholarships and grants to help pay for it.

There are so many different fields of employment that if you try hard enough, you can be almost anything you want to be and because there is incentive to work harder, the rewards and promotions are fantastic. Even when the moments look darkest, there is always someone or something behind you, pushing you and helping you to go on. Setbacks will hit you throughout life; you can't let them turn you into a failure. A failure is not a person who doesn't succeed the first, second, or third time, but rather he is one who doesn't even try or quits after only a few setbacks.

One of the greatest opportunities, freedom, the basic principle on which our country is founded, has allowed us to aim for and achieve our goals. We are given certain rights which are protected under the law, and we are striving for equality and gaining more of a voice in our own affairs. We are given the opportunity to voice our own opinions about ourselves, others, and our country.

Our new horizons look toward a more optimistic and better tomorrow. We know that we can change things in the world and make it a better place for all to live in. In this country we have the freedom and opportunity to make a difference that can change our lives and the lives of others if we work together. Various academic, sports, civic, social, and religious organizations allow us to do this and also to learn about each other and grow within ourselves; helping us to mature physically, mentally, emotionally and spiritually.

The list of opportunities given to each individual is so great that no one could ever remember all the ones given to them—large or small. Our opportunities give us an incentive to achieve and try harder, and with greater achievements come even more opportunities and broader horizons for America's youth of today and the youth of the future.

AID TO THE CONTRAS

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, today, I made a 1-minute speech calling to the attention of my colleagues the editorial in the March 24 edition of the New Republic. The editorial makes the case for supporting the President's request for aid to the democratic resistance in Nicaragua.

The editorial examines the various arguments put forth by critics of aid to the Contras and convincingly rebuts each excuse. One of those arguments is that "the Contras will draw the United States into war." But as the New Republic states:

Nothing is more likely to force American military intervention than the consolidation of an aggressive, highly militarized, pro-Soviet regime in the area. The contras want to do their own fighting. Cut them off, and the only body in the hemisphere able to restrain the Sandinistas will be the U.S. Army.

I urge my colleagues to read this thoughtful and thought-provoking commentary.

THE CASE FOR THE CONTRAS

The upcoming vote in Congress on military aid to the Nicaraguan contras is one of the most important foreign policy votes of the decade. The future of Central America hinges on its outcome.

The position of the contras is precarious. They certainly have people: anywhere from 14,000 to 20,000, depending on whom you believe. That represents about twice the number of guerrillas in El Salvador, a country with about twice the population of Nicaragua. And about three times the number of Sandinista troops at the time of the overthrow of Somoza.

They also have people on the home front. Not even the most anti-contra-aid congressman denies that the Sandinistas have become extremely unpopular. Among those strongly opposed to Sandinista rule is the Church, the most popular institution in Nicaraguan society. The pope's divisions are not the only disaffected. These now include ordinary people deprived of the necessities of life in a wrecked economy; the business and middle classes, which have been denied the promises of freedom; and many intellectuals, some in exile, who don't relish life as functionaries of the state. The contras, a peasant army, themselves represent the deep resentment in the countryside at Sandinista offenses to tradition and religion. Add to that the general uprising of the Miskitos against Sandinista colonialism, and you have a vast popular opposition. These are the people whose hopes would be betrayed by the liquidation of the armed resistance and the consolidation of Sandinista rule, which will be the inevitable result of an American denial of military aid to the contras.

But if they are so many, why haven't they already won? For the same reason Solidarity, ten million strong, lost in Poland. Under Leninist regimes, Philippine-style "people power" does not do terribly well. Nor do vastly out-gunned, out-trained guerrilla armies do well against Cuban-Soviet-style military machines.

The Soviets have poured something on the order of $500 million in arms into Nicaragua in the last five years. Since 1984 the U.S. has been prevented from sending the contras a penny's worth of arms. The recent delivery of helicopter gunships to the Sandinistas, reportedly piloted in combat by Cubans, has been decisive. It has made it extremely difficult for the contras to move and to resupply. In the absence of antiaircraft weaponry, they are quite defenseless.

As a result, contra advances and successes in the past several years are being reversed. In the last six months, particularly since the introduction of the MI-24 gunships, all but between 3,000 and 6,000 contras have been driven from Nicaragua. The rest are in Honduran camps waiting for arms. In civil wars numbers alone can't determine the outcome, particularly if one's side is barely armed.

And also barely trained. Again out of congressional scrupulousness, the U.S. military has been prohibited from training and professionalizing the contra forces, as it has done in El Salvador with a resulting marked improvement in the country's human rights record. It is somewhat paradoxical to argue that we shouldn't be training the contras because they are so undisciplined when one of the major reasons this peasant army remains undisciplined is that the U.S. military is prohibited from training it.

Thus the upcoming vote will be critical. Without military aid, the contras will fight and bleed perhaps for some time longer, but without hope. First to wither will be the armed resistance, overcome by vastly superior Soviet-supplied firepower. Then, just as certainly, the unarmed resistance, demoralized and abandoned, will follow, leaving the Sandinistas in total, permanent control of Nicaragua.

What's so bad about that? What, after all, does the resistance hope to achieve? Sandinista defense minister Humberto Ortega explained it well when, in 1981, he denounced former Sandinista junta member Alfonso Robelo as an enemy of the revolution. "The democracy that Robelo asks," charged Ortega, "is . . . that they [the bourgeoisie, presumably] have the army, the power, and that we Sandinistas be what the left is in Costa Rica, a sector, an organization that is free to move about, that publishes its newspaper." In other words, Robelo wants, for Nicaragua, Costa Rican style democracy, where all political tendencies, including the left, are free to compete for (rotating) power. For Humberto Ortega, such a program amounts to political criminality. It is what made the Sandinistas push Robelo out of the junta, crush his party, and drive him to exile and resistance. Robelo is now one of the three leaders of the contras political leadership, the United Nicaraguan Opposition, known as UNO.

What is at stake in this civil war is any hope for a democratic Nicaragua. The end of the contras means the end of that hope. And a ban on military aid will likely mean, sooner or later, the end of the contras.

One would think that House Democrats, who for years have been urging, pushing, encouraging, threatening, and finally celebrating the return of democracy in the Philippines, would be equally eager to see democracy returned to Nicaragua. But they are not. Why? They put up a case that we find, for an issue of this gravity, stunningly weak.

By what right does the U.S. try to bring democracy to a place where it enforced dictatorship for so long? This is the "because of our tainted history we have no moral standing" argument. It is mystifying. The United States stood by the dictatorship in Haiti for a least three decades. Does that mean that we should therefore have ruled ourselves morally ineligible to assist in the transition to democracy? The United States ruled the Philippines as a colony for nearly five decades, then stood by a dictator for the last two. Does that mean that the United States should have disqualified itself from aiding the restoration of democracy?

Certainly the U.S. has a very blemished history in Nicaragua. It is equally certain that our aims now are different than they were 60, even 20, years ago. As in Guatemala and El Salvador, as in the Philippines and Haiti and other places where our history is stained, in Nicaragua the relevant question is American intentions today, not Teddy Roosevelt's at the time of the building of the Panama Canal.

We have no right to try to impose democracy on another country. After the Philippines and Haiti, and the general self-congratulatory jubilation of liberals and conservatives alike over two triumphs of American diplomacy, this argument stands exposed as a camouflage. Those who advocate dramatic American intervention in pro-American dictatorships should not be suddenly stricken with scrupulousness about the sanctity of sovereignty when intervention is proposed in states ruled by pro-Soviet Leninists.

But one situation involves peaceful change; the other, war. If in Nicaragua transition to democracy were possible without war, we too would oppose any fighting. But that option does not exist. Does anyone believe that the Sandinistas will ever peacefully transfer power or permit a free allocation of power by election?

The contras can't win. This argument is invariably heard from those who vote again and again to cut off aid to the contras. Yes, unarmed they can't win. Maybe House Democrats expect Nicaraguan democrats to win by lying down in front of Sandinista tanks, Philippine style.

Can the contras win the way the North Vietnamese won in South Vietnam? No, but they can win in the way the Sandinistas won in Managua. They could win not by rolling over the Sandinista army, but by controlling the countryside, which would in turn help undermine what little urban support the Sandinistas have. A Leninist regime with a conscript army on the defensive, losing the countryside and undermined in the city, would ultimately find its situation untenable.

The contras are not democrats but Somocistas. It is true that some top commanders are ex-Guardia. But even the most conservative (and powerful) of the three political leaders, Adolofo Calero, was a longtime opponent of Somoza and jailed for his efforts. The other UNO leader, Arturo Cruz, an impeccable democrat, says the contras represent "the revolt of Nicaraguans against oppression by other Nicaraguans." One doesn't raise an army of 15,000 peasants with promises of restoring a universally despised dictatorship.

We should try diplomacy, not force. The United States should be working out with the Sandinistas some kind of diplomatic arrangement under the umbrella of Contadora. This imagined solution to Sandinista regional power and ambitions is a parchment barrier: the Sandinistas are given free rein within their borders, and in return, they promise not to trespass on anyone else's. Certainly we can expect the Sandinistas to adhere initially to such a nonaggression or revolution-with-frontiers agreement. Time enough for the contras to wither away and be repatriated in Miami. At which point the Sandinistas will be secure in the knowledge that no future opponents are ever going to risk their lives in a second insurgency, having seen the first one sold out. With a free hand, does anyone imagine that they will adhere to their agreements any more than, say, the Vietnamese adhered to theirs? We have experience with Sandinista parchment. In 1979 they pledged to the Organization of American States to establish an open, democratic, and pluralistic society.

It takes willful blindness to imagine that some kind of paper agreement with the Sandinistas that allows them to consolidate their power will ensure stability in Central America. In fact, the opposite is almost certainly the case. A highly militarized, highly disciplined country with by far the largest army in Central America, with ideological ambitions stretching far beyond its borders, and supported by Cuba and the Soviet Union, is bound to be a source of constant instability in a region of weak and fledgling democracies.

The neighboring countries seem to want a Contadora solution. What does one expect from, say, Costa Rica, a country with no army facing a 50,000-man military across its border? It sees a starved insurgency, an isolationist U.S. Congress, and a rising military power in Managua. Does one expect Costa Rica publicly to come out in support of overthrowing its neighbor, given the odds now that its neighbor will be in power permanently? Of course such countries will make muted public statements. But as many of the leaders of these weak democracies told the Kissinger Commission and others since, they are desperate to see the United States get rid of the Sandinistas for them.

What is the government of Colombia, one of the original Contadora countries, to say? It publicly denies but privately knows that an assault on its Palace of Justice and the massacre of its Supreme Court was carried out by M-19 guerrillas with weapons of Nicaraguan origin. It knows that Sandinista comandante Tomas Borges attended a mass, complete with an M-19 flag draped over the altar, for the guerrillas killed in that raid. The reach of the Sandinistas is impressive. Latin American governments, many of which face left-wing insurgencies, are hardly likely to make themselves more of a target by public calls for the Yankees to save them from communists.

The contra policy is driving the Sandinistas into the hands of the Soviets. It is hard for Americans to believe that some people act out of ideological conviction. Look, therefore, at what the Sandinistas did long before there was a Reagan, long before there were contras. In one year the Carter administration gave them in aid the equivalent to half of what Somoza received in 16 years, and during that time they systematically eliminated their democratic allies and aligned themselves with the Soviets.

On June 23, 1981, Humberto Ortega said to the Sandinista army and militia officers: "We are saying that Marxism-Leninism is the scientific doctrine that guides our revolution, the instrument of analysis of our Vanguard for understanding [the revolution's] historic process and for carrying out the revolution. . . ." He then asserted that the FSLN had made the pact with the moderate opposition only for the purposes of getting rid of Somoza, holding off U.S. intervention, and keeping the economy in place.

It is remarkable that for House Democrats Sandinista ideological commitment requires constant theatrical demonstration. It took Daniel Ortega's flight to Moscow a few days after a contra vote last year to dramatize Managua's connection with Moscow. You can be sure that this time Ortega's handlers will take away his American Express card until after the vote. Don't expect to see him visiting New York for eye wear or Moscow for hardware until the coast is clear.

The Cubans and Soviets will match our escalation. This is the counsel of pure defeatism. It cedes to the Soviets the power to set the level of violence and superpower commitment on the North American continent. It is, in effect, to say that the Soviet will to annex Nicaragua exceeds that of the United States to prevent it from happening. The prophecy is, of course, self-fulfilling.

The contras will draw the United States into war. Probably the root argument, certainly the one on which Tip O'Neill hangs his hat. Its origin is the fear of another Vietnam and the isolationists hope that if we only will stay out of this fight no harm will come to us.

But nothing is more likely to face American military intervention than the consolidation of an aggressive, highly militarized, pro-Soviet regime in the area. The contras want to do their own fighting. Cut them off, and the only body in the hemisphere able to restrain the Sandinstas will be the U.S. Army. Of course, American military involvement can never be ruled out. But destroying the only indigenous armed opposition to the Nicaraguans hardly seems the way to prevent it.

And what will be more likely to bring about American military involvement? Even Democrats argue that the United States has a vital interest in preventing the establishment of a Soviet base in Nicaragua. Even Democrats would call for American military action in that situation. Walter Mondale, for example, suggested a quarantine. When tried in October 1962, that idea brought us closer to World War III than any other moment in postwar history. A democratic Nicaragua is the only guarantee that the threat will not materialize.

The consolidation of the Sandinistas will lead to a second Cuba on the mainland, or more precisely, to an enlarged first Cuba. As Robelo recalls, during his days in the ruling junta no important decision was ever made without the assent of the Cuban invariably present at the meeting. Even those who think it sentimental for the United States to concern itself with the state of pluralism and democracy in other countries must recognize what a strategic defeat the establishment of a Soviet satellite in Central America would constitute for the United States.

We do not have any illusions about the tragedy that is civil war and the suffering it causes. Guerrilla war is of necessity nasty, brutish, and long. And this peasant army, ill-trained and ill-equipped, is hardly a perfect model for insurgency. But our choice is this model—which could be vastly improved in combat effectiveness and discipline if given sufficient American aid and training—or none.

We believe that preventing the establishment of a Leninist dictatorship in Nicaragua is a goal worthy of American support, and that those willing to fight for this cause are deserving of American assistance. A decision to support one side in a civil war is not one to be taken lightly. We come to it in the full realization that, whatever tragedy it brings, the liquidation of the democratic side of Nicaraguan civil war will bring infinitely more tragedy to Nicaragua, to Central America, and ultimately to the rest of the hemisphere.

STANDARDS ARE NEEDED TO ENSURE SAFE ASBESTOS CLEANUP

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, asbestos is a known human carcinogen which can cause cancer, mesothelioma, and asbestosis when airborne fibers of the mineral are inhaled. Over 100,000 workers have died because they were exposed to asbestos while installing insulation years ago. But, the public health problem caused by asbestos is by no means ended. It is estimated that 15 million children attend school in the more than 30,000 buildings that are contaminated by friable asbestos.

Parents, school officials and teachers are alarmed by this deadly situation and are unsure of ways to resolve it. Sadly, the Federal Government provides few answers. The result has been policymaking in the dark where, according to an Environmental Protection Agency [EPA] estimate, 75 percent of all school asbestos cleanup work has been done improperly. Improper abatement work is worse than no cleanup work at all because more hazardous fibers are released into the air than if the asbestos had not been touched.

A recent article in the Wall Street Journal by Jonathan Dahl, details the sorry state of asbestos abatement. Without Federal regulations guiding cleanup work, this difficult, dangerous business is often left to "rip and skip" firms, as one EPA official has called these disreputable contractors, who intentially skip safety precautions or use slipshod measures.

A deadly cycle is starting over again. This time, the eventual victims are the workers ripping out asbestos, as well as the people living and working in buildings that are supposedly clean. Federal and State agencies cited more than 13,000 asbestos abatement violations last year, including one on the grounds of Vice President Bush's home, according to the Journal article.

We must act now to end this deadly problem. Senator STAFFORD and I recently introduced legislation, the Asbestos Hazard Emergency Response Act of 1986, that would force contractors who do school work to be fully trained and accredited. Rip and skip firms will be forced into compliance or prevented from doing any more work. The legislation also establishes a roadmap showing school officials how to properly inspect for hazardous asbestos and how they should clean it up once it is found.

Following the establishment of standards, schools will be required to inspect where they have not done so already and prepare and implement cleanup plans for any hazardous asbestos found in buildings.

The time has come to end this national problem. I commend to my colleagues this excellent article from the Wall Street Journal detailing the sorry state of asbestos cleanup activities throughout the United States.

RIPPING OUT ASBESTOS ENDANGERS MORE LIVES AS LAWS ARE IGNORED

(By Jonathan Dahl)

The Environmental Protection Agency doesn't have to look far to find people getting exposed to cancer-causing asbestos. Right across the street from its Philadelphia office, the agency caught construction workers ripping out asbestos insulation and heaving it into outdoor dumpsters.

"We could see all this asbestos dust blow by us," says an EPA spokesman. "It made us wonder how the stuff was being removed elsewhere."

The EPA isn't wondering anymore. Since that incident in 1984, shoddy asbestos removals have been alarmingly common in buildings across the country. As a result, one of the nation's greatest occupational tragedies is being repeated. More than 100,000 workers have died because they inhaled asbestos particles while installing insulation years ago. Now, despite publicity about those deaths, the deadly cycle is starting over again. This time, the eventual victims are the workers ripping out asbestos.

"It was bad enough when this happened and we didn't know the risks," says Dr. Irving Selikoff, an occupational-health expert at the Mount Sinai Medical Center in New York. "But now that we know, my God, we shouldn't let this be happening again."

A NATIONAL PROBLEM

Federal and state agencies cited more than 1,300 asbestos violations last year, and a government survey shows that at least 25% of removals are fouled up. Violations have occurred in schools, in apartments and even on Ellis Island in New York and on the grounds of the vice president's residence in Washington. They happen when asbestos cleanup is the main job and when it isn't. Most buildings constructed before 1970 have asbestos, and a health threat exists—even to passers-by—every time one is renovated or demolished. "It is a national problem," says Terrell Hunt, the EPA's highest-ranking criminal lawyer.

Some contractors don't know that they are tearing out asbestos. Others intentionally skip precautions or use slipshod methods. One contractor was sued for hiring dozens of homeless people off the street to remove asbestos from a San Antonio, Texas, hotel. And while the EPA recently beefed up its efforts to deter hazardous removals, experts say the laws pertaining to asbestos still are weak and poorly enforced. Because of the laws' inadequacies, even workers who follow guidelines might still die from asbestos poisoning.

"There are just no standards in the business. Some people do it right, but I've seen some abuses that would make your hair stand on end," says David Kimbrell, a former president of the National Association of Asbestos Abatement Contractors, a trade group based in Washington.

ASBESTOS EVERYWHERE

Ironically, some of the removal jobs aren't even necessary. Asbestos is lethal; it ranks only behind cigarettes as the leading cause of cancer. And while most of its uses are banned today, it is everywhere. Some 30 million tons of the fibrous mineral was mixed into plaster to insulate walls, pipes and ceilings during the past hundred years. But asbestos needs to come out only when it is old and crumbling. That is when the mineral's tiny particles, which cause lung cancer and other respiratory diseases, are released into the air.

Removing insulation without disturbing particles is tricky. The federal government doesn't require that asbestos come out, but it has issued reams of complicated cleanup rules. Insulation is supposed to be sprayed with water and stashed in airtight containers. Special air-circulating machines are recommended. And workers must don face masks and gear that looks like space suits. "There's almost a science to doing it correctly," says Edward Swoszowski, an indoor-air-quality consultant in Norwalk, Conn.

But many removals have been less than scientific. In the building across from the EPA's Philadelphia office, workers were gathering up asbestos debris with brooms and doing the job "the way you'd clean up your garage," says Ben Mykijewycz, an agency inspector. Eventually, the Justice Department sued the building's owner, Liberty Square Associates Ltd., for allegedly violating air-pollution laws. The owner paid a $50,000 fine last March to settle the suit, but made no admission of wrongdoing. A Justice Department suit is pending against the contractor.

COVERED WITH DUST

In another case, the EPA says it found eight teen-agers early last year yanking out asbestos with their bare hands in an abandoned school that was being converted into a condominium in Salem, Mass. The Justice Department has filed a suit against the developer, Granite Development Co. Company officials say they didn't realize that asbestos was in the school. Neither did the youths employed to remove it. "They were covered with white dust," recalls EPA inspector Bridget McGuiness. "They started asking me, 'Is this bad?' "

Nobody knows how many bad jobs are occurring, but the Occupational Safety and Health Administration found violations in 219 of 806 removal jobs that it inspected last year. The EPA estimates that it learns of only half of the asbestos removals; the agency is supposed to be notified of every instance. "If they're not notifying the EPA, they're probably not doing the job right," says Patrick R. Tyson, the acting assistant secretary of OSHA. "I'm afraid a lot of people aren't handling it properly."

Most of those people won't feel any ill effects from asbestos exposure for a long time. As deadly as they are, asbestos diseases take five to 40 years to develop. And it isn't known how much exposure is harmful. OSHA estimates that 1.4 million construction workers risk becoming asbestos victims of the future, as do thousands of carpenters, electricians and others who work with insulation. Even passers-by may face a health threat. "Try to walk by [a construction site] without breathing the dust," says Charles Elkins, an acting assistant administrator of the EPA. "If it's asbestos, you're in trouble."

Some victims of asbestos removals are already getting sick. For 15 years, Dennis Burke wondered whether the insulation he was ripping out at construction jobs contained asbestos. "But if you complained, you'd get fired," he says. Now, Mr. Burke, 38 years old, has asbestosis, an incurable lung disease that causes shortness of breath. And he is still a construction worker; he can't find any other job.

Other victims could well be members of families already stricken by asbestos disease. Daniel O'Toole thought it was bad enough to have asbestosis; the 63-year-old former iron worker from Fort Howard, Md., was forced to retire early, and he can't take long walks. But last April, his son Patrick discovered he had swept up asbestos at a steel mill—the same mill in which Daniel O'Toole worked 18 years ago. "It's incredible, but my son was probably exposed to the same pipes I put in," Mr. O'Toole says.

Contractors complain that unless a building's owner hires them specifically to remove asbestos, they often don't realize that they are working with it. Asbestos insulation, which sometimes looks like plaster of Paris, isn't always recognizable.

But some people have a hard time claiming ignorance. In late 1984, the EPA says, inspectors went out three times to warn Maurice Fabiani, a developer, about shoddy asbestos removals at a powerhouse in Oakville, Conn. All they got was a lecture: "He told us we were being nitpicky," says Andrew Lauterback, a special assistant U.S. attorney. Mr. Fabiani, for his part, apparently wasn't too picky about where he left asbestos. The EPA says it found a pile of it in an open dump behind some houses. Inspectors had to shoo away children playing on it.

The matter was serious enough to draw the first prison sentence ever in an asbestos case. Through his attorney, Mr. Fabiani contends he shouldn't be blamed for a contractor's work. But he nevertheless pleaded guilty to violating air-pollution laws, paid a $25,000 fine and, in January, served 30 days in prison. The contractor, Peter J. Vileisis, pleaded guilty, was fined $25,000 and received a one-year suspended sentence.

Some contractors ignore precautions because they don't think asbestos is harmful, particularly since inhaling the fibers doesn't cause immediate injury. Other contractors cut corners to increase profits. Certainly, the work is lucrative: Three contractors may get more than $1 million to take out asbestos from a three-story school building in Atlanta. "There's a whole bunch of hustlers out there trying to make a quick buck who will end up killing themselves and others," says U.S. Rep. James Florio, a New Jersey Democrat interested in the safe handling of asbestos.

A fast buck is what 166 workers allege motivated the contractor that renovated the St. Anthony Hotel in San Antonio in 1983. In a lawsuit, the workers assert that the contractor hired them off the street without telling them that asbestos was being removed. Most say they wore bandannas over their mouths, or nothing at all, to protect themselves from the dust. "Now, every time I get a cold in my chest, I think uh-oh, this is it," says Daniel Cady, 29, who was one of the workers. He had been recruited for the job while hitchhiking through Texas.

The contractor, Planned Management International Inc., denies exposing the workers to asbestos. But OSHA fined the company $1,500 for not posting warnings or giving workers respirators. And this month the company, the construction manager and the hotel's owner settled the lawsuit. They won't discuss the terms, but the workers' attorney says his clients are receiving a total of $1.66 million.

EPA officials say that bad practices persist because neither the federal government nor 39 states require asbestos removers to be trained or licensed. New York, one of the few states with training provisions, requires contractors only to watch a 40-minute filmstrip that regulators concede is inadequate. "A barber has to go to school, but someone can remove a hazardous substance and have no experience and no training," says Wolfgang Brandner, the EPA's regional asbestos coordinator in Kansas City, Kan.

What's more, asbestos regulations are flawed. OSHA figures that even if its standards were followed to the letter, 64 of every 1,000 workers who remove asbestos would still eventually die from overexposure. That is because the current exposure standard is two asbestos fibers per cubic centimeter of air—about four times the exposure the agency currently thinks is safe. OSHA is trying to change the standard, but "people think they're protected by these laws when they're not," says James Fite, the president of the White Lung Association, a nonprofit group in Baltimore that represents asbestos victims.

But the most frequently cited problem with asbestos laws is the way they are enforced. The EPA and OSHA inspect just a fraction of asbestos-removal jobs; many contractors have never had a job inspected. And both federal agencies routinely let violators off with small fines or none at all. OSHA's Dallas-area office, for example, hasn't levied a fine in any of its 12 asbestos cases in the past three years.

But officials in the Dallas office say they are shorthanded—the office doesn't have anyone assigned just to asbestos cases. They also say some contractors conceal violations by working at night or on weekends. But the result is that repeat violators are common. And legitimate contractors say unscrupulous competitors have a free rein. "It's basically a voluntary-compliance system," concludes Neil Wilson, the president of National Environmental Engineering Inc., an asbestos-removal company in Michigan City, Ind.

In response to such criticism, the EPA recently vowed to vigorously enforce asbestos laws. The Justice Department, as part of that effort, last month filed 11 publicized lawsuits alleging serious asbestos violations against the state of Florida, Conrail and the school system of Ankeny, Iowa, among others. And at least 10 states are considering bills that would regulate asbestos removers.

But such steps come far too late for thousands of workers who recently may have been exposed to asbestos—a known carcinogen for at least a decade. As Patrick O'Toole, the construction worker in Maryland, puts it, "My father was done wrong, and now I'm done wrong. When will it stop?"

END SOCIAL SECURITY'S INTRUSION INTO RELIGIOUS MINISTRIES

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to correct a problem created by the 1983 Social Security Amendments which resulted in the Federal Government's intrusion into the ability of religious organizations to carry out their ministries. What my legislation will do is allow employees of religious organizations to opt out of the Social Security system, and thus prevent the Social Security system from overburdening religious organizations with the FICA tax.

From the very beginning of the Social Security system until the 1983 amendments, religious organizations and their employees were exempted from the system. Prior to the 1983 amendments, Congress realized that failure to grant such an exemption would jeopardize religious freedom. A 1946 report of the House Ways and Means Committee declared that these groups were exempted from taxation because their representatives—feared endangering their freedom from taxation and the separation of church and state; they feared extension of government influence on religious . . . policies.

However, the Social Security Amendments of 1983 brought the employees of all nonprofit—501(c)(3)—organizations—including church employees—into the system. After passage of these amendments, a public outcry arose because Congress had considered all categories of nonprofit groups together and had failed to address the special first amendment concerns raised by mandatory coverage of religious groups. In the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 [DEFRA], Congress attempted to correct the problem by allowing religious organizations, but not their employees, to elect out of the system. Unfortunately, this modification did not solve the problem because the employees of the religious organizations which chose to opt out of the system are treated as self-employed, and thus liable for the full share of the 14.3 percent FICA tax.

This provision hits especially hard on the employees of many church schools. Since many State school employees are currently exempted from FICA taxes, the FICA tax burden on church school employees makes it more difficult for churches to pay salaries competitive with public schools. In addition, the present law interferes with the strongly held religious conviction of some churches that they should provide for their own retirement. Thus, for those religious schools which uphold this higher conviction, there is a double burden because they must pay salaries to their employees which reflect the heavy 14.3 percent FICA tax.

The Supreme Court has held that the church school is an "integral part of the religious mission" of the church in Lemon v. Kurtzman 408 U.S. 602 (1971). My legislation will allow religious organizations to shed the economic burden imposed by the Federal Government in the form of Social Security taxes.

An excellent example of how the FICA tax intrudes upon the ability of a church to carry out its religious ministry is the case of the Bethel Baptist Church in Sellersville, PA. According to the pastor of this church, the Reverend Richard A. Harris, the church operates a preschool day care program and a school in furtherance of its religious mission. The members of Reverend Harris' faith believe that every activity involved in its ministry, including such vocations as secretary, maintenance worker, teacher, etc., is a religious ministry and is not secular or commercial in nature. The functions performed by employees of the church in its ministries are religious functions governed and controlled by religious principles. Reverend Harris correctly points out that the church's employees are indispensable to the carrying on of the church's ministry.

The members of Reverend Richard's faith believe that Scripture requires that Christians provide for their own financial security. Since many of Bethel Baptist's employees further the religious ministry of the church through its school, the employment relationship between the church and its employees constitutes an obligation by the church to provide the wages and benefits of its employees/ministers. Thus, the church pays its employees'/ministers' wages and has instituted a program of benefits for its employees to provide for their financial security, which includes a pension plan funded solely by church funds.

By mandating that church employees must participate in the Social Security Program, Congress has caused the Federal Government to preempt the scriptural belief of members of this church and provide for the financial security of church employees/ministers. In addition, mandatory coverage—and thus taxation—by the Social Security Program results in an extraction and diversion by the Federal Government of the church's funds which are meant for solely religious purposes.

What Bethel Baptist Church believes is its scriptural duty to provide for the financial security of its employees is certainly a religious purpose. However, the Government imposed FICA tax causes diversion of these funds. If the church does not increase its employees' wages to cover the FICA tax, the church's employees' net income would be diminished substantially, thus hindering or eliminating the pursuit of their religious vocation in the church's ministries. If the church increases its employees' wages commensurate with the self-employment tax imposed upon them, the availability of the church's ministries, such as the Christian school it operates, would be endangered and would result in the increase in tuition or an increase in the tithe to the church or even a reduction of employee staff in the church ministries.

Mandatory coverage of employees of religious organizations would thus cause certain churches to violate what they believe is their scriptural mandate not to participate in, or collaborate in, any effort of Government to assume or preempt a church's responsibility of providing for the financial security of its followers. I ask my colleagues to recognize that at the heart of this issue lies the constitutional command that the Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. The legislation which I am introducing today will unburden churches from the intrusion of the Federal Government in the form of mandatory coverage by the Social Security System. The legislation will allow churches to opt out of the system if it interferes with its religious beliefs. I urge my colleagues to support this piece of legislation.

STATEMENT IN SUPPORT OF CREATIVE RIGHTS FOR MUSICIANS AND PRODUCERS

HON. RICHARD A. GEPHARDT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask my colleagues to join me in opposing H.R. 3521, a bill which would have a severe impact on creators of music and on the vast audience which enjoys their works.

The bill would constrict the free market in music by eliminating three of the four options now available for acquiring performing rights and mandating only one way of doing business through "source licensing." This method shifts the responsibility for acquiring performing rights from those who perform the music—the local television broadcasters—to those who record but do not perform the music—the television program producers. The result would be a denial to composers of one of the fundamental protections in copyright law—the guarantee of continuing payment for continuing use of a creative work.

The change envisioned by H.R. 3521 would cause a sharp loss of income to composers, who would be forced to accept a single "buy-out" payment for their product, before its true value in the marketplace is known.

Under today's system, broadcasters use a "blanket license" to acquire performance rights to music. This license, purchased for a modest fee, grants them access to the entire repertories of artists' performing rights societies. Over the years, the fee paid by the extremely profitable television broadcast industry has actually declined to 1.15 percent of net revenues from a level of 2.5 percent of net revenues in 1949. Nor is the fee arbitrarily set on a "take or leave it" basis by composers—it is agreed upon in negotiations between the performing rights societies and the broadcasters.

It is interesting to note that the broadcasters have always had available to them "source licensing," the licensing method they now seek to mandate under H.R. 3521. No one is preventing them from negotiating source licenses with program producers. It was determined in the recent Buffalo Broadcasting case, however, that no local station had ever made a serious attempt to obtain a source license by offering to pay for it.

The reason for the overwhelming appeal of the blanket license, whose validity has been repeatedly upheld by the courts, is that it is inexpensive and efficient to administer. Nevertheless, broadcasters have, under current law, the freedom to choose source licensing, blanket licensing, or two other licensing methods to obtain performance rights to music. H.R. 3521 would end this free market at the expense of professional composers, who on average earn only $5,000 to $7,500 a year from their works, of which less than one-third is derived from the licensing of TV performance rights.

Music enriches all our lives and constitutes an important industry in our Nation. Along with other creative endeavors, it can only flourish within a framework that ensures just compensation for new works while providing a simple, workable system for users of the product. The current system has efficiently met these requirements over many years and, in my view, does not need to be fixed.

A BILL TO SUSPEND THE DUTY ON TERFENADONE

HON. WILLIS D. GRADISON, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to suspend for a 3-year period the duty on the chemical terfenadone.

Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., located in my district, imports the patented chemical terfenadone for use in the production of terfenadine, which is the active ingredient in the prescription drug Seldane. Merrell Dow, a wholly owned subsidiary of the Dow Chemical Co., owns the patent and is the only U.S. importer of the chemical. The current duty rate on terfenadone is 13.5 percent, which, unless this legislation is enacted, will cost Dow over $3.5 million during the 3-year period of 1987–89.

Seldane is the first and only nonsedating antihistamine approved in the United States. While Seldane was approved for use by approximately two dozen countries between 1981 and 1985, it was not approved in the United States until early 1985. During the gap between foreign and domestic approval, Seldane could not be made in the United States and exported to those countries which had approved the drug because of restrictions in U.S. drug export law. Thus, for the period of 1981 through early 1985, Merrell Dow was forced to expand and to utilize its foreign manufacturing facilities to meet the demand for Seldane abroad.

After FDA approval, Merrell Dow increased its U.S. production of Seldane by importing the chemical intermediate, terfenadone, and processing it into terfenadine in the United States. The suspension of the duty would reduce the cost of importing terfenadone. This, in turn, would allow increased utilization of existing domestic manufacturing facilities and would provide new jobs at Merrell Dow in Cincinnati.

Suspension of the duty on terfenadone would also lead to increased exports of Seldane, thereby helping improve our international trade position. Over the 3-year period of 1987 through 1989, Merrell Dow intends to export approximately one-third of the terfenadine which is manufactured from the imported terfenadone.

I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation. It will increase jobs at home while increasing U.S. exports.

THE LATE FLORIDA STATE SENATOR JOE CARLUCCI

HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I enclose material in connection with these remarks relative to the late State Senator Joe Carlucci. His untimely, unexpected death brought north Florida and all of Florida to the conclusion that we have been living with a hero in our midst whom we have not fully appreciated in the obvious ways we should have, and we all very deeply mourn his death. He was greatly beloved by everyone although he was primarily a leader because of his courageous willingness to take on difficult subjects and difficult problems and to solve them sometimes in difficult ways. This is not at all characteristic of most politicans.

He set a great standard for us all in Florida and, I think, through the Nation as a whole. The standard is that we should do the very best we can with what our conscience tells us we should be doing and go about this with courage and determination regardless of the outcome to ourselves.

That is the lesson that Senator Joe Carlucci leaves for us. He also leaves for us a great well of human kindness and love and appreciation which he showed to everyone about him. There is no way in which we can make up to him for the burdens he carried because of his courage; but perhaps if we all pride ourselves into being more like him, this country will be a greater country. He left us a tremendous heritage and his life here on Earth is going to live long past his death. It will live in the hearts of millions of people who have been helped by him personally and because of the purity and excellence of his public service.

Herewith is an article from the Florida Times-Union honoring Senator Carlucci:

FRIENDS BID FAREWELL TO CARLUCCI

SENATOR REMEMBERED AS MAVERICK, FRIEND

(By Terry Wallace)

Beneath a canopy of camellia trees blooming under a springlike sun, family and friends bade farewell to state Sen. Joe Carlucci yesterday and laid him to rest.

The simple graveside ritual in Oaklawn Cemetery followed a funeral that drew about 1,600 friends, the powerful and the not-so-powerful, to the Southside Assembly of God.

Among those attending were the bulk of the Florida Senate, the Duval Legislative Delegation and Jacksonville city officials, as well as many of Carlucci's Senate District 8 constituents.

Roses covered the solid mahogany casket bearing the body of the late senator and former city councilman who was praised by state Sen. Dempsey Barron and former television newsman Ernie Mastroianni.

Carlucci, 57, died Saturday of a heart attack while on a hunting trip near Camilla, Ga.

Barron, the senior member and former president of the Florida Senate, was part of that hunting party and was with Carlucci, when he died.

The Panama City Democrat said he often bragged to Carlucci that he was superior to Carlucci as a quail hunter, a point that Carlucci disputed. Saturday morning, however, Carlucci and his hunting partner bagged more quail than Barron and his partner.

Barron said he expected Carlucci to gloat. But when Carlucci came in, he did not boast.

Nevertheless, "there was not enough soap in Georgia to wipe the smile off his face," Barron said. "As it turned out, it was wonderful that it happened like it did."

Carlucci was stricken during lunch after the hunt and could not be revived.

"Was he difficult? He could be," Barron said. "Was he stubborn? Yes. Was he tough? Incredibly. Was he a maverick? He was. Was he a true friend? Almost to a fault. Was he a tender, caring person? To the point of tears.

"All of us who truly knew Joe will not only mourn his death, we will also celebrate the life that passed our way," Barron said.

Mastroianni developed a friendship with Carlucci during his years as a local television journalist and worked in Carlucci's 1982 reelection campaign.

He praised the late senator as "an individualist with a code of honor few people could aspire to, and even fewer could even understand . . . a code of honor that says that all people deserve the best from their elected officials: a code of honor that says all people, regardless of their station in life, deserve to be treated like human beings. Most importantly, he lived that code."

Mastroianni said Carlucci was "much more content sitting at home carving a duck than with the trappings of power," and recalled what became an annual tradition Carlucci carried on with Mastroianni's two sons.

"Each Christmas Eve, there was a phone call. It was Santa Claus. Santa Claus knew their names, knew what they wanted for Christmas. The message was always the same: Be good boys, obey your parents, have a merry Christmas and I'll talk to you next year. And he did."

When Mastroianni told his eldest son, now 23, of Carlucci's death, the son said, " 'Pop, Santa Claus can't be dead.' Well, of course he's not. Santa Claus doesn't die." And neither does the memory of someone like Joe Carlucci. We'll remember him as a warm and wonderful, considerate human being.

While Carlucci was being eulogized in Jacksonville, other state officials were honoring him in Tallahassee.

Rep. Tom Brown, delivering a eulogy to 150 legislators and staff members in the House chambers, said other legislators may have disagreed with Carlucci at times, but they never doubted his concern.

"We can each think of those times we enjoyed together with him," said Brown, D-Daytona Beach. "Those times we were on the same side of an issue with him and those times we fought like dogs."

House Speaker James Harold Thompson, D-Quincy, recalled Carlucci's consideration for some working people Thompson introduced to him on a hunting trip.

Thompson said he had heard that the way to measure a person's character is by the way he treats people who are in no position to help him.

"I'd have to say that based on that standard, he would measure very high," Thompson said.

Gov. Bob Graham has scheduled Democratic and Republican primaries for March 4 to fill Carlucci's seat. A runoff, if needed, will follow on March 18. The special election will be April 1. Qualifying for the race will occur between noon Feb. 19 and noon Feb. 25, said Dorothy Glisson, director of the State Division of Elections.

Mr. Ed Ball's commentary on WKTZ radio, Jones College Station, speaking of Senator Carlucci said:

Senator Mattox Hair has filed a bill that would name a new State building after Senator Joe Carlucci, who died a short time ago. The building is the old police headquarters and will house the new State Regional Crime Laboratory. Nothing could be more appropriate to honor this man who made such a tremendous contribution to the people of Jacksonville. Senator Hair said it well when he said Senator Joe Carlucci was a champion of justice, integrity, and ethics and lived by the code of honor that all people deserve the best from their elected officials. You may not have always agreed with him, because he was controversial. But he was as honest as the day is long and he had an understanding of the needs of law enforcement that is sadly missing in the legislature. He is really going to be missed.

They plan to name the building the Joseph A. Carlucci Crime Laboratory, but we have a feeling he wouldn't want to be so formal. Nobody ever called him Joseph. He was plain old Joe Carlucci. He left a hole in this community that can't be filled.

JOB TRAINING PROGRAMS

HON. BRUCE F. VENTO

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I am extremely concerned with the shortsightedness of this administration's budget proposals. In his State of the Union Address in early February, the President pledged to "create a ladder of opportunity to full employment so all Americans can climb toward economic power and justice on their own." But the President's fiscal year 1987 budget offers no additional help for the many families that cannot provide adequate income to meet their needs. Presidential proposals include a 43-percent reduction in Job Corps, a 33-percent reduction in summer youth employment and complete elimination of the WIN Program.

I was recently visited by a number of individuals who work with the job training programs in Minnesota—and the numbers that they passed along to me are astounding. Under the Presidential budget proposals, in Minnesota the job service staff will be reduced by 30 people and the number of locations will be reduced by 10. Each staff person's activities result in 332 people being placed in a job—when this number is multiplied by 30—this results in 9,960 fewer job placements in Minnesota.

Additionally—specialized services such as vocational counseling, job development for individuals, and itinerant service to small communities will be eliminated. Special placement efforts for AFDC, general assistance and unemployment insurance recipients will be severely reduced or eliminated. The elimination of the WIN Program is particularly distressing.

The last program year shows the following accomplishments in Minnesota: 17,566 AFDC recipients registered, 5,183 AFDC/WIN enrollees placed in employment, and $20,557,000 in annualized reduced welfare grants which demonstrated a return of $3.47 for each $1 spent in Minnesota.

Mr. Speaker, these proposals simply save money on paper in order to meet the Gramm-Rudman deficit reduction cutbacks—but obviously in the long run—cost big money. The 9,960 individuals in Minnesota will not be paying taxes and very likely will be collecting some type of Federal or State transfer payments. A report was recently released by Manpower Demonstration Corp. in which it was stated that the individuals participating in job training programs cost the Government less money than did welfare mothers not participating in jobs programs.

Both Gramm-Rudman and the President's fiscal year 1987 budget proposal would drastically cut the job training programs that are necessary in providing individuals with the necessary tools to pull themselves out of poverty. The President loves to page through the want ads and talk of the numerous lisitings of job openings—yet his proposals take away the very programs that aid individuals in obtaining these jobs.

Ironically President Reagan has committed his administration to a study of the welfare system, but in the Reagan proposed budget it is proposed that we destroy the programs which help welfare clients into the world of work and into the mainstream of our society.

GI BILL IMPORTANT TO STRONG NATIONAL DEFENSE

HON. G.V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, the President has continued to insist that we maintain a strong national defense posture and that the Congress support his initiatives in that regard. I have supported his efforts, Mr. Speaker, but I must say it is getting more difficult to do so with each day that passes.

Many Members on both sides of the aisle are beginning to wonder how serious the administration is about strengthening our military services when it is planning to send a draft bill to the Congress to repeal the new GI bill. At recent hearings before our committee, spokesmen for every branch of the service and the Department of Defense provided data to show the effectiveness of the new education program. Although it is too early to draw any definitive conclusions from the new program, preliminary data shows that 70 percent of new recruits coming into the Army are signing up for the new program and about 50 percent are signing up in the other branches of service.

The impact on the Reserves and National Guard is even more encouraging. Participation is very high, longer enlistment periods are on the rise, and retention is substantially better. More than 18,500 members of the Reserves are already enrolled in school as a result of the program that became effective July 1, 1985.

Mr. Speaker, I don't know whether it is the Office of Management and Budget, the Secretary of Defense, or the President himself who has decided that we should repeal the new GI bill. I do know the decision is seriously flawed. The facts do not support the administration's position and the credibility of the administration continues to erode as a result of this decision.

If I were advising the President, I would urge him to get the message to the Director of OMB or to the Secretary of Defense that the House is not going to terminate the new GI bill and that the administration would be better served by dropping its plan to submit any such proposal to the Congress.

VICTIM'S RIGHTS

HON. THOMAS F. HARTNETT

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer my condolences to the families of Mr. Gary Melke and Mr. Christopher Zerr, two Domino's Pizza employees who were robbed and shot in Hanahan, SC, last December. Mr. Zerr died instantly from a shot in the head. Amazingly enough, Mr. Melke climbed into his truck and drove until he temporarily lost consciousness and wrecked the truck. Upon regaining consciousness, Mr. Melke walked and crawled the rest of the way to the Hanahan Police Station where he identified Mitchell Sims as the assailant. Mr. Melke died of his wounds 5 days later. By going to the police first, when he could have gone to the hospital, Mr. Melke displayed an act of civic responsibility that should not go without public appreciation. Mr. Melke's family should certainly be proud of his courage and bravery.

Currently, Mr. Sims is awaiting trial in the State of California for another murder. Although the trial process in South Carolina would take substantially less time, California Governor Deukmejian has denied an extradition request from the Governor of South Carolina. As a result, the agony being suffered by the families of Mr. Zerr and Mr. Melke is being prolonged unnecessarily.

Mr. Speaker, my purpose in bringing this matter to the attention of my colleagues is to emphasize the need for certain changes in the manner in which victims of crime are treated. Currently, efforts are being made by the U.S. Department of Justice's Office of Justice Programs to improve the treatment of crime victims by ensuring a speedy and more efficient trial for the benefit of the victims as well as the accused. Hopefully, with the growing awareness of the general social cost of crime and victimization, as well as from specific well-publicized instances of victimization, the issue of victim's rights will receive deserved attention.

GOOD ADVICE FROM BOB BARRY

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I invite all Members' attention to a statement by our distinguished ex-colleague, Bob Barry.

Bob is justifiably concerned about a provision in the House-passed tax bill. It would provide that appreciated value, over the donor's base, of assets contributed to charitable, educational, religious and medical institutions, is subject to a newly increased 25-percent minimum tax.

Bob Barry has given the Congress good advice. His statement follows:

DARTMOUTH IS A SMALL COLLEGE AND YET THERE ARE THOSE WHO LOVE HER

Those were the words of Daniel Webster before the United States Senate in the famous Dartmouth College Case that resulted in the preservation of independent Colleges.

This independence is in dire jeopardy over the long term in the event that the tax bill in it's present state is enacted. Approximately 40% of all major gifts to colleges and universities are from appreciated properties for which the donors get unqualified deductions.

Not so with the proposed tax bill as appreciation will be considered a preference item in most instances in computing the alternative minimum tax—which tax has been raised to 25% in the house bill.

Computers were not available when endowments were accumulated, so no one knows how many donors would have been subjected to the minimum alternative tax on the appreciated value of their gifts.

However, we do know that if the house passed bill becomes law, over 40% of all major contributions could be taxed to the donor at the 25% rate. Who could or would give appreciated property to his college or university if he created a substantial tax liability in so doing?

Not many, it appears, and the day of increasing college endowments for their future growth will gradually become a thing of the past. This would pave the way for the federal government to have ultimate control over academic financing as the government will have the only cash pool large enough to supply the substantial funds the colleges and universities need to keep pace with growth requirements and/or refurbishments to say nothing of faculty salaries.

WHAT FUTURE LEADERS SAY AGAINST PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, today we will vote on President Reagan's fiscal year 1987 budget, a hopelessly flawed document. Its proposed savings fall dramatically short of the targets mandated by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. And who are the victims of the budget cuts the President proposes? The elderly, the disabled, schoolchildren, the unemployed, and the homeless—in short, those most in need of a helping hand.

The students of American government at Broadway High School in my district have prepared their own analysis of the impact of the President's budget upon them, their future and the future of their fellow Americans. These wise young people know that the quality of their lives will not be determined by the number of missiles in our military arsenal, but by the opportunities our society can provide for them through education, job training, housing assistance, and health care.

I urge my colleagues to listen to what these future leaders have to say and vote against the President's budget.

BROADWAY HIGH SCHOOL,
San Jose, CA.

President RONALD REAGAN,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR PRESIDENT REAGAN: The reason we, the students at Broadway High School in San Jose California are writing to you is to tell you how much we disagree with "1987 Budget Blueprint". We, the students, and the leaders of tomorrow feel it is our duty to write to you so you know how we feel about your proposed budget. We would appreciate very much your personal response to our questions and concerns.

First of all, your drastic cut back in education, $3,000,000,000, denies everyone who is not rich a chance at the education they deserve. The way we see it, our society is going to stagnate if we only offer opportunities to the already privileged. Without a good education, chances are we won't have the opportunity to get a good job and instead of becoming the leaders of tomorrow we will become the uneducated and jobless of tomorrow. If you continue to cut funding in education, technology and society as a whole will not advance to your highest expectations.

If financial aid to education is cut back some of us who are single parents are wondering how we can get an education to improve our chances to get a better paying job. The youth of today will not lead this country tomorrow without a decent education. This means more than just a high school diploma.

Your plan for a "Teacher in Space" unfortunately had the most tragic results anyone could ever imagine. You and your advisors knew, long before Christa McAuliffe was even chosen, that a drastic and devasting cut in the education budget was in the planning stages. To many of us it appears that you were hoping to take our minds off the reality with the "Teacher in Space" program.

We, too were devastated by this awful happening and offer our sympathy to the friends, relatives, co-workers and students of the seven pioneers; and to you, too, Mr. Reagan. But, we see ourselves as "reaching for the stars . . .", in our own way.

Why are you taking other programs from the poor or middle class and giving more to welfare for the rich? Why are you forcing the poor and elderly to pay more for medical treatment since they are the ones who need care the most?

Why cut back funds that are so vital for medical research when a disease like AIDS is sweeping the nation and world? How would you feel if your daughter contracted AIDS from a life saving blood transfusion?

Our nation's youths are so worried about Nuclear holocaust that they are in need of counseling. Because of your proposal to cut back on financial aid for college students many of us who want to be psychologists and counselors may not be able to afford the necessary education.

Another program we just heard was being cut is the "Foster Grandparent" program. We must tell you how much this program is doing for students in the schools as well as the "grandparents" themselves. The "grandparents" at our school provide the love and warmth that many of us need so much. In return our "grandparents" know they are loved and needed. You can't put a price on that, you know.

It seems that too much, $311,800,000,000, is being proposed for the defense budget and not enough on what people need the most: opportunities to improve their lives through education, health care, housing, jobs.

We, the students of Broadway High School await your response eagerly. Thank you for your time in reading and responding to us.

Sincerely,
STUDENTS OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT,
Broadway High School.

ANNUAL NEWARK UNICO AWARDS BREAKFAST

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, on March 9 the Newark Chapter of UNICO held its annual Newark UNICO Awards Breakfast in West Orange, NJ.

Each year, the chapter honors outstanding individuals of Italian heritage who have shown excellence in community, civic or athletic activities. This year's honorees are Mr. Paul Alongi, Mr. Joseph Cucuzza, Mr. David Toma, Hon. Rosemary Giambarelli and Mr. Joseph Purcell.

Mr. Alongi, an attorney, was honored for his many years of community service, his contributions to UNICO National and his voluntary work with mentally retarded persons. Mr. Cucuzza, an entrepreneur, was honored for his work with young athletes. Judge Gambardella, the youngest and first woman Federal Bankruptcy Court judge in New Jersey, was honored for her contributions in the field of bankruptcy law. Mr. Toma, a former Newark detective, was honored for his efforts to educate today's youth about the dangers of drug and alcohol abuse. Mr. Purcell, an athlete and scholar at Union High School, was honored as a recipient of the Brian Piccolo Award for his outstanding scholastic and athletic achievements.

Mr. Enzo Priolo, Mr. Donald Cocuzza, Mr. Charles Chirichiello, Mr. Vito Malgiere, Mr. John LaQuaglia and Mr. Mario Genova served as awards chairmen.

My hearty congratulations to this year's award winners and my warmest regards to my friends at UNICO.

NATIONAL JEWISH COALITION ON SDI AND ISRAEL

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, according to the following article from the National Jewish Coalition Bulletin, Israel is on the verge of becoming officially involved in the strategic defense initiative [SDI] program. In my opinion, we could not wish for a more eager and valuable partner in this vital enterprise.

The overall program would benefit from the infusion of Israeli high technology, and the antitactical ballistic missile (ATBM) capabilities of the program could, in turn, be utilized in defending Israel against Soviet SS-21 short-range ballistic missiles deployed in Syria. In short, Israeli involvement in the SDI program holds the promise of an ideal "two-way street" arrangement for both the United States and her Middle Eastern ally.

SDI: IMPLICATIONS FOR ISRAEL'S DEFENSE

In March of 1983, President Reagan formally announced a pioneering defensive strategy predicated on the notion that it is better to save lives than avenge them. The President's plan, the Strategic Defensive Initiative (SDI), was designed to replace the doctrine of Mutually Assured Destruction, a dangerously obsolete doctrine of holding civilian population centers hostage to nuclear attack.

In Israel, a nation faced with the ultimate challenge of ensuring self-survival, the U.S. invitation to participate in SDI was met with great interest. After preliminary discussions, Israeli Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin formally responded to the American invitation agreeing "in principle" to participate in the initial research and development phases of the SDI program.

The strategic economic and political implications of Israeli involvement in SDI are significant. The most immediate benefit to Israel will be the development of missile interception technologies. The invitation sent to the allies specifically states that the program will "examine technologies with potential against shorter-range ballistic missiles."

The use of surface-to-surface missiles against major cities in the Iran-Iraq war has alerted the Israeli defense establishment to the urgent need for such technologies. Syria, Israeli's foremost adversary, has already deployed highly accurate and lethal SS-21 missiles capable of reaching Israeli population centers, air bases, storage depots and other vital facilities. General Daniel O. Graham, founder and director of High Frontier, the organization from which many of the concepts for SDI arose, has noted these implications for Israeli defense planning. Obtaining defenses against the SS-21s, he said, "would enable Israel actually to defend itself . . . rather than simply deter attack by threat of retaliation."

While the threat of retaliation has served Israel well in the past, this option may no longer be effective in light of the changing realities of modern warfare and the increasingly fanatical character of Israel's enemies. Such threats are unlikely to deter enemies whose scant regard for human life is reflected in suicide bombings in Lebanon and the use of poison gas in the Gulf War. To guard against the growing ballistic missile threat, Israel must move beyond deterrence to develop a defense against missile attacks.

In a recent paper presented in testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee, W. Seth Carus, a military analyst for the American-Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), called attention to Israel's growing vulnerability to missile attack. Carus pointed out that by 1990 Arab armies will possess large numbers of surface-to-surface missiles armed with sophisticated warheads. As the Arab inventory of SS-21 missiles grows, he noted, a missile attack on vital Israeli installations would leave the country dangerously vulnerable. existing technologies alone, he added, would be insufficient to defend against such attacks, even if Israel knew of them in advance.

Dr. Robert O'Neil, director of the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies, has also pointed out the inherent benefits of Israeli participation in SDI. O'Neil believes that Israel's involvement will allow her to remain abreast of the technologies central to a tactical missile defense.

Avram Schweitzer, a journalist with Israel's respected newspaper, Ha'Aretz, perhaps best describes the benefits of SDI interception technologies: "To be in on this kind of technology . . . could mean the purchase of peace for Israel, or more realistically, the imposition, by non-agressive means, of a permanent state of non-belligerence along its borders."

Besides the utilization of missile interception technologies, Israel will also benefit in other ways from participation in SDI. Israel's industrial future will be greatly enhanced by being at the forefront of the SDI technological revolution. The program will provide jobs and revenue for the Israeli defense industry, as well as research funds for the country's scientific community. Spinoffs could provide similar boosts for the country's high-technology and consumer industries.

America will also benefit from Israeli involvement. Israel's high state of technological and scientific capability can be utilized in SDI research. The Israel Defense Forces demonstrated an unforeseen mastery over command, control, and communications (C3) by downing over 80 Syrian jet fighters with no losses during the recent Lebanon conflict. Their expertise in battle-tested technologies would immensely enhance development of weapon systems. In addition, the Israelis are known for their rapid turn around times from research and development to making weaponry operational. Israeli involvement can act as a catalyst, accelerating the pace of the entire SDI program.

Israel's acceptance of President Reagan's invitation to participate in SDI should yield invaluable dividends particularly in the critical area of development of ballistic missile interception technologies. Unable to match the quantitative advantage in weaponry of her numerous adversaries Israel's involvement in SDI should enable her to maintain a qualitative edge necessary for survival.

Israel can only be part of this strategic, technological, economic and political revolution if SDI is funded and promoted by Congress. With the help of Israel's friends in America, SDI may prove to be the most important project ever undertaken by the two allies.

MAUREEN ELIZABETH MAHONEY, TENNESSEE WINNER, VOICE OF DEMOCRACY

HON. ED JONES

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to include in today's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the text of the winning "Voice of Democracy" composition for the State of Tennessee written by my constituent, Miss Maureen Elizabeth Mahoney who attends the Henry County High School in Paris, TN.

As you know, the Veterans of Foreign Wars sponsor this excellent contest each year. Scholarships are awarded to the winners of the contest. I commend the VFW for this program which offers financial benefits to students who may not otherwise be able to afford a college education.

I am delighted that this year's Tennessee winner is from the Eighth Congressional District. I am proud of Miss Mahoney and I commend her for her patriotism and foresight which brought her to write her theme, "New Horizons for America's Youth." Her message is one that all of us should need.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

"I want to be a doctor," states one young girl proudly. "Well I want to be a scientist," says a chubby little lad. "My mommy is a policewoman and I want to be just like her," inserts another eager child. The elementary teacher grins to herself with pride and begins her story about a little boy who had a dream to be a leader of his people. Martin Luther King, Jr., initiated remarkable reforms in our society, and it all started as a youth's idealistic dream for the future.

America has become a country mindful of the future. Our youth are lucky enough to live in a society that not only allows them opportunities to dream, but also allows opportunities to fulfill those dreams.

Samantha Smith, the child who dreamed of peace between nations, brought hope to all of us. Samantha tragically, did not live to see her dreams come true, but she did inspire others to work at reaching her goal. Children across the country wrote articles for local papers and set letters to Congress expressing ideas similar to those voiced by Samantha.

Granted, talking is a far cry from acting, but it's a start. When our youth find things such as world peace on which to focus their dreams, think of the progress they can make toward that goal by the time they are adults! If we can prevent the youth of today from abandoning the hopes and dreams they have for our country now, then they will achieve the things that most adults have been afraid to attempt.

Remember the story of the three bricklayers who were asked what they were doing? One said he was laying bricks. The second responded that he was building a wall; and the third answered, "I'm helping to erect a great cathedral". How do we perceive our goals. Do we see only bricks? Do we see only a wall? Or do we see the great Cathedral?

Our society has been built by big dreamers. Take for example John Glenn. How many little boys and girls do you know that never dream of flying to the moon? Thirty years ago the mere thought of such a thing would have been laughed off as ludicrous. But thanks to individuals like John Glenn who weren't afraid to dream, we now think nothing of sending people into space.

Other technological advancements of the past few years have dramatically broadened the horizons for our youth. Today many youngsters are taught their lessons on computers, putting a whole new world literally at their fingertips. The computer age has only just begun, and puts within reach of today's youth incredible possibilities that until now have been only fantasy.

Another exciting horizon looming before the youth of today is the acceptance of women into the work force. Our society has become much more open-minded about the roles of women. "Woman", defined as wife and mother has been replaced by the definition of woman as a person. Now any child, male or female, can set any goal imaginable, and see it realized. Many of this generations' young girls will as mature women occupy important leadership roles like that of Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O' Connor or Governor Martha Layne Collins. Any young person in America could someday affect our country's destiny.

The adults of today have a distorted picture of America's youth. But for all the bad headlines, there are thousands of youngsters who are devoted to improving the world in which we live. From children like Samantha Smith, who didn't wait for adulthood to put her plans into action, to every child in the first grade who dreams of becoming a doctor, a scientist, or a policewoman, the future is a bright one. Those bricks with which our youth build tomorrow will not erect mere walls, but will form a better America.

FOUR RECIPIENTS WIN OVER-60 HEALTH CLINIC'S 1985 AWARDS

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the following resolutions in honor of four of my fine constituents. These resolutions were adopetd by the over-60 Health Clinic and presented at their awards ceremony in recognition of outstanding services to older Americans and dedication to community services. I am indeed proud of Dr. Carroll Estes, Dr. Philip Lee, Eugenia Hickman, and Charlotte Knight.

The resolutions follow:

RESOLUTION FOR DR. CARROLL ESTES, PH.D., CO-RECIPIENT OF THE OVER-60 HEALTH CLINIC'S 1985 AWARD FOR "OUTSTANDING SERVICES TO OLDER AMERICANS"

Whereas Carroll Estes, Ph.D., is an internationally recognized scholar, researcher and administrator, in the field of sociology, particularly in the area of aging, the author of many insightful books and articles that have broken new paths, and

Whereas she has developed the Institute for Health and Aging (formerly the Aging Health Policy Center) at the University of California in San Francisco, bringing together a formidable array of research teaching staff whose work has been of major significance in impacting policy in federal and state arenas,

And whereas, and most important of all to those of us working to meet needs at the community level, her commitment to these activities has been informed by compassion and respect for the populations whom she and her associates have studied, so that the quality of their lives may be enhanced in old age—having encouraged grass-root elders to empower themselves.

Therefore be it resolved that the Board of directors and staff of the Over-60 Health Clinic hereby pay tribute to her leadership as one of the truly outstanding gerontologists of our time.

RESOLUTION FOR DR. PHILIP R. LEE, M.D., CO-RECIPIENT OF THE OVER-60 HEALTH CLINIC'S 1985 AWARD FOR "OUTSTANDING SERVICES TO OLDER AMERICANS"

Whereas Philip R. Lee, M.D., scion of a family famous in California medical circles, has made many extraordinary accomplishments to his credit, and

Whereas Dr. Lee, a former Assistant Secretary of Health in the United States Department of Health, Education, and Welfare is Director of the Institute for Health Policy Studies at the University of California, San Francisco, conducts research and has authored a wide range of articles on health policy issues, including long term care for the elderly,

And whereas he has in his work exhibited a clear commitment to the importance of using knowledge to uplift human conditions, be it in academia or in public service, giving freely of his time to those seeking his advice and help in building community services.

Therefore be it resolved that the Board of Directors and Staff of the Over-60 Health Clinic hereby pay tribute to his leadership in health care policy administration. His influence will long be felt by peers and students, and the public who have and who will benefit from his endeavors.

RESOLUTION FOR EUGENIA HICKMAN, RECIPIENT OF THE OVER-60 HEALTH CLINIC'S 1985 AWARD FOR DEDICATED COMMUNITY SERVICES

Whereas Eugenia Hickman specialized for 30 years in the field of Social Welfare, served as a staff assistant to a prominent Berkeley City Councilperson, and

Whereas she was a delegate to the White House Conference on Aging, and served as member of the State Commission on Aging and Chairperson of the Berkeley and the Alameda County Commissions on Aging, and appointed to the Consumer Advisory Commission to the State for longterm planning for the aged,

And whereas her resolved commitment to the health and well-being of seniors in Alameda County and her work as a member of the Gray Panthers' Health Committee resulted in the founding and development of the Over-60 Health Clinic, assuring the seniors of this community access to a health care program designed with their particular health, social and economic needs in mind.

Therefore be it resolved that the Board of Directors and the Staff of the Over-60 Health Clinic hereby pay tribute to her longtime commitment and dedicated service to the Clinic and the Community in which she lives.

RESOLUTION FOR CHARLOTTE KNIGHT, RECIPIENT OF THE OVER-60 HEALTH CLINIC'S 1985 AWARD FOR DEDICATED COMMUNITY SERVICES

Whereas Charlotte Knight, a retired public servant, holding lifetime teaching credentials in both elementary and secondary education, and a member of the Retired Teacher's Association, played a vital role in the development of the Over-60 Health Clinic, Inc. and,

Whereas she has been a longterm member of the Grey Panthers, volunteering the majority of her time to the Grey Panthers' Health Committee,

And whereas Charlotte has patiently given of her time and expertise as a committed volunteer and an elected board member, serving as chairperson of both the Membership Committee and the Personnel Committee for the Over-60 Health Clinic, and has thereby enhanced the development of the Over-60 Clinic, and insured the availability of health care programs for the elderly in the City of Berkeley.

Therefore be it resolved that the Board of Directors and the Staff of the Over-60 Health Clinic hereby pay tribute to her dedicated service to the Clinic and Community in which she lives.

MILK OF KINDNESS IN A LIQUOR STORE

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to share with my colleagues in Congress the following report, "Milk of Kindness in a Liquor Store." It is about Mr. Jimmy Mantia, one of St. Louis' most outstanding small businessmen.

Having lived more than 20 years in the same neighborhood as Jimmy Mantia's legendary liquor store, I can attest to his unselfish dedication to his community, and the veracity of the newspaper article. In our fast paced world of ever rising expectations, the loyalties which Jimmy Mantia inspired are a rare commodity.

Jimmy Mantia has had an exceptional career. He is a personal friend of me and my family and in behalf of our community I salute him for his devoted service.

[From the St. Louis (MO) Post-Dispatch, Mar. 10, 1986]

MILK OF KINDNESS IN A LIQUOR STORE

(By Bill McClellan)

It's hard to think of a liquor store as a social service agency. Especially a liquor store in a poor, inner-city neighborhood, a liquor store that specializes in the half-pint trade.

That's the kind of liquor store Jimmy Mantia has run for the last 40 years.

His place is at 20th Street and Dr. Martin Luther King Boulevard. In geographical terms, that is not far from the revitalized downtown district, but in a different sense, it's light years away. The neighborhood has a bombed-out, Third World look to it.

The vacant lot across the street from the liquor store serves as an unofficial park. People congregate in the lot and sit in worn-out easy chairs. In cold weather, there's almost always a bonfire.

There's a four-way stop at 20th and King, and if you got a nickel every time a driver glanced at the people in the vacant lot and then swiftly checked to make sure his door was locked, you would soon have enough money to buy a half pint of your own.

You could join the group around the bonfire. If you did, this is what you'd hear:

"That Jimmy, that's a pretty good man. He helps a lot of people. It's gonna be hard around here without him."

The speaker is Lee Williams. He's 28, and he, too, spends a lot of time in the vacant lot.

"That place ought to be a monument. Jimmy does an awful lot for people. We watch out for him."

Williams knows what he's talking about when he says the people watch out for Jimmy Mantia. The liquor store has been in business for more than 40 years, and it has never been robbed. Never. When Jimmy would leave at night with the day's take, nobody ever bothered him. Not once.

Maybe that's because the liquor store has been as much a social service agency as a liquor store.

Jimmy went into the business right after World War II when he got out of the Marine Corps. He served in the South Pacific. He came home and went to work for a brother who had a liquor store. Eventually, Jimmy and another brother opened their own.

Jimmy and his brother did a lot more than sell booze. They cashed checks without requiring identification.

The liquor store served as a bank for the neighborhood. Often, Jimmy would cash somebody's welfare check or Social Security check, and the person wouldn't feel safe walking around with a lot of cash, so Jimmy would keep the money in his store. When it came time to pay a bill, the person would come in and Jimmy would give him or her a cashier's check for the amount of the bill. If the people were a little short, Jimmy would give them a loan.

Not all of the people in the neighborhood are literate, and sometimes there would be a problem with one of the official social service agencies. The agency would send the person a letter, and that letter would be brought to the liquor store.

Jimmy would read it, and often would help solve the problem.

Jimmy and his wife, Alice, had no children of their own, so maybe a psychologist would say that they simply adopted the neighborhood. For whatever reason—and it had to go well beyond making a buck—Jimmy practically lived at the liquor store. The store was open from 6 a.m. to midnight six days a week, and, almost always, Jimmy was there.

He retired four years ago, after his second bypass surgery for a heart ailment, and his nephew Bart took over. But Jimmy still came in a lot.

The liquor store is shutting down now. Its closing has been inevitable for the last few years. It's in the Franklin Industrial Park expansion area, which means that the city intends to redevelop the area.

But the city has not been hard-nosed about the whole thing. This is not a case of some mean-spirited city inspector forcing a small business to shut down.

"The city has been cooperative," says Alice.

That's more than can be said about Jimmy's health. He's seriously ill, and that's the reason the liquor store is shutting down.

"It's a sad time," says Dorothy Acoli, a frequent visitor at the vacant lot across the street from the liquor store. "We're gonna miss that store. That Jimmy, he's good people."

REAPING MORE FEDERAL TAX REVENUES

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, Massachusetts and a growing number of other States have demonstrated it is possible to raise revenues substantially without raising taxes. Last May, my Massachusetts colleagues SILVIO CONTE and BARNEY FRANK joined me in introducing H.R. 2530, a tax amnesty and enforcement program modeled directly on the successful Massachusetts program.

Several days ago, Representative GEPHARDT and I introduced H.R. 4253, a refined version of that program.

I would like to share with my colleagues an editorial aired recently by WCVB-TV in Boston. It presents a very cogent case for such an amnesty and enforcement program on the Federal level. Before anyone jumps to the conclusion that a tax amnesty would be somehow unfair to the honest taxpayer or that it would undermine confidence in our voluntary tax system, I would urge them to read this brief editorial and to study the history of amnesty and enforcement programs like the one in Massachusetts.

[Editorial From WCVB-TV, Channel 5, Boston, MA]

REAPING MORE FEDERAL TAX REVENUES

(By Marjorie Arons-Barron, Editorial Director)

Nobody likes to be a patsy. But every year, people like you and me pay our taxes, while others get away without paying what they owe. That's not fair, and that's why the IRS should crack down on tax evaders, as Massachusetts has done.

The timing couldn't be better. We have a $200 billion federal deficit. But every year, the Internal Revenue Service writes off half that amount in taxes it never collects. It could easily recoup some $25 billion just by taking some of the steps which have worked well here and in 17 other states.

In Massachusetts, revenue collections are up 27 percent since 1983. That's when we tightened enforcement through our Revenue Enhancement and Protection program, or REAP. We've brought in over $560 million, just because we're collecting taxes already owed.

Amnesty for tax evaders is the best known part of REAP, and it's what makes federal officials wary of the program. Amnesty alone makes no sense. But, in Massachusetts, amnesty was a one-time-only last chance . . . before the Revenue Department cracked down. And crack down it did—with private collection agencies, more audits, and property seizures.

That's what the IRS should do. If you agree, write Treasury Secretary James Baker. Tell him the IRS needs a program like REAP . . . because no law-abiding taxpayer should wind up feeling like a patsy.

"THE NATION" CELEBRATES 120TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. BRUCE A. MORRISON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, March 18 marks the 120th anniversary of The Nation, the oldest continuously published weekly in America. I would like to extend my congratulations to all those who have been a part of this renowned periodical. Its credo establishes it as an independent journal of critical thought on events of the day, a periodical whose purpose, in its own words, is to "bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred."

The Nation has a long and distinguished history. Founded in 1866 by well-known abolitionists, it soon began attracting writers whose names now stand at the forefront of American literature. Authors such as Henry James, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Emily Dickenson, Jon Dos Passos, Upton Sinclair, James Agee, Willa Cather, James Baldwin, Kurt Vonnegut, Frances FitzGerald, and many others have contributed to The Nation's commentary on changing political and literary trends in the United States over the years.

The Nation is highly respected and its influence is widespread. The many awards it has received over the years attest to its prominence in the field of journalism.

I know that my colleagues join me and thousands of others in extending congratulations to this magazine that has had such a major role in the political and cultural life of our country. The Nation has admirably chronicled events in the United States for the past 120 years and I wish it continued success for many years to come.

IMMIGRATION REFORM

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, on March 1 I was privileged to speak at the Second Annual Fund-raising Dinner of the Portuguese American Congress in Newark.

The dinner was chaired by Mr. Fred Perry, Jr., a member of PAC's board of directors, and Ms. M. Ceu Cirne, a board vice president, served as emcee. The PAC is governed by a 50-member board of directors headed by police Lieutenant Armando B. Fontoura.

The Portuguese American Congress was founded in September 1984 to create a sense of civic pride within the Portuguese-American community in New Jersey. To this end, the Congress has sponsored activities to assist new immigrants in their transition to American life.

In March 1985, the PAC sponsored a naturalization drive to help Portuguese residents of New Jersey become American citizens and register to vote. The effort involved the work of many dedicated volunteers who assisted the new immigrants in filling out the extensive paperwork required of new citizens. The PAC has also worked with the Congress of Portuguese American Educators and the Newark Board of Education to provide English lessons to the new Americans.

The 3,000-member PAC has also sponsored education forums for parents and toxic waste cleanup drives.

Last December, I was proud to be the keynote speaker at the naturalization ceremony for 1,127 new Portuguese Americans. As a result of immigration reforms I worked to enact in 1965, we now have more Portuguese coming into our country than any other ethnic group. I am happy to welcome our newest citizens who have brought to our Nation the rich gifts of a beautiful culture, tradition, and heritage.

The Statue of Liberty beckons all to come to our shores. Unfortunately, as I discovered during my early years in Congress, our doors have not always been open. At that time, our immigration laws found some ethnic groups more worthy than others for eligibility for entry and citizenship. Fortunately, this injustice was corrected with legislation I authored, the Immigration Reform Act, which abolishes immigration quotas and ensures fairness.

INTERNATIONAL FAMILY PLANNING ASSISTANCE

HON. ROBERT G. TORRICELLI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of serving on the Public Policy Advisory Committee on the Population Institute, a Washington based organization dedicated to bringing the Earth's resources into balance with the population. The advisory committee is composed of 22 Members of Congress and 18 other distinguished Americans who have dedicated themselves to the issue of global overpopulation.

Our annual meeting to assess current policy and to formulate legislative goals was recently concluded. The result of our 2-day meeting is an overview of the significance of U.S. family planning assistance to developing nations and the specific goals we think should be undertaken by the Congress and the administration to further the most effective assistance programs possible.

Overpopulation and reproductive health are vital issues which deserve our attention despite budget constraints. The cost effectiveness of family planning deserves special attention during a time when we are trying to save dollars and get the most for our money. I submit these documents for my colleagues' review.

MAINTENANCE AND EXPANSION OF FAMILY PLANNING PROGRAMS—PUBLIC POLICY ADVISORY COMMITTEE

PROGRAM SIGNIFICANCE

Over the past three decades, the United States has led the world in supporting programs providing couples in developing countries with the knowledge and means to choose the spacing and number of their children. On balance, these programs have been successful. In some countries birth rates have fallen dramatically; in others it appears that they are now beginning to do so.

During the first two of those decades, assistance provided to family planning programs was often attacked by the political left, particularly the Marxists, and by ultra nationalists in the Third World. They argued that family planning was being imposed on the developing world by the Western industrial nations in order to limit the power of the new countries. They also argued that population growth would not be a problem for properly structured (e.g., centralized) economies.

In the past decade such criticism from the left has declined markedly. All large developing countries are now attempting to implement their own form of family planning services. All of the 146 countries that participated in the 1984 U.S. International Conference on Population held in Mexico City agreed that all couples and individuals should be able "to exercise their basic human right to decide freely, responsibly and without coercion, the number and spacing of their children and to have the information, education and means to do so."

Ironically, while the criticism from the left has diminished, in the past few years there has been a strong effort by certain right wing factions and religious extremists to impede international efforts to continue supporting family planning programs. Their rhetoric is strongly parallel to the former leftist arguments. In particular, U.S. government assistance for family planning programs has been attacked on the grounds that such programs are culturally imposed on Third World couples and countries, and that proper economic policies alone (e.g., market oriented) would alleviate rapid population growth.

Such arguments were wrong when put forward by the left and by Third World ultra nationalists, and they are still wrong when advanced by the right and by religious extremists today.

The Population Institute Public Policy Advisory Committee urges the Population Institute and other institutions and individuals that are committed to the promotion of human life, human rights, and economic welfare to continue to make clear to the public and political leaders the importance of maintaining and expanding family planning programs in concert with other development efforts.

These programs protect and enhance:

HUMAN LIFE

A child born at least two years after a sibling is twice as likely to live through infancy as one born after a shorter interval.

Appropriate child spacing and timing greatly reduces maternal mortality. Complications related to childbirth are the leading cause of death for women of childbearing age in the developing world.

The risks associated with any form of medically accepted birth control are far less than those associated with childbirth itself.

Effective family planning programs greatly reduce the incidence of abortions, both legal and illegal.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Surveys indicate that most couples in the developing world wish to control their fertility. Most women wish to have a completed family size smaller than the current average for their society. Those who would reduce family planning opportunities are attempting to impose their views on couples in developing countries.

If countries are not helped now to deal with their population problems through voluntary programs of family planning which respect human rights, there is a danger that in the future they will turn to draconian measures to cope with their population problems.

ECONOMIC WELFARE

At the individual level, most couples who seek to limit their family size are motivated to do so in order to provide improved food, clothing, shelter, and education for the children they already have.

At the national level, high rates of demographic growth can make it difficult if not impossible to achieve sustained economic growth. Foreign assistance programs should promote both family planning and sensible economic policies.

While there are multiple reasons for the disastrous famine in Subsaharan Africa, there is no question that there and elsewhere rapid population growth makes it difficult for societies to provide land, capital investment, education and other human services needed to prevent starvation and malnutrition.

The international community can take great pride in the strides already made to help couples gain control of their fertility. But much remains to be done. Over 400 million couples who desire to control the spacing and number of their children currently do not have the knowledge or means to do so. Population growth rates have actually increased in the past decade in a number of countries in Subsaharan Africa. Even in countries where overall population growth rates are declining, there are large population groups, particularly in the rural areas and urban slums, for whom family planning services may be virtually unavailable.

Inability to control fertility is not just a problem for individual couples. Rapid population growth within countries can result in severe environmental damage, excessive migration to urban centers which are already unable to provide services and jobs to their current populations, and political unrest. These pressures can also affect neighboring and even distant countries. Environmental degradation can affect whole regions, as has been evident in Subsaharan Africa. Refugee flows and illegal migration can strain the economies and social services of destination countries. Political unrest can spill over into neighboring nations.

Delay in providing resources to help deal with population growth will only compound the problems to be faced in the future. In countries with high population growth rates, nearly half the population has still not entered the childbearing age, and hence even if a society moves toward reduced family sizes, population will continue to increase for at least a generation.

It is this inexorable momentum of population growth which requires that family planning support be continued—even in the face of strong budgetary problems and of misinformed criticism by a vocal minority. It is more important than ever that those in the United States who are concerned about human life, dignity, and welfare demand that adequate resources continue to be made available for international voluntary family planning activities.

Based on the foregoing, the Committee recommends the following:

GOALS FOR THE LEGISLATIVE AND EXECUTIVE BRANCHES

We, the members of the Population Institute Public Policy Advisory Committee, urge that in 1986 the Institute pursue the following objectives:

1. Funding levels: There are currently 400 million couples in the developing world who desire to plan the size of their families and the spacing of their children, but lack the means to do so. Current legislation authorizes expenditures of $290 million for international family planning programs in FY 87. We believe the full amount should be appropriated. Congress is under extreme pressure to reduce the budget deficit. But delay in providing support for family planning in the short run means increased infant and maternal death and reliance on abortions. In the long run, it means far more resources will be needed to cope with the attendant problems related to high population growth rates, ranging from hunger to political instability. Family planning simply cannot wait.*

2. United Nations Fund for Population Activities (UNFPA): The UNFPA currently assists population related activities in over 140 countries. It has been extraordinarily cooperative with specific U.S. concerns, and has voluntarily opened its records to U.S. government agencies. U.S. government audits have substantiated that U.S. funds provided to UNFPA have only been used for programs which meet with U.S. approval. Therefore, the U.S. should return to its longstanding policy of channeling 16 percent of its international family planning funding through UNFPA.

3. Non-governmental Organizations (NGO's): NGO's represent the best spirit of this country in their ability to harness the private energies of individuals for the common good—an approach which has been highly lauded by the current Administration. In the family planning field such NGO's provide cost effective, humane and flexible services. The U.S. government should continue to support their efforts. It should not attempt to dictate what these organizations do with funds not provided by the U.S. government, as long as the use of such funds is consistent with U.S. law and that of host countries. AID should not apply one set of standards to the overseas activities of U.S. and foreign NGO's and a different set of standards to programs administered in the U.S. by NGO's or overseas by foreign governments. In particular, the Congress should mandate the restoration of funding for the International Planned Parenthood Federation, which is the largest NGO in the family planning field, providing assistance to associations in 101 countries.

4. CONTRACEPTIVE OPTIONS: In 1981 the Foreign Assistance Act was amended to insure that information and services relating to natural family planning (NFP) were included among the methods offered to couples through U.S. assisted programs. We supported this change. Some advocates of NFP are now arguing that they should be allowed to establish programs in which no

*Representative Matthew F. McHugh (D-NY) added this comment to the statement of goals:

"While a funding level of $290 million is fully justified, the current funding level is only $239.4 million. Given the compelling need to reduce the Federal budget deficit, it is highly unlikely that Congress will be able to increase funding for international family planning programs to a level of $290 million in fiscal year 1987. This is regrettable in my judgment."

other method of family planning should be included, or even mentioned, to couples seeking family planning services. This is unacceptable. We applaud the DeConcini amendment requiring that FY 86 funds be made available only to programs guaranteeing a wide range of choices in family planning methods, and urge that the provision should be continued in FY 87. We also support H.R. 3654, which would statutorily change the Foreign Assistance Act along the lines of the DeConcini amendment.

5. Biomedical Research: Privately sponsored research into new contraceptive technologies has delcined in the United States because of the high costs of testing new pharmaceuticals, liability exposure, and acceptance in the U.S. of currently available family planning methods. To help the international family planning efforts, the U.S. should increase funding of biomedical research. This will result in a wider range of simple, safe, and effective contraceptive methods to meet the particular medical and cultural conditions existing around the world.

6. Human Rights: In designing and administering its population programs, the U.S. Government should be guided by the principle, agreed to by all governments participating in the 1984 International Conference on Population held in Mexico City, that all couples and individuals should be able to ". . . exercise their basic human rights to decide freely, responsibly and without coercion, the number and spacing of their children and to have the information, education and means to do so." The Foreign Assistance Act should be amended accordingly.

THE BUFFALO PHILHARMONIC IS ACCLAIMED BY THE NEW YORK TIMES

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, today I place into the RECORD a copy of a New York Times account of the performance of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra and its conductor Semyon Bychkov at New York's Carnegie Hall on Sunday, February 23, 1986.

This latest acclamation is further proof of the national and international reputation of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, which I am pleased to share with my colleagues.

The article follows.

MUSIC: BYCHKOV CONDUCTS BUFFALO PHILHARMONIC

(By Tim Page)

Once in a very long time, the critic is privileged to attend a musical event tinged with greatness. The Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra's Sunday night concert at Carnegie Hall was one of those occasions, thanks in large part on the contribution of the orchestra's conductor, Semyon Bychkov.

Mr. Bychkov is not unknown to New York audiences; while director of the Mannes College of Music Orchestra, he led a startlingly professional American premiere performance of Tchaikovsky's opera "Iolanta" some years ago. But he has now begun to enter into his full maturity, and Sunday night's performance left little doubt that Mr. Bychkov may well rank highly among the podium masters of his generation.

The orchestra itself is a good one. Along with the St. Louis, Milwaukee, Pittsburgh and Los Angeles orchestras, among others. It is one of those ensembles that is perennially excluded from our arbitrary and outdated list of "big five" American orchestras. These groups play with distinction and, indeed, sometimes surpass their more celebrated competitors. The Buffalo sound is full, rich and well blended; the playing disciplined but never mechanical, with only an occasional muddy passage or tentative attack. There is a strength to the Buffalo Philharmonic's playing, a muscularity that seems to be endemic to cold cities; elegance is forsworn in favor of a warm bear hug.

But it was Mr. Bychkov's conducting that made the evening so rewarding. Little can be said of his manner with Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride"—It was clear, propulsive and straightforward, as the music demands. He proved a deft accompanist to Lynn Harrell in the Saint-Saëns Callo Concerto No. 1, a gracious example of Gallic note spinning. Mr. Harrell played with style and patrician bearing.

However, it was in Shostavkovich's Symphony No. 5 that Mr. Bychkov made his lasting impression. A vast musical panorama, in which virtually every mood is mirrored by its opposite—its tragic mien leavened by irony, its moment of genuine exaltation hampered by the silent presence of political terror—it requires an epic musical understanding to do it justice.

And Mr. Bychkov possesses this vision. From the first notes of the symphony he seemd fully in control. The great Largo was built as a haunted modern nocturne, while the Allegro non troppo, with its ambiguous subtext, rattled and blared to an enthralling finale. In the wrong hands, this work can seem vulgar and abvious; on Sunday night, it impressed as one of the only Soviet works from the gore-scarred 1930's that may endure.

When the work was over, conductor and orchestra received a well-deserved standing ovation. Mr. Bychkov has recorded the Schostakovich Fifth with the Berlin Philharmonic for release on disk later this year; this listener can hardly wait.

FORGING A NATIONAL RETIREMENT INCOME PROGRAM

HON. ROD CHANDLER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, America has developed a private, voluntary employee benefits system which has become a model for other nations throughout the world. Millions of working men and women are covered by a wide range of retirement savings programs. Unfortunately, however, in the rush to restructure the Tax Code, deliberate and careful consideration of the Nation's retirement and savings policy goals is being overlooked. This carefully structured retirement system is being seriously jeopardized by a failure to take a long view in the development of a national retirement income policy.

Last fall I was pleased to join with Congressman BILL CLAY and Senators JOHN HEINZ and JOHN CHAFEE in introducing the Retirement Income Policy Act, H.R. 3594. Hearings on this measure were conducted by the House Labor-Management Relations Subcommittee just 2 weeks ago. This is a measure which, in fact, does take a long view of retirement policy and moves the debate out of a revenue-driven tax reform initiative.

Recently, Stuart J. Brahs, executive director of the Association of Private Pension and Welfare Plans [APPWP], delivered a speech on the need to take policy initiatives to encourage and strengthen the private, voluntary benefits system. As Mr. Brahs has noted,

Through a creative and comprehensive approach to policy objectives, RIPA [the Retirement Income Policy Act] moves policymaking for retirement security of the Nation's workers out of the annual tax tinkering and into a thoughtful, long view effort.

Mr. Brahs' remarks include some very timely and useful data on employee benefits and the impact of the House tax bill developed by the Employee Benefit Research Institute [EBRI]. I believe these remarks and the data are a useful contribution to the public debate on the taxation of employee benefits. I am pleased to insert them in the RECORD and commend them to my colleagues' attention.

REMARKS OF STUART J. BRAHS, ASSOCIATION OF PRIVATE PENSION AND WELFARE PLANS TO ELECTRONIC INDUSTRIES ASSOCIATION, MARCH 5, 1986

BACKGROUND

For much of the 20th century—and certainly since the Second World War—American employers and workers, in both the public and private sectors, have increasingly placed a high value on employee benefits—both retirement savings and welfare benefits. For over four decades the federal government has encouraged the growth of various employee benefits through tax incentives. As a result, the United States has the world's leading private, voluntary, employer-sponsored benefits system.

Today, of the more than 80 million nonagricultural workers in America, over 47 million—some 59 percent—are covered by retirement plans, including more than 37 percent of employees earning less than $10,000, more than 57 percent of those earning between $10 and $15,000, and almost 72 percent of those earning between $15 and $20,000.

Looking at the statistics for group health coverage, the data is even more impressive. Of the more than 15 million employees earning between $5,000 and $10,000, over half are covered by group health arrangements on their current jobs. Of the almost 18 million workers earning between $10,000 and $15,000, more than two-thirds are covered. For workers in higher wage brackets, coverage ranges from more than 80 percent to virtually full coverage.

However, pension and other retirement plans and welfare—or so-called "fringe"—benefits are under very serious assault by ill-considered and misguided public policy initiatives. In just the past five years, for example, legislation such as ERTA, TEFRA, DEFRA, REA and the recent House-passed tax bill (H.R. 3838) have generated massive, hurried, disruptive changes. Consider, for example, that since 1981 there have been 3,302 changes to the Internal Revenue Code. H.R. 3838 will precipitate 4,051 additional changes. As a consequence of the four tax reform measures affecting retirement plans adopted since 1982, each of the 600,000 plans for small businesses in this country has spent an average of $2,500 per plan for legal and accounting costs to cope with these revisions. That is over $1.5 billion!

Two general effects have resulted from this incessant tinkering—

Employers cannot make long-range plans for pension programs which are, in fact, long-range programs and,

There has been a steady reduction in incentives for employers to adopt and maintain pension plans. This is a very myopic view by the Congress as we are now in an era when the federal government simply does not have the revenue to pick up the retirement income needs of rank and file workers to replace private pension plans.

RETIREMENT INCOME POLICY ACT

For years the private sector has urged that Congress not to make national retirement policy within the context of tax legislation, as you lose sight very quickly of overall policy objectives. In a very tentative way the Congress has responded—S. 1784 and H.R. 3594, the Retirement Income Policy Act—RIPA—introduced last October by Senators John Heinz and John Chafee and Representatives Bill Clay and Rod Chandler. This measure was fashioned after almost a year of intensive work with representatives of the private sector. While there is considerable room for improvement, there is nothing wrong with its basic thrust. Through a creative and comprehensive approach to policy objectives, RIPA moves policymaking for retirement security of the nation's workers out of the annual tax tinkering and into a thoughtful, long view effort.

While employee benefits may be taxed to produce additional revenues, the cost is going to be far greater than policymakers in Washington can appreciate. Employers today provide more than $100 billion in health insurnace coverage to workers at an estimated revenue loss of around $30 billion. While tax incentives for employer-provided health insurance were not touched in the House bill, attempts may be made in the Senate Finance Committee to do so. Consider if you will that, absent the employer programs, taxpayers will have to foot the bill for the entire $30 billion. Further, the need for employee welfare or fringe benefits will not magically disappear, even though the level of availability for them would be reduced by certain poorly-considered tax policies. Seventy-three percent of America's corporate CEOs believe that if employers cut back on benefits, the government will be pressured—especially by the aging baby boom—to increase social security and add other welfare benefits.

Furthermore, prefunded benefit programs are an extraordinarily important source of capital in this country. Pension funds provided more than $1 billion in investment capital in 1984—more than one-third of the capital committed for new business and new jobs. Consider further the fact that in 1984 the assets held by pension funds exceeded $1 trillion, of which some $400 billion were held in equities. If current trends continue, according to Senator William Cohen of Maine, the assets of private pension funds will reach $2.4 trillion—and some others have projected over $4 trillion—by the end of the century and pension plan ownership of common stock in publicly-traded corporations may exceed 50 percent by the year 2000.

INDIVIDUAL RETIREMENT ACCOUNTS[1]

Current law enables an individual to exclude IRA contributions from taxable income up to the lesser of earned income or $2,000 each year. Married couples filing a joint return are entitled to deduct $2,250 if one spouse has earned income of at least $2,250 and the other spouse has no compensation in that year.

The House bill would modify the spousal IRA deduction, providing that the total IRA deduction could be up to $2,250 as long as the total earned income of the couple is at least $2,250. For example, under current law a spouse whose only earned income for a year is $50 from jury duty is entitled to an IRA deduction of only $50, not the $250 spousal IRA. Under the House bill, the spouse can receive $50 from jury duty without reducing the $250 spousal IRA.

The House bill would also modify the early IRA withdrawal penalty. Under current law, amounts withdrawn from an IRA before the beneficiary dies, becomes disabled or attains age 59½ are subject to an additional 10 percent tax. The House bill would increase the tax penalty on early withdrawals to 15 percent. However, the House bill waives the tax for any distribution that is part of a scheduled series of level payments under an annuity for the life of the IRA owner (or the joint lives of the owner and owner's beneficiary).

The House bill would also integrate the elective deferrals to 401(k) plans and 403(b) plans with IRA contributions. Currently, contributions to 401(k) and 403(b) plan contributions are independent of IRA contributions. The House bill would reduce an individual's IRA deduction by one dollar for each dollar contributed to a 401(k) or 403(b) plan. The reduction only applies to an individual's elective contribution, not to any employer's matching contribution. For example, if an individual contributes $1,500 to a 401(k) plan, the IRA deduction limit would become $500. Contributions of more than $2,000 to a 401(k) or 403(b) plan would preclude the use of an IRA.

CASH OR DEFERRED ARRANGEMENTS (401(k) PLANS) AND TAX-SHELTERED ANNUITIES (403(b) PLANS)[2]

Tax-favored saving through 401(k) plans is particularly attractive. Under current law employees of an employer who has established a qualified cash or deferred arrangement (CODA) under IRC section 401(k) may make pretax contributions—in lieu of salary—to the plan. Contributions are often matched by the employer. All monies in the plan and the earnings thereon are tax-deferred until withdrawal.

Employers match employee deferrals in more than 80 percent of 401(k) plans recently surveyed and provide full and immediate vesting of contributions in 46 percent of the plans. Graded vesting is also common (34 percent of plans surveyed), the most typical schedule providing full vesting in 5 years. Eighty-nine percent of 401(k) plans surveyed allow hardship withdrawals from employee contributions; 56 percent of the plans allow similar withdrawals from the vested employer contributions.

Whereas the president proposed the repeal of 401(k) plans, the House bill would reduce the limit on elective deferrals, tie employee contributions to IRA contributions, tighten nondiscrimination rules and impose a penalty on early withdrawals. The same rules would apply to 403(b) plans.

Under current law, total contributions on behalf of an individual to all define contribution plans, including 403(b) and 401(k) plans, are limited to the lesser of $30,000 or 25 percent of compensation. Aggregate contributions include any pretax contribution, any employer contribution, and a portion of the participant's aftertax contribution (if any). A further limit, called an exclusion allowance, applies to amounts contributed to 403(b) plans.

THE CASE FOR 401(k)S

The Administration's back and fourth attitude toward 401(k) plans and, more recently, the House's action to seriously undermine these popular and valuable retirement savings programs—are a good example of why the tax reform process is the worst possible arena for determining something as important and as far-reaching as national retirement income policy.

Unlike Individual Retirement Accounts, 401(k)s offer employees the prearranged discipline of regular savings managed and professionally invested by their employer who, surveys show, match employee's contributions in 80 percent of the plans. While some preretirement withdrawals for specially defined hardship cases are permitted in many plans, actual utilization is very infrequent and no abuse of this plan feature has been demonstrated. More importantly, this very feature attracts participation by younger workers, who are typically the least likely to save, because they know they can access these funds in an emergency.

Contrary to what some may have you believe, 401(k)s are not a "scam" for highly-compensated executives. There is a very workable and effective discrimination test to assure that 401(k)s do not favor higher-paid employees. Companies responding to a 1985 APPWP survey reported that nearly 60 percent of their workers in the lower two-thirds income group were participating in the company's 401(k) plan. Further, almost 70 percent of all employees represented by the companies with 401(k) plans responding to the APPWP survey—more than 3.3 billion workers—were eligible to participate.

As many as 19 million Americans are now eligible to participate in 401(k)s. Data indicate that between 60–63 percent of eligible employees do participate, for an estimated 10 to 15 million active participants nationwide. Participation rates for workers earning between $10,000–$25,000 are double the IRA participation rates for workers in the same income group. At every income level, a higher percentage of those eligible participate in 401(k) plans instead of IRAs. While 401(k)s are subject to strict nondiscrimination rules, IRA usage, not subject to such rules, is skewed toward upper-income individuals.

CODAs are engendering a revolution in worker savings behavior. 401(k)s play a major role in adapting retirement income options to the needs of a rapidly changing workforce. While we have made great strides in expanding pension coverage, some nagging problems still exist—particularly for workers in small businesses with fewer than 100 employees and for highly mobile workers.

401(k)s are contributing greatly to expanding pension coverage for these employees. One reason for the rapid growth of 401(k)s has been the ease of implementation and adoption by small companies and nonprofit organizations who never before could provide an effective retirement income plan. Once vested, workers participating in a 401(k) can roll over their "account" into a qualified plan such as an IRA. Recent data also indicate that for the overwhelming majority of 401(k) plans, full vesting is either immediate or occurs within 5 years, making CODAs especially attractive to younger, more mobile workers, such as working mothers and those in high tech and other volatile service occupations.

The Retirement Income Policy Act offers another alternative in the development of a national retirement income policy—and most significantly that it is out of the context of tax reform. Much work must be done to improve upon this measure but, in our view, it provides a framework for the reasonable consideration of pension policy for the remainder of this decade.

The hallmarks of our review of RIPA has been that employer-sponsored plans depend upon the voluntary action of employers. As the tax incentives are decreased, and the revised rules are made more restrictive and complex, interest in establishing and maintaining plans diminishes. In addition, an important policy goal is the protection of core benefits such as retirement, health and life insurance. Finally, Congress needs to preserve flexibility both in terms of addressing employees needs and the employer's ability to provide varying arrangements. We doubt the Congress can better assess what kind of plan an employer should maintain or what level of benefits should be provided. Younger employees saving for retirement need to know that despite their intention to have their funds available at retirement, in the event of unforeseen financial emergency prior to retirement, the funds so set aside may be utilized without confiscatory penalty.

BENEFITS COALITION

We have forged a broad-based, nationwide coalition to protect and preserve our system of employer-provided, health and income security benefits. The Electronic Industries Association and many of its individual members are active in this coalition. Recent legislative assaults on benefits in the Congress have taught us too well that employers and employees, as well as other advocates of employee benefits, need to be energized and catalyzed to act on this critical public policy issue.

We must let lawmakers hear about these critical issues—about the security private pension and employee benefits programs provide for American workers and the disastrous consequences if they are taxed. We have urged that they look beyond simplistic calculations about how much tax revenue is theoretically lost in a given year, and address the broad public policy aspects of the issue.

CONCLUSION

In the coming debate on tax reform, the business community will be keenly divided on many key issues. But there is one issue where they are uniquely united: not taxing employee benefits. And as the statements of Lane Kirkland make clear, labor and management also see eye to eye on much of this issue.

Tax reform and simplification should fix what's broke: paralytic complexity in the tax code, unintended and wasteful investments in tax shelters, egregious inequities. Reform must not become a fundamental and reckless abandonment of a benefits system that has become a model for the world.

Although we support efforts to bring federal budget deficits under control, raising the needed revenue by taxing employee benefits is simply the wrong approach. Whatever the arguments for tax reform or simplification, they fail to make either economic or social sense when they lead to taxing employee benefit plans and thereby discourage their availability or erode their value.

For decades we have consciously bolstered the three-legged stool of private pension, private savings, and social security to enable today's workers to enjoy an unprecedented degree of financial security. Those who wish to tamper with a good—not perfect system—threaten to kick a leg out from under that carefully crafted stool.

CANADIAN SOFTWOOD LUMBER IMPORT PROBLEM

HON. WILLIAM L. DICKINSON

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 5, 1986

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, over the past 6 years, our lumber industry has closed over 250 lumber mills, causing an estimated loss of 38,000 jobs. Between 1978 and 1982, the consumption and production of softwood lumber by American firms fell by nearly one-third. During the same period, imports of Canadian softwood lumber in the United States rose from 28 to 32 percent of our domestic market. In 1975, Canadian imports accounted for only 19 percent of U.S. softwood lumber consumption.

The State of Alabama, which has a large timber industry, has also been hard hit by this influx of Canadian softwood lumber products. Between 1978 and 1984, 29 operating lumber mills have been lost. In 1978, 107 lumber mills existed, while only 78 of these mills existed in 1984. Canadian imports are the cause of at least half of these closings, nationwide.

In an effort to help illustrate the gravity of the situation, I, along with 59 of my colleagues, have sent a bipartisan letter to Secretary of State Shultz urging him to stress the issue of unfair Canadian timber subsidies and the injury that these imports have caused the U.S. softwood lumber industry, during the trade negotiations between the United States and Canada later this month.

To further accentuate my strong feelings on the seriousness of this problem, I have cosponsored legislation introduced by Congressman SAM GIBBONS, which will allow the United States to place tariffs on Canadian softwood lumber imports. Obviously, this course of action is a method of last resort, but something must be done to resolve the inequities that exist between the United States and Canadian softwood lumber industries as they compete in the American market.

SPORTS BANQUET AND AWARDS CEREMONY

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, on March 13 the Newark Board of Education held its Sports Banquet and Awards Ceremony to honor outstanding students, athletes, coaches, and special guests. The banquet was held in the Terrace Ballroom, Symphony Hall in Newark.

Mr. Eugene Campbell, executive superintendent of schools, explained this special event:

Our athletic teams have established many records by their performances past and present and have brought pride to the hearts of the total Newark community. In view of their achievements, the Newark Board of Education is pleased to honor our outstanding students, athletes, coaches and special guests.

The special guests honored at the banquet were: Mr. Darryl Dawkins of the New Jersey Nets, Mr. Tim Bassett of the New Jersey Nets, Mr. Hasson Arbubaker, formerly of the Minnesota Vikings, Mr. Willie Marsh, formerly of the Philadelphia Eagles, Mr. Andre Tippett, of the New England Patriots, and Mr. Mike Charles, of the Miami Dolphins.

Greeting remarks were delivered by Mr. Charles A. Bell, president of the Newark Board of Education. The master of ceremonies was Mr. Renard A. Rossi, supervisor of Physical Education. The invocation was delivered by Rev. Oliver Brown, member of the board of education. Other speakers were Mr. Campbell and Dr. Gene A. Foti, deputy executive superintendent for academics. Mr. Tom Strahler, area manager, Pepsi Cola Bottling Co., presented the awards.

Also honored as "Newark City Champions" were: Vailsburg High School (football and soccer), Malcolm X. Shabazz High School (indoor track and girls basketball), Barringer High School (boys basketball) and East Side High School (cross-country).

INTRODUCTION OF THE PANAMA CANAL AUTHORIZATION BILL

HON. MIKE LOWRY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce today the Panama Canal Authorization Act, fiscal year 1987.

The Panama Canal Act of 1979 requires the U.S. Congress to authorize any appropriations to the Panama Canal Commission [PCC] and any expenditures of funds by the PCC. The funds of the PCC are comprised of tolls and fees collected from the users of the canal.

The bill I have introduced today authorizes an appropriation of $437,250,000 to the Panama Canal Commission for the operation and maintenance of the canal—section 2. Out of this sum, no more than $27,480,000 is authorized to be expended for capital outlays—section 3. This authorized appropriation is limited to the tolls and fees collected from the users of the canal, and is at no cost to the U.S. taxpayer.

This bill also specifically authorizes in section 4 an appropriation of such amounts as may be necessary for increases in salary, pay, retirement, employee benefits, 4(a) treaty payments to Panama, and increased fuel costs.

Section 5 of the legislation amends section 1303 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 to annually authorize six additional citizens of the Republic of Panama to receive instructions at the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy. These Panamanian students at the Merchant Marine Academy would be funded by the Republic of Panama and their training would help to ensure a smooth and orderly transition as we move toward the year 2000, when the Republic of Panama assumes complete control of the operation and maintenance of the canal.

Currently there are only about 25 citizens of the Republic of Panama who have been trained or are currently in the Panama Canal pilot training programs, and these additional students at the Merchant Marine Academy would accelerate the entry of Panamanians into the pilot work force. This acceleration is increasingly important to our Nation's maritime interests as we move toward the year 2000, and more toward the role of user, rather than operator, of the Panama Canal.

Finally, section 6 of the bill amends the Panama Canal Act of 1979 (22 U.S.C. 3751) by disallowing a reduction of appropriations under the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 when the implementation of such an order would result in a payment of moneys to the Republic of Panama under 4(c) of article XIII of the Panama Canal Treaty of 1977.

Article XIII 4(c) of the treaty states that any revenues over expenditues of up to $10 million annually and cumulatively shall go to the Republic of Panama. Since the treaty has been implemented in 1979, the PCC has only paid a total of approximately $6 million in profits to the Republic of Panama.

Gramm-Rudman budget cuts in 1986 would reduce the PCC budget by $18.3 million. Since revenues from tolls will be collected but not expended under Gramm-Rudman, the $18.3 million in unspent toll moneys will go to the Republic of Panama as required by article XIII, paragraph 4(c).

The purported purpose of Gramm-Rudman is to reduce the United States budget deficit, but the application of the Gramm-Rudman law to the PCC will only result in a payment to Panama. The result would be seriously damaging to the operation and maintenance of the canal, with no impact whatsoever on reducing the U.S. budget deficit.

Mr. Speaker, I hope to soon markup this bill in committee and return to the floor to urge its passage. Thank you.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. W. HENSON MOORE

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I was unable to be present for the vote taken earlier today on the previous question on the rule to accompany House Concurrent Resolution 296 and the vote on the rule itself as I was at a meeting at the White House with the President at the time these votes were taken. Had I been present, I would have voted against the previous question so a new rule could be offered that would observe regular procedures and compel a budget to be produced by our Budget Committee to be compared alongside the President's budget. Our Budget Committee has the duty and obligation to look at the component parts of the President's budget, take it apart, make changes and put a consensus budget together. What is going on today totally ignores this legislative due process. This is a political exercise.

As the previous question was approved, I would have voted against the defective rule for the same reasons.

I remind my colleagues it is not an easy task to write a budget having a deficit ceiling of $144 billion. But it is a responsibility we must accept for it is ours to perform in the House Budget Committee and then here on the House floor. There are changes I would make to the President's budget and will offer in the Budget Committee as a member of the Budget Committee. The President's budget is not good enough, is not a consensus reflecting the work of the Budget Committee, and there is no opportunity to amend it, I am voting against House Concurrent Resolution 296 today.

Improvement is supposed to be the duty of the Budget Committee. Today's activity is a poor excuse for nothing having happened so far on our Budget Committee. We should have been well along the way making changes we see fit to the President's budget on an issue-by-issue basis. Too much time has already been lost. If this body is going to live up to its responsibility, now is the time to get started instead of politicial posturing and criticizing the President's budget without providing an alternative.

F. DOUGLAS JOHNSON, MARYLAND VETERAN OF THE YEAR

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call my colleagues' attention to the accomplishments of F. Douglas Johnson who, on March 27, 1986, will be recognized as the "1986 Maryland Veteran of the Year" by the Joint Veterans Committee of Maryland.

Doug Johnson has an outstanding record of achievement in the volunteer community, particularly on behalf of children and youth. The many organizations to which he has lent his time and efforts include: United Cerebral Palsy; Maryland School for the Blind; Baltimore County Youth Commission; Towson Independence Day Parade Committee; Youth for Christ; Boys Village of Maryland; Baltimore County Police Department-Youth Division; Parkville Recreation Council; Maryland Special Olympics; Baltimore County Police Athletic League; Maryland Society for Crippled Children and Adults; Medical Eye Bank of Maryland; Montrose School; Rosewood State Hospital; Juvenile Service Administration; Maryland Cystic Fibrosis Foundation; and Task Force on Disruptive Students (Tabco).

F. Douglas Johnson is a veteran who cares about his fellow citizens and who does something about it.

THE NEED FOR A STEEL INDUSTRY PROGRAM TO "LEAPFROG" THE COMPETITION

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, today my colleague and fellow-Pennsylvanian, Congressman DON RITTER, and I are introducing a bill to bring focus to a Federal research program to improve technology in the American steel industry. This bill attempts to carry out what has become known as the "Keyworth Initiative," named for President Reagan's former Science Advisor Dr. George Keyworth. The Keyworth Initiative was developed as a cost-shared effort with industry, using the Department of Energy's national laboratories to develop "leapfrog" technology in steelmaking, that is, processes that "leapfrog" what our foreign competitors are now using.

Dr. Keyworth introduced his proposal in this way:

> We have done a poor job of harnessing our strength. We have to work together toward a common purpose, that of improving our industrial competitiveness abroad. We need a strong, new partnership among government, universities, and industry.

The American steel industry has suffered for many reasons in the last decade, and there is enough blame to go around. But today, the steel industry has lost its technological advantage, a foundation which was key in the two decades following World War II. By virtually allowing the demise of steel research and development, we have forfeited much of our industry while our foreign competitors have surged ahead in productivity and quality.

Study after study has emphasized that modernization is critical. President Reagan's own temporary Steel Advisory Committee found that "modernization and increased productivity are essential to the survival of the American steel industry."

WHY A STRONG STEEL INDUSTRY?

A continuous and adequate supply of steel is the foundation of our economy and our national security. Many industries, like automobiles, depend on steel; many communities have steel at their core. A recent National Academy of Sciences study observed that there are four times as many indirect jobs in industries dependent on steel as there are direct jobs in the steel industry. In terms of national defense, almost every item of military hardware contains steel in some form, and "there are no other materials that can provide the required properties at an acceptable cost," says NAS. Furthermore, industries that are vital to military equipment, transport, and support depend on steel. "There is no debate on the issue of whether we should maintain a steel industry capable of providing for a strong national defense," noted the Academy.

PROVISIONS OF THE STEEL R&D BILL

The purpose of the bill reads as follows:

to eliminate the current technological disadvantages facing the American steel industry; to increase the ability of the American steel industry to compete effectively with steelmakers abroad; and to increase the industry's energy efficiency, by establishing a Government-industry-university program of scientific research and development which applies the expertise of the Government-owned laboratories of the Department of Energy and the expertise of the National Bureau of Standards, universities, and others to the development of the advanced technologies which are necessary to deal with the major problems facing the American steel industry.

The bill requires:

The Secretary to develop a plan as part of the Department of Energy's industrial energy conservation programs, in consultation with the NBS, industry and university representatives;

Priority to be given to four areas: (1) the reduction of domestic raw materials to liquid steel; (2) the production of near-net shape solids from liquid steel; (3) the development of universal grades of steel; and (4) the application of automatic processing technology;

The Federal share of the cost to be 70 percent, with the remaining coming from non-Federal sources. Proprietary rights of the industry would be protected.

The Department to submit an annual report to the President and the Congress.

Appropriations for the Department of Energy at $10,000,000 for fiscal year 1987, $12,000,000 for fiscal year 1988, and $15,000,000 for 1989, 1990, and 1991. For the National Bureau of Standards, $3,000,000 for fiscal years 1987, 1988, 1989, 1990, and 1991.

WHY THE KEYWORTH INITIATIVE IS THE RIGHT APPROACH

A joint Government-industry-university approach is necessary because it involves the segments of our society with a stake in solving the problem. Neither Government nor industry can do it alone. Industry representatives have testified that while they have the expertise, individual companies do not have the money to do it alone. A collaborative effort combining the talents of Government, industry, and the universities will get the "best bang for the buck." The national laboratories with their expertise in fields like metallurgy and large-scale engineering are ideally suited as partners for this research.

TO OUTCOMPETE THE COMPETITION

In the integrated steel industry in the last 15 years, there has been what the National Academy of Sciences calls a "global shift" of technological leadership from the United States to Japan. It is painfully evidenced in record high imports that are literally wrecking steel communities and destroying steel jobs in communities like my own in Pittsburgh. Japan, with generous government assistance and with the largest ferrous metals R&D Program in the world, has constructed and operated the most efficient steel mills in existence. In response to public discussion about the Keyworth Initiative, I am told that the Japanese have spent $65 million on steel R&D in the last 2 years. The total number of U.S. industry steel researchers is less than that of one Japanese company.

Many American plants are old. Only two plants have been built in the United States since 1950; Japan has ironically, had to replace their entire industry since World War II. Only about 10 percent of U.S. output of steel is produced in plants less than 32 years old, in sharp contrast to Japan, West Germany, France, and the United Kingdom. Almost all Japanese steel is produced in relatively new plants; over half for the other countries.

According to NAS, newer plants enable the Japanese to use the latest technology, materials assembly, materials flow, and process control techniques. Japan has a significantly higher percentage of continuous casting than the United States. The average yield when processing raw steel into finished steel, is about 12 to 16 percent greater in Japan than in the United States.

Obsolete equipment and processes are not the sole reason for the industry's problems by any means; nor is any one technology the total salvation. However, in the words of NAS, "There are radical technologies that could significantly improve the competitive position of the domestic industry if commercial scale development is realized."

There are those who will question how we can spend money on this at this critical time in our Federal budget. There are several answers. Seven and one-half million dollars was approved by Congress for fiscal year 1986 with strong bipartisan support and signed into law last year to get the Keyworth Initiative started. Second, President Reagan has requested a $1 billion increase, a 14 percent increase in DOE's nuclear weapons budget—but a 58 percent cut in other DOE energy conservation programs. In my view, the budget for nuclear weapons can be restrained without harming our national security and priorities should be shifted to help save our basic industries. The money is there; it's a question of priorities. Government support for research in private industry is not new. Seventy-two percent of aerospace R&D is Government supported and we are world leaders in this field. Money does "talk."

Our bill lays out a 5-year plan for steel technology R&D that I hope will lift us out of inaction and head us back into world competition. If we continue to wait for this problem to solve itself, we will have a long wait as the industry goes down the tubes. The longer we neglect, the more intense government involvement will have to be. The Keyworth Initiative is supported by industry and by labor. I urge my colleagues to join in supporting this program to regain international leadership in steel manufacturing technology.

SALUTE TO CARLOS PEREZ

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise to salute an American who has realized the potential for success that is embodied in our Nation. He was recognized by President Reagan in a recent State of the Union Message.

Carlos Perez, a Cuban refugee from the Castro regime, came to the United States with only $27 in his pocket. With no understanding of the language or the American way of life, Carlos Perez started out without any money but with a million dollars worth of spirit and commitment. Perez's desire to succeed took him through many failures but today he is the president of Banana Services, the first Hispanic-owned company that has managed to succeed in the highly competitive banana business. He is an American success story, one which deserves to be recognized by the U.S. Congress.

I ask that these articles be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a tribute to Carlos Perez, a man who made success out of a dream.

[From the Miami Herald, Feb. 6, 1984]

HE TOOK ON THE TOP BANANAS AND MADE IT BIG

(By Andres Oppenheimer)

Carlos Perez says he got the news when he was about to board a plane at Miami International Airport.

"I had called my office just to see what was new and my secretary told me to call the White House," he recalls. "When I did, an official informed me that President Reagan was going to mention my name as an example of private entrepreneurship in his State of the Union speech that night."

Perez, a staunch conservative and Republican activist, said he could hardly keep his calm as he boarded the plane minutes later.

"If the Boeing 707 usually flies at 25,000 feet above the ground, I was flying at 50,000 feet," he recalls.

In his speech that night, Reagan told the story of the Cuban emigre who arrived in the United States with $27 in his pocket and built a multimillion-dollar company. Perez is one of the "heroes for the '80s" and an example of "small-business people with big ideas," the president said.

LAND OF OPPORTUNITY

"This is the land of opportunity," Perez said last week at the offices of his Banana Services Inc. fruit-import firm in Coral Gables. "Only here could a small firm like ours get a share of a market that has always been the property of big monopolies."

The 51-year-old executive, who earns more than $200,000 a year, said Banana Services Inc. is the first Hispanic-owned company that has managed to find a niche in the highly competitive banana business, traditionally dominated by three large multinational companies—Castle and Cooke, United Brands and Del Monte.

Perez was no newcomer to the banana business when he started his import businesses in Miami 20 years ago.

His family had owned the largest fruit export business in Cuba before the 1958

Communist revolution. The family business, headed by Perez' uncle, Manuel Perez Galan, employed more than 7,000 in peak season.

Perez said when he arrived in Miami he already had a Ph.D. in education and considerable working experience in the food import-export business.

But he said this does not invalidate Reagan's portrayal of him as a poor man who beat the odds.

"If I hadn't worked 18 to 20 hours a day for many years. I would have never gotten to where I am," he said. "Besides, I believe that the opportunity is there for whoever wants to take it, regardless of his or her background."

SUPPLY PROBLEM

Perez said he started his present company in 1980 after working several years for Turbana Banana, a Colombian growers-owned firm.

"It wasn't easy to form an independent company," he said. "The biggest problem was to get the supply: The big companies virtually control the industry in the producing countries, and they don't want anybody else to get into their territory."

Castle and Cooke, United Brands and Del Monte Banana Company import about 85 per cent of all bananas into the United States.

But Samuel Gordon, president of Del Monte Banana Co., said Perez' allegations about the big banana companies are "not true at all."

"He's crying wolf," Gordon said. "We ourselves started out as a small company, and nobody stopped us from growing to what we are today. For him to complain about the competition is like a person who starts making cars to say he has trouble competing with General Motors."

Perez said in 1982 he made 22 trips to Costa Rica, Honduras, Panama and other Central and South American countries in search of banana suppliers. He went home with banana-import contracts with two Costa Rican companies.

But when Perez had two ships from Africa pick up the load in Costa Rica, the Costa Rican producers told him the deal was off.

"They told me that their government had just passed a new law, and that the contract we had signed could not be carried out in accordance to the new regulations," he said.

Perez said he is sure that someone, whom he refused to identify, "applied tremendous pressure" on the Costa Rican producers and government officials to invalidate the deal.

He said he has filed an anti-trust complaint with the Justice Department, where the issue is to be resolved.

SUPPLIERS FOUND

Despite these troubles, Perez finally found suppliers willing to sell to him as well as to the large corporations, and Banana Services Inc. quickly boosted its annual sales.

In 1982, the company reported $800,000 in sales. In 1983, sales soared to $20 million, and in 1984 they are expected to reach $30 million.

Even with its rapidly growing sales, Banana Services ranks ninth among the U.S. banana-importing firms and accounts for about 3 per cent of the banana market.

"The secret of our success is that we are small and much more flexible than our big competitors," Perez said.

"Suppose a client in Louisiana has a problem with a banana cargo we sent him," he said. "If he calls us, we would probably solve it immediately, while it may take him three days to go through the bureaucracy of one of our competitors."

PLANTAIN SALES

On the other hand, he said, Banana Services Inc. owes much of its success to its plantain sales to Hispanic markets in New York and Florida. Banana Services Inc. controls 30 per cent of the U.S. plantain market.

"Plantains work like a hook for Cubans," Perez said.

"When local supermarkets told me a few years ago that they wanted to increase their sales of black beans, I told them to move them from the grocery to the produce department, right next to the plantains," he said. "It worked: Sales of black beans soon tripled."

Besides running his banana-import firm, Perez devotes part of his time to serve as an adviser to the Small Business Administration, a U.S. government agency.

He also heads the Florida chapter of Viva '84, a Hispanic drive to raise funds for the Republican National Committee.

Some of his few non-business activities are jogging and playing baseball in the "Pineapple League," a 13-year-old group founded by Cuban-American amateur players that meets every Sunday at Dade's Tamiami park.

"It's the only Cuban-American organization that has been able to remain united for so many years," he jokes.

Does he have any other hobby?

"Yes," says his wife, Helen. "Spending hours on the phone . . . talking business."

CARLOS PEREZ—"HERO FOR THE '80s"

(By David Reed)

In President Reagan's State of the Union message to Congress last January, he applauded the "spirit of enterprise" shown by one Carlos Perez who, the President said, had arrived here, a refugee from Cuba, virtually penniless, and gone on to prove that America is still a land of opportunity.

Soon after, my sister telephoned. "Is that our Carlos?" she asked. I called his home in Miami. "Yes, it's true," said Carlos' wife, Helen. "This phone has been ringing off the hook."

Helen, also a Cuban-American, was a friend of an aunt of mine, who lived in Miami. I first met Carlos at Aunt Marvel's home in the spring of 1960. A muscular man with a shock of black hair and a perpetual ear-to-ear grin, Carlos had just arrived in the United States. Fidel Castro had come to power the previous year and Carlos, like so many of his countrymen, fled to the United States rathern than live under communism.

Carlos, 28 at the time, spoke no English. When asked how he liked the United States, his face lighted up and, with great enthusiasm, he exclaimed: "No comprendo" ("I don't understand"). When asked about his plans for the future, Carlos beamed: "No comprendo." When someone said, "See you later," Carlos' face almost split apart from the smile: "No comprendo."

Carlos had just $27 in his pockets. Aunt Marvel found him a room in the house of a neighbor lady, who agreed to wait awhile for the rent.

Back in Cuba, Carlos had been a powerhouse beisbol pitcher and was chosen for the 1953 Caribbean World Amateur Series in Caracas, Venezuela. Cuba won, and Carlos attracted American attention. Offered a minor-league contract, he decided instead to go into his family's wholesale-produce business. After getting his university degree, he pounded the streets of Havana, selling to grocery stores. He saved almost as much as he earned and eventually, with four trucks for hauling produce to Havana from the provinces, Carlos became a successful businessman.

The revolution changed all that. When Fidel Castro took over Cuba in 1959, the government confiscated Carlos' business and trucks.

Once in the United States, Carlos wanted to start anew as a businessman, but he hadn't a clue how to go about it. He was a foreigner, he knew no English and he did not understand gringo ways. Nonetheless, he was determined to find out if America was, as it has often been called, a land of opportunity, a country that had grown to greatness because it had permitted immigrants from all over the world to contribute to the fullest with their talents and energies.

Working with relatives still in Cuba, Carlos tried to set up a business importing tropical fruits. As luck would have it, anti-Castro longshoremen in Miami and West Palm Beach refused to unload a shipment of pineapples, calling them "communist" fruit. As a forlorn Carlos stood on the dock, the ship sailed away to dump them at sea.

Carlos married Helen in 1960, and the newlyweds lived in a small house in a lower-income area of Miami, sharing the cramped space with her mother and Helen's two daughters from an earlier marriage. Sometimes it was only his wife's job as a receptionist that kept food on the table. She also knew English and helped Carlos in his struggles to learn the language.

Gringos were baffling. Once, while driving with Helen, Carlos' jalopy stalled. A police car pulled up behind, and Carlos was certain they were in trouble; in most Latin countries, people fear the police. But the officer, they found, had stopped simply to help.

The Perezes were particularly stunned by the assassination of President Kennedy in 1963. "The American Army will take over now," Carlos told Helen. That's what would have happened in most places in Latin America. The fact that the system remained unshaken made an abiding impression on them.

In 1965 Carlos rented 30 acres of land in Homestead, south of Miami, and planted it with sweet potatoes, a Cuban favorite. The potatoes did not fare well. One day a county agricultural inspector appeared in the field. Carlos wondered how big a bribe the man would demand—what one would automatically expect to happen in many Latin countries. But to his utter surprise, the inspector said, "I hear you're having trouble. Let me see your fertilizers. I'll take a sample to the lab for tests."

Despite the early setbacks, Carlos kept plugging away at the wholesale-produce business. One day he called on a large supermarket chain in Miami without much hope that he could break into that lucrative market. But the produce buyer greeted him cordially, listened to his sales pitch, and then said, "Come back next week and we'll see if we need anything." Carlos returned the following week, made the same pitch, got the same answer. This went on for six months until, to his surprise, the buyer gave him a order, the first of many. Carlos realized then that the buyer had been testing him to make sure he was serious and tenacious enough to fulfill his part of the bargain.

Carlos started working for a banana-importing company and, in 1970, traveled to a region that was, to him, as distant and strange as the moon: the Midwest. It was the dead of winter and Carlos, who had spent his entire life in tropical Cuba and Miami, flew to Chicago in a borrowed overcoat. With his heavily accented English, he thought he would get short shrift from buyers. But in Chicago, Milwaukee, Sheboygan, Des Moines and Omaha—everywhere—he was staggered by the response. People invited him to dinner and took him sightseeing. He came home with $10,000 in orders.

Business was flourishing, and Carlos began flying to Central and South America several times a year to make deals with produce growers. Diplomatically but persistently, he got them to upgrade the quality of their crops. Once he even persuaded a group of Colombian growers to pave the roads leading from their plantations to the port to reduce bruising of the fruit.

In 1970, before an American flag, Carlos swore allegiance to the United States in a ceremony in Miami, becoming an American citizen. Later, he obtained two prized possessions: an American passport and a voter's card.

Soon after, on a business trip to Medellin, Colombia, Carlos helped form a baseball team to play a Colombian team. His team won, and the next day a local newspaper ran a headline, "Gringo Baseball Team Beats Colombians." "I am very proud to be called a gringo. I really am an American now," Carlos told Helen when he returned home.

In 1982 Carlos set up his own business, chartering two large freighters to bring bananas from Colombia to the States. In 1983 he grossed $22 million, and expects to gross between $35 million and $40 million this year, with sales as far afield as Winnipeg. His success attracted the attention of officials at the Small Business Administration (SBA) in Washington, who appointed him a member of the agency's National Advisory Council and chairman of its committee on minority business.

Carlos recalls how as a youth in Cuba he had imagined that America was run by Big Business. As he learned, small businesses such as his own play an indispensable role in the American economy and, ultimately, in the success of U.S. democratic institutions. Of the 14 million businesses in this country, 98 percent are small ventures that create nearly two-thirds of all private, nonagricultural jobs and generate 38 percent of the country's gross national product.

Now 52, Carlos continues to play beisbol every Sunday in Miami. He and other Cuban-Americans have formed what they call the Pineapple League, with six teams. In deference to their advancing years and expanding waistlines, they have slowed the game down. But just as in the old days in Havana, there are feverish cries of "Arriba, Carlos!" ("Way to go, Carlos!") and, on rare occasions, "A las duchas, Carlos!" ("To the showers, Carlos!").

On the afternoon of last January 25, Carlos, his hair flecked with gray, on his way to Washington for a meeting of the SBA advisory council, was paged at the Miami airport by his office. He was told to be sure to listen to the President's State of the Union message. That evening Carlos watched as President Reagan hailed a "spirit of enterprise" in the Union shown by "sunrise industries of high-technology and by small-business people with big ideas"—among them Carlos Perez, "a Cuban refugee who turned $27 and a dream into a successful importing business in Coral Gables, Florida." People such as Carlos, the President said, are "heroes for the '80s." Tears streamed down Carlos' face as he thought of all the years since his arrival in America, of the Cuba that might have been, of the America that had received him so generously and of the gringo President who had just honored him.

When the press asked him what he thought of it all, Carlos had just one answer: "America is the greatest country in the world," he said. "Absolutely the greatest."

BIOGRAPHY—CARLOS M. PEREZ

Carlos Perez, 53, is a native of Artemisa, Pinar del Rio, Cuba. He is married to the former Helen Aulet of Havana, and they have two daughters, Alicia and Elena.

Mr. Perez completed his preuniversity studies in Artemisa and then went on to the University of Havana, where he distinguished himself as an athlete-scholar. During his period at the University, Mr. Perez was selected as an All-Star player and participated in the National Amateur Baseball Series (1952). He was selected to be a member of Cuba's National Baseball Team in the World Amateur Baseball Series held in Venezuela in 1953.

After earning his Ph.D. in Education, Mr. Perez was engaged as a salesman by Compania Empacadora Majagua, an exporter of canned tropical fruits. Two years later, in 1957, he became its Vice President. In 1957, also, the 25-year-old Carlos Perez founded a transport company, Compania Transporte Majagua, and served as its president.

The career of Carlos Perez, like that of many others in his homeland, was abruptly interrupted with the onslaught of Fidel Castro's revolution in 1959, when Cuba's new communist government undertook a program of nationalization of all business, including that of Mr. Perez.

In October 1960, Carlos Perez came to the United States to escape the ever increasing threats against him and his family. With only $27, he began a new life in this, his adopted country. During his first two years in Miami, he accepted any work he could get to support his family. Then, in 1962, he joined West Indies Food and Packing Co., and served in the capacity of Vice President. Once back in his field of expertise—tropical commodities—Mr. Perez's career again grew quickly.

In 1966, he was asked to join another tropical fruit company, Frutera del Caribe, as its Vice President and General Manager. During the next two years, Mr. Perez developed new agricultural programs in various Central American countries. Most notable was a massive prototype pineapple plantation in Nicaragua. Because this plantation was established in Puerto Cabezas, in a region inhabited by the Misquito Indians, Carlos Perez became well acquainted with that tribe.

In 1969, owing to his reputation for creativity and success in the marketing of tropical fruits, Mr. Perez was offered the vice presidency of Turbana Banana Corp., a Colombian company. In his first year with Turbana, Mr. Perez increased its sales to $3,000,000. During the next ten years, under his direction, sales mounted tenfold. By the time he left Turbana in 1981, annual sales had soared to $31,000,000.

Not only did Turbana Banana enjoy an extraordinary increase in sales under Mr. Perez's direction, but it also became the largest importer of plantains in the United States, from 200 boxes a week to a weekly volume of 30,000 boxes. Also during Mr. Perez's tenure, Turbana was twice the recipient of the National Economic Development Association NEDA) award for excellence in its field.

In 1982, Mr. Perez established his own company, Banana Services, Inc., specializing in importation, marketing, and shipping of tropical fruit. In this venture, he was joined by a number of long-term employees who had worked with him at Turbana. In its first sales year (1983), Banana Services achieved sales of $20,000,000, and expects to double its sales for the current year to a volume of approximately $40,000,000. Banana Services' client base stretches from Florida to Canada and from the East Coast of the U.S. to the Midwest.

While Carlos Perez has always been deeply dedicated to his family and his business, he also takes time to pursue his lifelong interests—sports and politics. In 1977, he took a United States baseball team to Medellin, Colombia for an international competition, which was recognized by both U.S. and Colombian officials as the most outstanding sports event between both countries ever held in that city.

Since 1970, Mr. Perez has supported local baseball as vice president of a businessmen's league. In 1976, he became founder and remains a director of the Olympic City of the Americas, a nonprofit organization with the sole purpose of promoting sports activities between the United States and Latin-American countries.

In the area of politics, Carlos Perez has been an active Republican since he joined the party in 1970. With the election of President Reagan in 1980, Mr. Perez was named to the National Small Business Advisory Council. In 1981, he was elected Chairman of the National Minority Committee of the Small Business Administration National Council. Most recently, in November of 1983, Mr. Perez was appointed Chairman of VIVA '84 for the State of Florida.

VIVA '84 was a national fund-raising program developed by the Republican National Committee (RBC). Florida VIVA '84 was the designated official Hispanic organization authorized to solicit funds from Hispanics on behalf of the Republican Party during the election year of 1984.

Also important among VIVA '84's activities were voter registration and political education among Hispanics to increase their knowledge of candidates and issues and thereby enable them to participate constructively in this country's political process. Florida VIVA '84, under Mr. Perez's direction, made political history by registering more than 25,000 voters in South Florida between May and October of 1984. Another record was achieved in South Florida during the same year, when over 90 percent of its Hispanic voters supported Ronald Reagan, due largely to the efforts of Florida VIVA '84.

In October 1984, President Reagan named Carlos Perez a member of the United States delegation to Algeria for that nation's celebration of its Thirtieth Anniversary Commemoration of Independence.

After the discontinuance, in February 1985, of Florida VIVA '84 as a committee of the Republican Party of Florida, Carlos Perez founded a new organization, Concerned Citizens for Democracy, Inc., and serves as its President and Chairman of the Board.

Briefly stated, CCFDI's central goal is the preservation and strengthening of democracy in the entire Western Hemisphere.

Toward its final goal, CCFDI seeks to assist in the furtherance of President Reagan's political philosophy and implementation of his administration's policies.

One of this group's earliest projects was the organization of a three-day trip, in March 1985, to Washington, D.C., with over 125 participants representing a cross section of society from Central and South America, South Florida, and other parts of the United States. In Washington, the Concerned Citizens group held discussions with members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives in the effort to gain their support of the Freedom Fighters and their cause in Nicaragua.

CCFDI is now planning additional projects for the immediate purposes of helping to fund humanitarian aid to the Nicaraguan cause for freedom, and of alerting as many citizens of our hemisphere as possible to the steady encroachment of communist totalitarianism, worldwide.

In addition to his national posts, Mr. Perez continues to hold a number of honorary positions in local Republican circles. He is also an active member of Miami's American Club, Big Five Club, and Latin-American Kiwanis Club, and served as President of the latter organization during 1977-78.

CHARLIE HALLECK

HON. JAMES T. BROYHILL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 11, 1986

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, I read with deep regret of the passing of my good friend, Charlie Halleck. Charlie and I first met back in the early 1950's. When I came to Congress in 1963, Charlie was a great help to me as a freshman Congressman. In fact, he was most helpful in my election to Congress in 1962.

During his time of leadership of the House Republicans, the Party went through some success as well as setbacks. Throughout all of these changing times, Charlie was always the same and fought hard for Republican principles.

I will never forget the courtesies he paid to me as a freshman Congressman. As one example, he invited me to give the keynote speech at the annual Republican Lincoln Day Dinner in his hometown of Rensselaer, IN. I will always remember the great hospitality of the fine people of Rensselaer. I talked to Charlie on the telephone awhile back. Though his health did not permit active participation in the political affairs of his State and Nation, in spirit he was still in there fighting the good fight in behalf of the Republican Party.

We Republicans need more Charlie Hallecks!

THE NEED FOR A UNIFORM PRODUCT LIABILITY CODE

HON. TOBY ROTH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, I will shortly be introducing legislation which would establish four reforms in our current product liability system. They are fair and they are simple. My legislation will not further complicate the already beleaguered court system. It will, however, send a clear message to the courts that this madness must end.

My bill will set a negligence standard, and only a negligence standard, for defective design and failure to warn cases. On the issue of punitive damages, the plaintiff would have to establish the defendant's recklessness by "clear and convincing" evidence. It would further sort out the rules for allocating damages between tort and workers' compensation systems. This would end the overlap that presently exists. Finally the bill would release nonmanufacturers—retailers and wholesalers—from liability, except in special circumstances where no compensation could be received from the manufacturer.

I urge my colleagues to support these reforms and I commend to their review the third in a series of articles from the Washington Post by Kathy Sawyer on "The Liability Crisis."

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 25, 1986]

THE LIABILITY CRISIS—HOW A GOOD TOWN BECAME A BAD RISK

(By Kathy Sawyer)

Welcome to Schaghticoke, N.Y., a chaste Grandma Moses landscape of snow-blown birches, farms, rivers, little commerce, orderly neighbors and no police force.

As recently as four years ago, this township (pop. 7,090) was courted ardently by a pack of insurance companies that expected to profit from her virtue. She'd never been sued. Her virtue remains intact, yet one morning last spring, town supervisor Mark Zaretzki was stunned to read in the Knickerbocker News that good little Schaghticoke's insurance was going to be canceled.

In the words of Mae West, goodness had nothing to do with it.

Schaghticoke had collided with the world of insurance underwriting, where a distinct, and hotly disputed, version of reality prevails. In this world, a computer had digested statistics about distant, scattered events and then decreed that this hamlet in New York's Upper Hudson region suddenly—without making any mistakes, causing any harm or costing anybody money—had become a minefield of dangers: a bad risk.

Her insurer, Utica Mutual, headquartered about 100 miles to the west of Schaghticoke near Utica, N.Y., announced last April that, by next August, it will have withdrawn from all municipal liability coverage. The decision applies to 229 townships and villages in New York state and 83 in 13 other states. Utica's president says he knew it would create "chaos."

The "chaos" is not limited to towns and villages. Truckers, baby doctors, chimney sweeps, liquor dealers, bartenders, child care centers, churches, abortion clinics, schools, ski lift operators, bus companies, pest exterminators, trade associations, Girl Scouts and governments around the country are canceling activities, raising prices or taxes, or going out of business—all because of the difficulty of getting insurance to protect them in case of lawsuits.

Some who have never filed a claim now face rate hikes of 1,000 percent or more. Others can't get insurance coverage and are either doing without it or scrambling for some sort of self-insurance or pooling arrangement.

"We went into a panic," town supervisor Zaretzki recalled. Paying a whopping premium increase for the one, possibly temporary, new insurer they could find has already cost Schaghticoke taxpayers most of a planned tax cut. Their schools, fire and rescue services are also experiencing massive insurance rate hikes. And Zaretzki and the town board still face the possibility that they might have to join the growing ranks of the naked cities with no insurance.

In the nearby state capitol at Albany, soon after he got the news, Zaretzki angrily confronted one of Utica's top executives, who was trying to explain his company's action at a hearing of the legislature.

"I wouldn't repeat some of the language I used," Zaretzki said. "But I was outraged . . . . I asked him how they could cut off such a good town, one that they made money on . . . . The gentleman was unable to explain in any rational way."

APPORTIONING SOCIAL COSTS

Trial lawyers and other critics charge that the liability crisis that has hit Schaghticoke and the rest of the country is a consipiracy to gouge the public, an illusion cooked up by the wizards of odds in the insurance industry to stampede legislators into changing laws to its benefit. The industry responds with charges of greed by fee-hungry trial lawyers.

But at bottom, the debate is about how best to apportion, or broker, the social costs of misfortune.

Although insurance companies vary widely in size and situation, the reasons offered by the executives at Utica to explain their rejection of municipal liability reflect broader concerns in the industry. By way of another attempt to answer the outraged Zaretzkis of the world, the company's top executives retraced for The Washington Post the process they say led to their controversial decision.

Utica Mutual is part of the Utica National Insurance Group, a middle-sized company, founded in 1914, which provides a mix of commercial and personal insurance and related services. Major policies are set by no more than a handful of senior executives.

They have much in common with town supervisor Zaretzki. Like him, they are educated, middle class, active community affairs. Jack B. Riffle, the company's chairman of the board, president and chief executive officer, is on the Boy Scouts of America's National Executive Board, has earned the Silver Beaver and Silver Antelope Awards for his leadership.

Zaretzki lives with his wife and son in a rambling, 150-year-old farmhouse that used to be a stagecoach stop. He commutes to his full-time job in Albany but figures he spends a minimum of 20 hours a week on his $7,300 per year supervisor's job.

In their computer printouts, Utica officals said, Schaghticoke and every other town and village, regardless of their histories, presented equal possibilities of death, paraplegia, discrimination, official brutality and other eventualities. What concerns them most, they said, is that in the new legal scheme of things, one of these occurrences can deliver any town into the clutches of a volatile creature known as a jury—whether or not the town has been negligent or wrong in some way.

The civil justice system "was designed primarily to hold wrongdoers responsible for wrongdoing, not to compensate victims," said Utica's Riffle. "Now we're using the court system to redistribute wealth."

The decision that panicked Schaghticoke was born in a climate of distress for the property and casualty side of the industry (as distinct from the other major segment—life and health). Every year since 1979, industry analysts say, it has lost its shirt selling insurance, and 1985 was its worst ever.

The losses also spooked the companies (most are foreign-owned) that insure the insurance companies. These so-called reinsurers, such as Lloyd's of London, had joined the orgy of bargain-rate competition and took a worse shellacking than the primary insurance companies.

Where the industry was doing well was not in providing insurance, but in its investments of the tens of billions of dollars in premiums it collected from policyholders.

More than six years of high interest rates produced very high yields on those investments. Company executives guessed (wrongly, as it turned out) that they could lower their premiums drastically, the better to compete, and make up the difference when they invested the premiums.

In short, an insurance price war occurred, driven by the high yields on investments.

"If one overestimates his investment, he will underprice his product. We all did that," said Utica's Riffle.

For a time, Schaghticoke was a beneficiary of that competition.

UTICA WAS LOW BIDDER

Town supervisor Zaretzki, who is a specialist in budget and administration for the speaker of the state assembly, had appealed to the heavily Republican citizenry with promises of fiscal conservatism to become, in 1982, the first Democrat elected to the office in 40 years.

He thought his Republican predecessors had been paying too much for insurance, so he put it out for bid. Utica was the low bidder, at $10,010 a year, or less than half what the town had been paying, Zaretzki won praise in the local press for this coup.

For Utica, the momentum of competition still outweighed the emerging negatives associated with municipal liability coverage.

In Riffle's words, "It was kind of a little market niche we'd established for ourselves." A number of Utica executives, including the chief underwriter, were reluctant to abandon it. This produced what Riffle called "a very heated debate at the top levels of this company."

Utica was hearing the reports circulating in the industry about rising court judgments and settlements against municipalities. And like most property-casualty insurers, Utica was seeing the actuarial, or statistical, information on national insurance trends—collected, analyzed and circulated by a nonprofit organization called the Insurance Services Office (ISO), which helps insurers decide how much to charge.

One recent judgment in particular had a shattering impact on insurers. A $15.5 million court judgment against Jackson Township, N.J., required its insurer, Hartford Accident and Indemnity, to pay damages for years of contamination of town wells by chemicals from a landfill. Hartford's policy had specifically excluded pollution coverage, except for "sudden and accidental" incidents. But the court interpreted those terms as applicable to slow years of seepage. (A portion of the verdict was reversed on appeal, leaving a $7.4 million award standing.)

Among other things, the case illustrated to insurers their inability to protect themselves even with the most painstaking contractual language against the whims of court interpretations, many said.

As for Utica's policyholders, officials said the problems came into view a little at a time, on pieces of paper called "serious claims forms," which are circulated to all the top executives.

In November 1983, for instance, there was a report on a single-car accident on a rural road in the town of New Windsor, 100 miles south of Schaghticoke.

"Remarks: Town employes repaved a town road covering repaved section with gravel. Accident occurred on repaved section at intersection with county road. Plaintiff (18) allegedly lost control because of gravel, resulting in one-car accident. Quadriplegia resulted . . . He was in top 10 percent of high school class and member of honor society. Makes a good appearance and attends college . . . Settled before trial for $950,000. Our share $650,000, county share $300,000."

That was one of two single-car accidents on the same stretch of road in less than two years. The other involved a motorcycle rider who lost the use of his legs. The allegations were the same.

The New Windsor cases cost Utica more than $1 million.

"Those two cases brought our undivided attention to municipal liability," said Joseph L. Kronen, senior vice president for claims.

Utica executives said they began to notice a change in the overall pattern of such claims, in their "complexion and success" and in their numbers.

Said Riffle, a tall, personable man, "It seems to me that every time there is a serious auto accident in the state, particularly when the 'at fault' driver has low limits [on his insurance coverage], the government responsible for maintaining the street, road or highway gets sued: for too much salt, or not enough salt; for too few signs, or too many signs; for signs too high, or signs too low. Or something."

The increasing uncertainty of an outcome in court, said Riffle, often leads the company to settle, rather than fight and risk a much higher cost at a jury's hands.

In 1980, Utica policyholders nationwide (in all types of insurance, not just municipal) were attracting 196 new lawsuits a month, officials said. Last year, as of October, 278 new suits a month on average were being filed.

Two years ago, the Utica executive vice president for underwriting, who had championed municipal coverage, retired. His successor, Wallace Watkins, recalled that he promptly asked for a breakout on how Utica was doing with that line of coverage. After several months, officials said they found that in municipal coverage, for at least two years, Utica had been paying out two dollars for every premium dollar it took in.

It was at this point, said Richard J. Beidleman, a vice president for underwriting, that he changed his mind and joined those who wanted to stop insuring towns.

Underwriters such as Watkins and Beidleman are the oddsmakers of the insurance business. They "select" which risks to bet on, or cover, and they make recommendations about how much the bet is worth. They operate on a basic principle of insurance: the law of averages, or as their boss Riffle prefers to call it, the law of large numbers. "The law of large numbers is what distinguishes insurance from gambling," said Beidleman. Without it, Riffle said, "Take your money to the track."

Simply put, the law states that events occur with predictable regularity, and the more times an event happens, the more closely the results will approach the predicted outcome.

OPERATING LOSS REPORTED

Officials at Utica and elsewhere state flatly that they are a for-profit business, not a quasi-social service bureau. In its 1984 annual report, Utica reported a net operating loss of more than $13 million. Its net worth was nearly $103 million, but that fell short of the ratio of $1 for every $3 in premiums sold that is widely accepted as a safe standard for a reserve fund to pay off possible claims.

There came a time, late in 1984 by some estimates, when the industry collectively began to slap itself out of its binge and try to return to first principles. Their investments were, and are, still making money, but no longer enough to overcome massive losses on the insurance underwriting side, analysts say. Some industry officials say their critics are right when they charge that premiums are being raised more than necessary just to cover claims. Insurers are also building back their depleted reserves and working capital.

At Utica, Riffle recalled, there came a day when his underwriting, marketing, claims and other senior executives recommended the drastic measure of withdrawing—gradually, they emphasize—from an entire market. "They came to me and said, 'Well, there could be some political fallout.' I said, 'Do what you gotta do. . . .'"

But he added, "Give me a choice between chaos and insolvency and I'll take a little chaos. And it (our decision) is creating chaos. We've got a lot of people mad at us."

The state superintendent of insurance, whose office regulates Utica and other New York-based companies, and some state legislators are among those made at Utica and other insurers.

"We didnt like it, but it was the company's right to do it," said Kevin Foley, a spokesman for the state insurance superintendent's office.

Dick Lownes, an independent insurance agent in Schaghticoke who had followed in his father's footsteps in selling policies, including Utica's, to area towns and villages is another who is upset.

"Schaghticoke had next to nothing as far as claims experience. Fender bumps, a stone that fell off a truck and busted a windshield. That kind of thing. And they've bent over backwards on their town dump. It's the only one in the county that meets state guidelines," Lownes said.

Across the street from Lownes, the Hoosick Valley Central School District elementary and high schools that serve the area, formerly insured by Utica under a separate policy, are facing a 400 percent increase in premiums for one-fifth the amount of coverage, according to Superintendent Joe Colistra. The volunteer fire and rescue squads are also facing large increases and have asked the township of Schaghticoke for extra financial help.

One recent snow-covered day in Schaghticoke (an Indian name meaning "warriors of the mingling waters"), Zaretzki inventoried the situation, at the home of town bookkeeper Nancy Harder, who keeps the city records in her son's bedroom under a Hulk Hogan poster.

GETTING LESS FOR MORE

After Utica withdrew, the only new insurance policy the town could get increased the premium by 400 percent, to $48,000 a year, for one-third the amount of coverage.

The total town budget for 1986 is $800,000, of which $246,000 comes from local taxes (the lowest in the county) and the rest from state and other sources. Its citizens were looking forward to a 35 percent tax cut, Zaretzki said. Instead, the cut was only 10 percent.

Meanwhile, he said, "We're trying to govern defensively." The 15-square-mile township, whose roads follow paths used by horse-drawn carriages and Indian hunters centuries ago, has increased spending by $16,000 for road repairs and maintenance, with another $300 spent on a device to measure the distance of signs for intersections. "A road gets fixed or it gets closed."

The closing of one road has cut off irate property owner Gwendolyn Fox from her farm, she complains. But the township can't afford the $3 million it would cost for repairs and "the board has decided our possible liability exposure is so high we can't take chances."

As for the new insurance policy, it can be canceled on 30 days notice, Zaretzki said. "We don't know what the situation will be next year . . . We could literally be talking about a 300 percent increase in taxes if we had to cover a major court award."

THE TAIWAN INDEPENDENCE MOVEMENT: JUST ANOTHER GROUP OF TERRORISTS

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues an important study that has just been prepared by the U.S. Committee on Asia/Pacific Peace and Stability. This study provides ample documentary and historical evidence that the so-called Taiwan Independence Movement is in reality a terrorist organization working in collusion with the People's Republic of China toward the overthrow of the Government of the Republic of China on Taiwan.

At this point in the RECORD, I would like to insert the foreword written for this important study. Written by Col. Charles R. Eisenhart, this foreword summarizes the contents of the study. I would be happy to provide any Member with a copy of this complete study and other information about the Taiwan Independence Movement and its involvement in international terrorism.

FOREWORD

The rising tide of vicious and horrifying terrorism in our world today should engender in the mind of every person an increased abhorrence of the mindless atrocities committed by those inhuman killers who appear to have lost any sense of justice or conscience. We all live in constant danger from those monstrous terrorists. Steps to counter this violence are urgently needed in spite of all the difficulties of identifying and punishing the perpetrators. There is no aim or program which can justify terrorism. Secretary Shultz, speaking last month in Belgrade, said bluntly that such an act "is not justified by any cause. . ." In May of 1981 the Department of Justice of the State of California issued a document deal with "International Terrorism." Its first example was the "Taiwanese Extremists. . . (often referred to as the Taiwan Independence Movement). . ." The document listed five bombings by this group, one of which resulted in a fatality. Other atrocities have been committed by this same group since then.

Drs. Gregor and Chang last year described the make-up of this gang which is aimed at the destruction of the government of the Republic of China on Taiwan. The publication which follows gives documentary proof that the Taiwan Independence Movement is simply another terrorist organization. It has no moral justification and should elicit no tolerance.

Faced with the facts of the astonishing success of the current Taiwan government which has brought tremendous advances in the welfare of its populace, the TIM has been able to recruit only very few. In desperation, TIM has turned to terrorism—both in Taiwan and in other parts of the world including the U.S.A. Their own documents quoted by Gregor and Chang herein show their dedication to mindless atrocities. While their efforts to gain any sizeable group of adherents and are not likely to do so in the future, terrorism is never susceptible to rational—or even humane—considerations. Not only the government on Taiwan but rational people throughout the world must be alert to their threat to lives and property from this vicious group. It is also crystal clear in these documents that TIM aims at the imposition of a Marxists-Communists regime on the prospering people of Taiwan, with a consequent reduction in American peace and security.

US—Capps supports peace and stability in the Asia-Pacific area. With terrorism knowing no boundaries—either geographical or moral—the Taiwan Independence Movement, incontrovertably a terrorist organization, poses a threat to all people throughout our world. This publication should be read and digested by everyone who values life and freedom.

HAMDEN—200 YEARS PROUD

HON. BRUCE A. MORRISON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, 1986 marks the bicentennial of the founding of the town of Hamden in Connecticut's Third Congressional District. In honor of this occasion, the town will hold a bicentennial ball on March 15, kicking off a 7-month-long birthday celebration. The theme of this celebration will be Hamden's rich history and promising future.

Incorporated on May 11, 1786 after a friendly secession from neighboring New Haven, Hamden has earned itself a distinguished history. As a resident of Hamden, I take special pride in recognizing the many important contributions and accomplishments of my community.

From the town's beginning, the citizens of Hamden have shown a constant dedication to the principles of freedom. Hamden residents have fought bravely to defend the United States and have distinguished themselves in every conflict from the time of the Revolution. It was a Hamdenite, Captain Oberlin, who led the famous rescue in World War I of the lost American detachment in Belleau Wood.

Hamden is also known for its contributions to the Industrial Revolution. It has even been said that the Revolution began in the town of Hamden—Eli Whitney used his Hamden gun factory to pioneer the concept of interchangeable mechanical parts which became the foundation of modern industrial technology. Since that time, several other significant industrial advances have occurred in Hamden. The process of vulcanization was first used commercially in Hamden by its inventor Charles Goodyear. In 1880, Eli Whitney's nephew, E.W. Blake, developed the stone crusher which vastly improved road paving methods; Whalley Avenue was the first street to benefit from the invention.

The citizens of Hamden are fortunate to have as the chairman of the bicentennial, Lucien DiMeo, former mayor, accomplished local historian and honored citizen of Hamden. The generous support of Donald Calcagnini, president of the American National Bank, has also helped to make this celebration a reality.

Mr. Speaker, the theme of the bicentennial ball is "Two Hundred Years Proud" and I am very proud to represent Hamden. The dedication of time and energy by many Hamden citizens has played an important role in furthering the town's celebration of its rich heritage and exciting future. I know that my colleagues join me in wishing the people of Hamden well as they celebrate a joyous 200th birthday.

HEALTH CARE CHALLENGES

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise to commend Michael Hudson of the Children's Defense Fund in Texas and Maria Kain of the March of Dimes for the maternal and child health leadership conferences they have sponsored throughout the State of Texas. Through their efforts, they have brought together health-care providers and all levels of government to provide a better understanding of how to address the unique health care needs that exist along the southern border region. More specifically, they have focused their efforts on promoting better health for those who are the most vulnerable—mothers and children.

There is a deepening crisis in health care access and delivery along the United States-Mexico border. There is no region in the country that experiences the multiplicity of adverse factors that create unique health-care problems and inaccessibility to health-care delivery that afflicts this region. In my district alone, over 163,000 people, a majority of them women and children, living in medically underserved areas. Our region's unique international and geographic location creates additional health care challenges that most other parts of the nation do not experience.

With the demand on our local resources increasing every year while revenues are diminishing due to dramatic Federal funding cutbacks, local and Federal efforts to confront these problems have been crippled. Yet, in spite of these obstacles, the Children's Defense Fund and the March of Dimes have coordinated a public education effort and training projects that includes utilizing the limited funds available to provide health care services to the poor more efficiently and cost effectively without compromising the quality of that care.

Their dedication and commitment has generated the building of a state-wide network of informed advocates who are working together to improve the health-care status of mothers and their children.

TRIBUTE TO HENRY J. FRIENDLY

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to Henry J. Friendly, a U.S. Court of Appeals judge in New York for 27 years and also a resident of my district, who died recently. Judge Friendly had a national reputation for crafting scholarly, well-written legal opinions, and he has also been called one of the greatest Federal judges in the history of the Federal bench. His practical, well-written opinions are still cited today.

I had the privilege of working under Judge Friendly in the late 1950's when he was a senior partner and I was an associate of the Cleary, Gottlieb, Friendly & Hamilton law firm.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleagues in the House join me in honoring Judge Friendly for his many years of dedicated public service. He will be greatly missed.

BASKETBALL CHAMPIONSHIP GAME

HON. GEORGE (BUDDY) DARDEN

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Speaker, the class AAAA Georgia State high school basketball championship game this year was an all-Cobb County final, bringing together the outstanding teams of Wills High School and Sprayberry High School. I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the achievements of these two groups of outstanding young men from the Seventh District of Georgia.

To borrow a line from the Marietta Daily Journal's description of the thrilling encounter on March 8: It is too bad the game could not end in a tie.

The Wills Tigers stormed back from a 64 to 56 deficit in the final 2 minutes to take a 68 to 66 victory over the Sprayberry Yellow Jackets. Wills guard Dale McCullough—the smallest player on the court—scored the winning basket with only 3 seconds left on the clock.

Wills finished the season with a 29 to 3 record, while Sprayberry won 27 and lost 5.

And, although Wills took the State AAAA title, Sprayberry can be proud of its designation as "Team of the Year" by the Cobb Tip Off Club, and the naming of coach Ken Clouse as coach of the year by that same organization.

Mr. Speaker, I hope my colleagues will join me in congratulating Wills Tigers Coach Charlie Neal and his players; Dale McCullough, Jackie Joyner, Bo McQueen, Keith Chandler, Scott Morgan, Todd Penland, Brian Oliver, Mark Palmer, Tim Mitchell, Scott Bailey, Mike Creech, Terrel Thomas, and Luther Smith.

I ask my colleagues to also join me in commending Sprayberry Coach Ken Clouse and his players; Cecil Blount, Rai Faircloth, Jeff Wallsinger, James Robinson, Terry Kemp, Spence Travis, Steve Grant, Mike Ellis, Brad Hine, David Bullard, Tod Miller, Mark Fitch, Mark Lucas, and Rob Cothran

H.R. 864

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to speak in support of H.R. 864 and to submit a resolution passed by the Ohio Legislature on this subject.

As a cosponsor of H.R. 864, I believe we must do all we can to improve veterans' benefits for former prisoners of war. My Ohio colleague, Representative DOUG APPLEGATE should be highly commended for introducing this legislation.

Specifically, this bill would broaden the benefits available to former POW's suffering from diseases or other disorders as a result of their wartime imprisonment. These individuals have made great sacrifices for their country and should never be forgotten. This legislation addresses some of their specific needs and provides them with relief.

Mr. Michael Medzie, a leading proponent of this legislation from my congressional district has recently shared with me a copy of a resolution passed by the Ohio General Assembly endorsing this legislation. At this point, I would like to submit the text of this resolution for the RECORD. The resolution is as follows:

Whereas, title 38 of the United States Code provides specific benefits for our nation's former prisoners of war, who suffered greatly from dietary deficiencies, forced labor, and other inhumane treatment by enemies of the United States; and

Whereas, a recent evaluation of Veterans Administration statistical data, however, reveals that current laws are lamentably inadequate with respect to longtime health problems of former POWs; and

Whereas, House Resolution 864, now pending in the 99th Congress, was introduced to further amend Title 38, thereby broadening the benefits available to former POWs suffering from long-lasting illnesses, disorders, or conditions resulting from their wartime incarceration; and

Whereas, Our country's POWs must never be neglected or forgotten; they are valiant Americans, one and all, who sacrificed on our behalf and in defense of our freedom: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the 116th General Assembly of Ohio in adopting this Resolution, express our belief that Congress should broaden benefits for former prisoners of war by adopting House Resolution 864; and be it further

Resolved, That the Legislative Clerk of the House of Representatives transmit duly authenticated copies of this Resolution to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the President of the United States Senate, and each member of Ohio's Congressional delegation.

I urge my colleagues to give their support to H.R. 864.

VOTE ON PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to voice my strong opposition to the President's proposed budget for fiscal year 1987.

Today, I voted against this budget. I did so, because I think it's a bad deal for taxpayers and a bad deal for Maryland.

I've talked to mayors about this budget, I've talked to students, I've talked to senior citizens, and I've talked to commuters. I got the same message from each and every group: "Vote 'No' on the President's budget."

I've been told by everybody from the Mayor of Baltimore to the county commissioners from Somerset County that the worst thing this budget does is eliminate all revenue-sharing funds—about $22 million for Baltimore alone. That means this budget cuts out funds communities need to help pay for police and fire protection, as well as other needed community services.

Second, this budget cuts out all funding for the Small Business Administration—a Federal Program that works with the private sector in generating new economic growth and new jobs.

For senior citizens, this budget is a real blow. It hurts our Medicare and Medicaid Programs by squeezing services and increasing premiums. Under Medicare alone, the monthly premium would go up from $15.50 a month to $36 a month, in a 5-year period. That's an increase of over 100 percent, and that's unacceptable.

For Medicare patients, the President's budget would allow fewer dollars, thereby reducing the amount of Medicaid available for nursing home care.

Finally, for commuters in our State, this budget is a real "flat tire." It drastically reduces the amount of money spent on our highways and subways. Under this budget, the green Metro line will go unfinished, and our already overcrowded highways will not just be clogged; they'll be gridlocked.

People in Maryland need a chance to get to work—on roads that work. Government has a responsibility to keep our trains running and keep our highways in good repair. This budget does neither.

Mr. Speaker, I agree that we must balance our budget. We must reduce Federal spending. I know that the Democratic party is working on a budget of our own. I hope that budget will allow us to meet our social responsibility and our fiscal responsibility.

I want us to generate new revenues responsibility. Government shouldn't be involved in—like Conrail. And, I'm working to do that.

I want us to collect what we're due—that means bringing in unpaid taxes.

I think we should eliminate unneeded and unhelpful programs. Getting rid of all the Government's paid advisory boards is a good place to start.

The people I represent work hard for their money. As the ad says, "they work an honest day and they want an honest deal."

They don't mind paying their fair share of the cost of Government, but they want a dollar's worth of services for a dollar's worth of taxes.

They want public investments that generate private-sector jobs. They want their Government to be in touch with them and to be responsive to their needs.

This budget is not in touch; it is not responsive to the needs of our people; and, that's why I voted against it.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. LARRY E. CRAIG

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, today I voted against House Joint Resolution 534, the $5 billion supplemental for the Commodity Credit Corporation [CCC], for a very important reason.

Although I support CCC supplemental appropriations, I could not support a $919 million appropriation that the Appropriations Subcommittee threw into the bill for the Farmers Home Administration [FmHA] only hours after the President had authorized transfer of moneys through the FmHA for farm operating loans.

This action by the Appropriations Subcommittee is in direct violation of the House Agriculture Committee's budget and is a grave distortion of the legislative process. This action destroys the integrity of the proper committee's and their authority over their respective subcommittee areas.

GEORGIA O'KEEFFE

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, last week we lost one of America's greatest artists. Georgia O'Keeffe, who died at the age of 98 in Santa Fe, NM, has been called one of the most intensely spiritual painters of her age. She developed a personal, refined style, inherently favoring abstract subject matter, yet capturing even the smallest detail of her beloved Southwest in magnificent splendor.

From the start, O'Keeffe's integrity, attention to detail, and contempt for shifting art world styles were apparent. What is most unique about her art is its mutilation of scale—with much meaning and color, she was able to make the smallest detail evoke the infinite. Her work reflected the glory of the Southwest, often depicting dry bones, desert flowers, and breathtaking landscapes. "That was my country," she explained. "Terrible winds and a wonderful emptiness."

Many of her paintings are dramatic, sharp-focused enlargements of botanical details. These images glorifying life and energy are among her most optimistic and successful. Other paintings reflect America's folk architecture, where she found tranquility and stability, so sharply contrasted with the distraught urban environment she found so disturbing.

The exhibit, "Art in New Mexico, 1900–1945: Paths to Taos and Santa Fe," currently on view at the Smithsonian Institution's National Museum of American Art, contains a number of Georgia O'Keeffe's works and is a fitting tribute to this outstanding American artist.

The paintings she left inspire quiet meditation, a sense of timelessness and peace. The legacy of Georgia O'Keeffe has become a true American contribution to civilization's greatest artistic creations.

THE FORGOTTEN AMERICANS: OUR HOSTAGES IN LEBANON

HON. DAVID R. OBEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Speaker, 2 years ago next Tuesday, on March 18, 1984, William Buckley was seized by kidnapers in Lebanon. Since that time, 5 other Americans have been abducted in Lebanon who are still being held.

When 62 Americans at the American Embassy in Iran were taken hostage more than 6 years ago, the Nation and the U.S. Government didn't once forget during their 1 year and 2 months of captivity the fact that our fellow citizens were being held under terrible circumstances.

I frankly do not understand why there is not a similar concern expressed nationally about today's forgotten hostages who have been languishing for so long somewhere in Lebanon.

We must not forget these 6 new American hostages: William Buckley, Lawrence Jenco, Peter Kilburn, Terry Anderson, David Jacobsen, and Thomas Sutherland.

We need to do everything we can to remind the American public and the international community of this outrageous deprivation of liberty of innocent people and our Government must do a much better job than it has so far to obtain their release.

These 6 Americans deserve to be free.

H.R. 4350, THE OMNIBUS WILD AND SCENIC RIVER BILL

HON. SAM GEJDENSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of H.R. 4350, the omnibus wild and scenic river bill. The bill makes some extremely important additions to the Federal Wild and Scenic River System and I applaud National Parks Subcommittee Chairman BRUCE VENTO for his fine work on this bill. I am proud to be an original cosponsor of H.R. 4350.

Of particular interest to me is the provision of the bill which authorizes a wild and scenic study of the West Branch of the Farmington River in Connecticut. The Farmington River is a rare resource in our crowded State. It is a beautiful river which provides thousands of people with recreational opportunities. I strongly support the inclusion of a wild and scenic study of the Farmington in H.R. 4350. A wild and scenic study is an important step toward protecting the Farmington from degradation in the future.

I congratulate Congresswoman JOHNSON and Congresswoman KENNELLY for the crucial roles they have played in the passage of this legislation. Congresswoman JOHNSON introduced H.R. 2191, the original legislation to authorize a wild and scenic study of the Farmington. She has been a strong and enthusiastic advocate of H.R. 2191 and her efforts on behalf of the Farmington River are to be commended.

Congresswoman KENNELLY is also to be commended for the contribution she has made to Farmington wild and scenic legislation. Many of her constituents were concerned that a wild and scenic study of the Farmington could lead to a shortage of water in the Hartford area if the area experienced a severe drought. Because of her efforts improvements have been made in the legislation which ensure that the drinking water needs of her constituents will be met if a severe water shortage ever occurs.

Again, I want to congratulate everyone who has worked on H.R. 4350. Their efforts will lead to the preservation of some of the most beautiful rivers in America.

OIL IMPORT FEE IS UNWISE

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, the possibility of an oil import fee has been receiving considerable attention in recent weeks. The Energy and Commerce Subcommittees on Fossil and Synthetic Fuels, and Energy Conservation and Power, held a joint hearing on March 13, 1986, to examine the energy implications of an oil import fee.

While the domestic oil and gas industry is understandably strained at present because of the sudden drop in oil prices, I am convinced that upon a full reflection of the many facets of this issue that the House will conclude that an oil import fee is most unwise.

Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to insert my opening statement from the hearing at this point in the RECORD:

JOINT ENERGY SUBCOMMITTEE HEARING ON OIL IMPORT FEES

Just a few years ago, crude oil prices were at $34 per barrel. Certain people in this room were predicting that President Reagan's decontrol of oil, in January 1981, would jack up the price of Texas oil to $50 per barrel by the spring of 1981. Oil was supposed to be $75 to $100 per barrel by now, with retail prices for gasoline, home heating oil, and other petroleum products going up with the price of crude.

What happened? The laws of supply and demand worked. In response to higher prices, the amount of energy consumed per unit of gross national product has fallen by one-third since 1973. Meanwhile, oil production from non-OPEC, non-Communist sources climbed from 17.4 million barrels a day in 1973 to 26.2 million barrels a day last August. OPEC production, by contrast, shrank from 31.3 million barrels a day in 1973 to 15.7 million barrels a day last August.

Last fall, Saudi Arabia threw in the towel at trying to reduce production enough to prop up prices. It boosted its production from 2 million barrels per day to almost 5 million barrels per day in January. Largely as a result of this surge in production, oil prices have fallen nearly 60 percent since late November.

Lower oil prices are good news for consumers and the economy because they mean lower inflation and more economic growth. At least one econometric forecasting firm projects that a $5 drop in oil prices, an amount that appears conservative now, will boost the gross national product by one-half of one percent and produce an inflation rate almost a full percentage point less than would otherwise occur. This frees up resources for investment in other domestic enterprises.

Those advocating a $5 per barrel import fee attempt to paint it as a painless way to raise revenue. However, such a fee would not only raise imported oil prices by $5 per barrel, it would also permit domestic oil prices and all domestic energy prices to rise to this artificially higher level. The higher inflation rate generated by these price increases would boost spending for Government entitlement programs and raise interest rates. In addition, every 1 percentage point reduction in economic growth reduces Federal revenues by $15.6 billion per year, according to the President's Council of Economic Advisers.

Aside from those hungry for more Federal revenue, advocates of an import fee include those who fear that lower oil prices will push energy consumption to dangerous levels while shutting in much domestic production. Hence, they see an oil import fee as a necessary energy policy measure.

This argument also falls upon closer scrutiny. There might be a modest increase in consumption from lower prices as consumers switch from other fuels to oil, but it is very unlikely that the major gains over the past decade in energy efficiency will be lost. Consumers are not going to rip out their home insulation or the better windows and other energy-saving measures they have taken over many years. The same holds true for industry and small business. The automobile, which accounts for about 40 percent of our oil consumption, is a case in point. While consumers are shifting toward larger cars, the Ford Crown Victoria, a full size 1985 model, at 21 miles per gallon is at the low end of fuel economy ratings today. However, this is the same mileage rate as the 1975 Ford Pinto, which at the time was Ford's most fuel efficient car.

The common thread running through all the arguments for oil import fees, is that oil prices are too low. Clearly, the sudden drop in prices has placed great stress on the domestic energy industry, but the fact of the matter is, the same benevolent bureaucracy that can raise oil prices to artificially higher levels can also hold the price artificially low, as it did in the 1970's with price and allocation controls.

Rather than recreating this bureaucracy, the better course of action is to ride out this turn of events and reap the aggregate benefits for the economy. Although it appears that lower prices are here to stay, no one can predict just what those prices will be or how long they will be with us. We should take advantage of OPEC's blunders and do those things that will enhance the domestic energy industry's ability to survive and prosper without penalizing the rest of the economy. We should: (1) decontrol all natural gas; (2) repeal demand constraints such as the fuel use act; and (3) allow responsible oil and gas development both offshore and onshore.

Thank you Mr. Chairman.

THE SINATRAS RECEIVE HUMANITARIAN AWARD

HON. ALFRED A. (AL) McCANDLESS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker, on March 27, 1986, Frank and Barbara Sinatra will jointly receive the 1985 Coachella Valley Humanitarian Award during a ceremony in Rancho Mirage, CA. The Sinatras are residents there, and I have the honor of representing the community in the Congress.

That the Sinatras were the unanimous choice of the nine-member Humanitarian Award Board is no surprise, since both Barbara and Frank have long been involved in helping people in the Coachella Valley and beyond.

The charitable organizations which have benefited from the Sinatras' time and generosity are almost too numerous to list, and knowing their penchant for privacy, I would venture to guess that many who have been helped by them are anonymous. Since I also reside in the Coachella Valley, however, I do know that the Sinatras' concern for the sick and underprivileged has been evidenced at the Red Cross, the Desert Hospital in Palm Springs, at the Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center, and at the Multiple Sclerosis Society. Two years ago, Barbara Sinatra was named Woman of the Year by Childhelp, USA; next year, her Barbara Sinatra Children's Center at the Eisenhower Medical Center will open; and she is currently vice president of the World Mercy Fund. She has also found the time to chair the Barbara Sinatra Celebrity Art Auction, which benefits children who have suffered from sexual abuse.

Children in need are obviously a special concern for both Sinatras. Frank received the Medal of Honor for Science and Art from the Austrian Government, after he gave a concert to benefit handicapped children, and he has long been a supporter of the New York Police Athletic Organization, which sponsors many youth programs.

Recently, Frank received the Presidential Medal of Freedom, our Nation's highest civilian award.

There is an old adage that goes something like, "When you want something done right, ask the most busy person you know to do it." A lot of people have asked this remarkable couple for help, but more often, they have volunteered before the request was even made. The Coachella Valley is an even better place to live because of the efforts of Barbara and Frank Sinatra, both of whom have lived in the valley for almost three decades. In fact, when Frank came out of retirement some years ago, valley residents were bemused by the phrase, "Ol' Blue Eyes Is Back." We knew, and were glad, that he and Barbara had never left!

NUCLEAR REGULATORY REFORM

HON. JOHN McCAIN

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to recognize the licensing of the Perry 1 plant in the State of Ohio. For the first time in history, our Nation's fleet of commercial nuclear plants numbers 100 strong. Nuclear power's contribution, considered in isolation, is truly impressive, but I think its real importance can be found in the role it plays in our Nation's overall energy strategy.

We survived a decade of economic shock following the oil embargo of 1973 by aggressively developing alternatives to foreign oil. To accomplish this, we wisely looked to our most abundant native resources—coal and uranium. The Nation's utilities were able to reduce their use of oil by 60 percent, for the most part, by increasing their use of nuclear power by about 300 percent.

We have won a temporary victory over OPEC, but we are in danger of being lulled into complacency. We have stopped ordering nuclear plants to meet future electricity needs, not because they are unnecessary, but, in large part, because we have lost control of the process we created to license and regulate them.

I believe it is vitally important that Congress act now on licensing reform and plant design standardization legislation so that we may regain control of this process. While we have some breathing room, we should press ahead with our efforts to renew the future of this energy option. As the Nation's 100th nuclear powerplant begins operation, we should remember our national goal of permanently reducing our dependence on foreign oil and the importance of nuclear power in achieving this goal.

HONORING IRISH WOMAN AND MAN OF THE YEAR OF THE ANCIENT ORDER OF HIBERIANS

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, for over 100 years, the Ancient Order of Hiberians has represented the interest of the Irish here in this country. A.O.H. has been, and continues to be, an outspoken force for peace in Northern Ireland.

I am honored to inform the Members of the Congress that on Monday, St. Patrick's Day, Mary Rita McNicholas Carney and Charles V. Byrne have been given the distinct honor of being elected Irish Woman and Irish Man for 1986.

Mary Rita McNicholas Carney is our Irish Woman of the Year. She is the daughter of Ruth Loftus and John V. McNicholas, Jr. After attending St. Ann's School and Church, Mary Rita graduated from Ursuline High School and attended Mt. Mercy College and Youngstown State University. Her profession in education started as a third grade teacher at her parish school. Presently, she is employed by the Boardman Local District as an extended-day kindergarten teacher at West Boulevard School. In addition to her school responsibilities, Mary Rita serves as Secretary/Treasurer to the family business, Carney-McNicholas, Inc., agents for United Van Lines.

As a successful businesswoman, Mary Rita was appointed by Governor Richard Celeste to serve as State chairperson for the Ohio Job Training Partnership Coordinating Council serving from February 1984, to June 1985. In her spare time, Mary Rita's community activities include serving on YWCA Board of Trustees, vice president of the League of Women Voters, the Irish Heritage Society, AOH Auxiliary, and most recently she served as cochair with her husband, Tom, for the Hug-A-Thon, a fundraising project to aid the Battered Person's Crisis Center.

Mary Rita and her husband, Tom, have three children; T.J., Greg, and Molly. They have four grandchildren; John, Ben, Tim, and Caitlin that will keep the Irish heritage, culture, and tradition alive for future generations.

Our Irish Man of the Year for 1986, Charles V. Byrne is celebrating his golden anniversary as a hiberian. Since joining the Ancient Order of Hiberians in 1936, he has held every office in the division, served as county president, State chairman of Catholic Action and State treasurer. He is currently serving as treasurer for division No. 6.

His is a life member of the Ancient Order of Hiberians. Charles represented his division as delegate to seven State conventions and three national conventions, as well as a member of the Irish National Caucus. As a past Grand Knight of the Knights of Columbus Council No. 274, Charles is currently serving as treasurer and serves as chairman of the 1985 charities campaign. In addition his community service includes 5 years as chairman of the Measure-Up-Campaign, a program that helps the retarded citizens.

Charles received his education at St. Edwards Elementary School, Hayes Jr. High, and Rayen High School. He is a life long member of St. Edward's Parish where he serves diligently as an usher.

Charles and his lovely wife, the former Sarah Rovan, have been blessed with a daughter, Mrs. Patricia Tortora and a son, Charles, Jr. They have one granddaughter, Kathryn. After 45 years of service from the General Fireproofing Co. where he was a member of union No. 1617, he retired.

Clearly, these two individuals, Mary Rita McNicholas Carney and Charles V. Byrne are the finest examples of Irish-Americans, and I am proud to have them represent our community as the Irish Woman and Irish Man of 1986. Thank you.

EXTENSION PROGRAMS—WHERE WE NEED INCREASES, NOT CUTS

HON. JIM ROSS LIGHTFOOT

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. LIGHTFOOT. Mr. Speaker, as I've said a number of times since coming to Congress, agriculture has been going through difficult trials over the past several years, and those in rural America need our support now more than ever.

In earlier statements objecting to the administration's misplaced budget priorities, I've expressed my view that we cannot pull the rug out from under farmers, particularly in this time of crisis.

Since the administration's fiscal year 1987 budget proposal was announced, I've heard from many of my constituents about proposed cuts in USDA's extension programs.

Now, I've long pushed for an across-the-board freeze or cut in Federal spending as the fairest way to deal with our budget deficits. So when someone suggests that extension programs can bear a cut of over 50 percent in funding, you can understand my dismay. Extension programs, even in good times, have provided the backbone of support for rural communities—in times of crisis these programs become all the more indispensible.

I have no choice but to call upon my colleagues to enlist their support for maintaining extension services in this time of need. Hopefully, you will all share my commitment to these invaluable programs.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. BRUCE A. MORRISON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent due to a long-standing commitment in my district for the vote on House Concurrent Resolution 296, the President's budget proposal for fiscal year 1987.

Had I been present, I would have voted "no."

CHALLENGES BEFORE THE PEOPLE OF HAITI

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, I recently received a letter from Ms. Mireille Merove-Pierre, president, board of directors of the Haitian-American Chamber of Commerce enclosing a resolution passed by that organization.

The letter asked me to share the resolution with my colleagues. It is with enthusiasm that I bring to the attention of this body an eloquent statement by the Haitian-American Chamber of Commerce and Industry on the challenge before the Haitian people and all of us who wish them well:

RESOLUTION OF THE HAITIAN-AMERICAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY

We believe that it is important for U.S. lawmakers to be aware of the significance of recent developments in Haiti to America's long-term interests in the Caribbean. The Duvalier overthrow is no longer front page news, and we realize that events outside Haiti—South Africa, the Philippines, El Salvador, Nicaragua, the Middle East—are competing for attention. Washington must not overlook the fact, however, that the difficult and delicate phase of rebuilding Haiti's economy, and political system, is just beginning. It is essential that positive efforts made by Haiti's transition government receive adequate and timely U.S. support. Current economic and political costs are low compared to what will be needed later if a good job is not done now. We hope you will share our message with the Black Caucus and the entire Congress.

UKRAINE FAMINE COMMISSION—APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS

HON. DAN MICA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with provisions of Public Laws 98-473 and 99-180, establishing and governing the Commission on the Ukraine Famine, the following public members are hereby appointed:

Mr. Bohdan Fedorak, 24215 Hill, Warren, MI.

Dr. Myron Kuropas, 170 Ilehamwood Drive, De Kalb, IL.

Mr. Daniel Marchishin, 518 Church Street, Bound Brook, NJ.

Dr. Lubow Margolina-Hansen, 2912 38th Street, Washington, DC.

Mrs. Ulana Mazurkevich, 642 Chelten Hills Drive, Philadelphia, PA.

Dr. Oleh Weres, 6455 Irwin Court, Oakland, CA.

FULL EMPLOYMENT

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 13, 1986

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, on May 1, the National Committee for Full Employment and a Shorter Work Week will be holding its first annual conference.

I have long been convinced that the question of jobs and unemployment is our Nation's most pressing domestic problem. And for an equally long period of time I have been convinced that finding ways to meet that problem is the biggest challenge facing our Nation, and, in the first place, the Congress of the United States.

This conference is one of the best examples of how trade unionists around the country are organizing to deal with unemployment and the need to create jobs. To the extent that labor unions participate in the conference—and to the extent that the Congress listens to them—to that extent will we have taken a step toward providing meaningful jobs at a livable wage for all who want them.

My study of history, to say nothing of the failure of Reaganomics, has led me to the conclusion that these jobs will not be created without action by the Congress to reduce the workweek. That is why I have—and have every year since 1977—introduced legislation to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act to reduce the workweek.

My bill, H.R. 2933, provides for a statutory reduction in the workweek to 30 hours, bans compulsory overtime, and increases the penalty for overtime hours. Were its provision fully in effect today, at least 7 million workers who are presently unemployed would have jobs.

I look forward to meeting many of my friends in the labor movement in Chicago on May 1, in an indepth discussion and examination of this issue, and I urge all my friends to participate.

At this point, I would like to introduce into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a statement by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, the Honorable WILLIAM PROXMIRE, regarding the shorter work week which was contained in the report of the Joint Economic Committee January 1986 Economic Report of the President.

Senator PROXMIRE states:

Considering a shorter workweek. There has been no change in wage and hour legislation with respect to the 8-hour day and the 5-day week for more than 50 years. Meanwhile, there has been a vast increase in productivity. It has been estimated that a statutory change in overtime from time-and-a-half to double-time would create at last 1 million additional jobs at no cost to the taxpayer and only modest cost to employers.

A statutory reduction in weekly hours to 35 from the present 40 before overtime pay is triggered would create between 5 million and 7 million jobs. Any improvement in wage and hour legislation would at least temporarily cost some workers a modest reduction in compensation. Some would lose overtime to newly hired employees.

Most employers could not be expected to increase hourly pay sufficiently to make up for the shorter number of hours worked. The reduction in weekly hours before overtime is triggered would also tend to increase cost and prices somewhat.

It would be, however, a humane and practical way of increasing the number of jobs substantially and reducing unemployment without government expenditures. In effect, it would enact a national policy of sharing jobs.

This country followed this policy successfully for some 40 years, from the end of the 19th century until the middle 1930's. With unemployment on a long-term rising trend for the past 30 years, it may be time to resume a modest application of higher overtime payments and shorter statutory work weeks, to reduce unemployment.

A happy side effect of this policy would be an increase in leisure time for America's 110 million working people.

SENATE—Friday, March 14, 1986

(Legislative day of Monday, March 10, 1986)

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights * * * to secure these rights governments are instituted among men deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."—Declaration of Independence.

God of Creation, we thank You for our political system, its uniqueness in history, and the prosperous, powerful Republic which is its product. We thank You for the fundamental principle that sovereignty belongs to the people and that government receives its powers from them. Help us to realize, Lord, that if the people fail to understand this—if they ignore or neglect their sovereignty, the system inevitably will break down. Awaken us to the peril of the Republic if people abdicate their sovereignty and quicken the people to their indispensable responsibility. We pray in His name who is the source of all power. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the leaders have 10 minutes each. I will reserve any time I do not use.

That is to be followed by special orders in favor of Senators HAWKINS, PROXMIRE, and BAUCUS.

There will then be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond the hour of 10 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each.

Following routine morning business, the Senate will resume consideration of the House message to accompany H.R. 3128, reconciliation. Pending is amendment No. 1673.

It would be my hope, and I know a number of Members have conflicts starting early this afternoon, that we could be on this measure right at 10 o'clock. If there are amendments, the amendments should be offered. There will be a limit of 30 minutes on each amendment. I believe that is correct. So we can move rather quickly. I understand there may be three, four, or five amendments, or maybe more. I am not certain.

If we can act on reconciliation and dispose of that, then it would be my hope that, if we can get an agreement, we can take up the Fitzwater nomination, after going into executive session, file cloture, get unanimous consent on the cloture motion, and dispose of that matter.

Then, before we leave today, lay down the water resources bill.

On Monday, it would seem to me if we can accomplish this much today, I would be in a pretty good position to indicate to Members, if we are able to lay down the water resources bill today or the first thing on Monday, that it is my view that there are probably enough matters to be taken care of in the water resources bill, amendments that can be accepted, opening statements and other areas of discussion, where we could probably avoid any rollcall votes on Monday. But it will depend on how much we accomplish today. I will try to make an announcement as early as I can so that Senators who have conflicts on Monday can be advised.

SERGEANT AT ARMS OFFICE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, responding to the concerns expressed by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM] regarding terminations within the Office of the Sergeant at Arms I submit the following information which I have obtained from the Office of the Sergeant at Arms, for the RECORD.

In June 1985 when the Sergeant at Arms' tenure began, he communicated to each of his department heads his targeted direction toward efficiency and effectiveness, stressing the overriding need to maintain or increase services within increasingly limited resources. He also began at that time to take a hard look at the overall organization to identify both functions and positions which could be viewed as duplicative or nonessential, recognizing from the outset that it might come down to a choice between management staff or production personnel. Indeed, a recent study in one area of his operations revealed that while the industry norm for supervisory personnel is 1:17, the Sergeant at Arms ratio is approximately 1:3. Clearly, management levels needed to be examined and assessed for cost effectiveness.

Several options were considered within the overall need for reapplication of limited resources. This whole process evolved over an 8-month period and has involved attrition, abolition, or consolidation of positions as well as replacement of personnel. The decision regarding replacement of higher level supervisory personnel in the Service Department and Computer Center had as its basis the determination and realization that: First, the number of administrative positions was disproportionately large to the needs of the department; and, second, the management team was not responding as the Sergeant at Arms had hoped to the new way of conducting business. These were difficult decisions but necessary for improving the efficiency of the Senate as an institution. These combined efforts to date have resulted in an anticipated full year reduction of 69 positions and an approximate $1.8 million from the pending fiscal year 1987 budget estimate. Similar personnel reductions were made in the Service Department in 1981 due to budgetary restrictions.

It is true that some of the affected individuals had several years of seniority, however, the restructuring was conducted on a very objective, businesslike planning basis, without regard to personal considerations. This obviously called for the establishment of priorities geared toward production demands and legitimacy of functions.

It is never easy to have to inform employees that their services are no longer required, especially when terminations are based on the legitimacy of their function. Certainly there is a human side to every employee, from the nightshift custodian in the Capitol to members of my immediate staff; and, I would venture to say that each and every employee has a very real personal life and a need to be employed. For this reason, there was a conscious effort to avoid bringing personal considerations into the decision-making process.

Special provision was made for each individual terminated. Everyone affected was provided with at least 10 days administrative leave over and above their unused vacation time to facilitate relocation efforts. The Sergeant at Arms' Director of Human Resources made a concerted effort to meet personally with everyone affected to discuss letters of recommendation, Ramspect Act opportunities and general résumé preparation and job search assistance.

It is a common occurrence in the professional workplace to reorganize an organization to effect efficiencies and increase cost effectiveness, especially when mandated by limited resources. I would venture to say that in the coming months cutbacks will become commonplace throughout the Federal Government as we strive for a balanced budget.

The narrow timeframe for departures was established in the interest of preserving morale and avoiding even greater disruption and anxiety than was already bound to occur. There was also every intention of being as fair and reasonable as possible. The affected employees were notified of their terminations in mid-February. To date each remains on the payroll; they will remain in payroll status until they have used their entire 1986 leave entitlement plus an additional 10 days of administrative leave—for most this equates to 6 weeks on the payroll after notice of termination. Options for further monetary considerations to these individuals could not be effected due to limited budgetary resources. The Directors and Deputy Directors of the Service Department and Computer Center will remain on the Sergeant at Arms payroll until the first day of May—a 10-week consideration.

While I regret very much the personal sacrifices which have resulted from this reorganization, we have an interesting tendency around here to point our finger in the other direction whenever the subject of waste and inefficiency is mentioned.

We like to talk about waste and mismanagement in the Federal Government never once admitting that our very own base of operations could stand a little scrutiny. The Sergeant at Arms Office examined its organization and correctly consolidated some of its subdivisions into one. The time had come to eliminate inefficiency resulting from the duplication of functions. And to a large degree this has been accomplished. The Office has pooled its resources where necessary. It has transferred employees in some cases to areas that require more manpower and eliminated positions in areas where functions overlapped. These decisions have not been easy ones. They never are. They are difficult ones that evoke sympathy for those whose jobs have been eliminated. Waste is an easy topic to talk about in the abstract, particularly when it's the other branch of Government's problem. But I would suggest to my colleagues that this branch of Government must shed itself of the luxuries which we can no longer afford.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). The distinguished acting Democratic leader is recognized.

POSSIBLE RESULTS OF GRAMM-RUDMAN-HOLLINGS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, a vote on the balanced budget amendment has been put off until March 25. But the issue will be the same then that it has been all along: Should we be tampering with our Constitution when we can achieve what we all want better and faster by making the legislative process work? We do not need to play around with the Constitution to eliminate the deficit and get the budget in balance. All we need is a good sense of national priorities and the will to back those priorities with our votes.

The distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Senator MARK HATFIELD, a Republican, who, like me, is against the proposed amendment, said the other day:

> If you like Gramm-Rudman, you ought to love the constitutional amendment. One may be a can of worms, but the other is a barrel of snakes.

Well, I do not like Gramm-Rudman. It is a can of worms. I voted against it. But now that it is law, I am determined to do my part to try to make it work. As any young fisherman can tell you, even a can of worms can be put to good use. But unless you work in a carnival sideshow, why would you want a barrel of snakes? I certainly do not, and I do not think the American people do either.

I opposed Gramm-Rudman for three reasons:

One, I believed it to be unconstitutional. One court has now so ruled, and I suspect the Supreme Court will sustain that ruling.

Two, it can lead to a transfer of authority, a very serious transfer of power, from the Congress to the President.

While I am serving in this body of the U.S. Senate, I am not about to go along with transfers of power that could diminish the role of Congress and lead to an imperial Presidency.

Three, I voted against Gramm-Rudman most importantly because it can lead to across-the-board cuts in virtually all programs without any sense of priorities, programs particularly helpful to very poor people having in good part been exempted, but programs that affect the welfare of all Americans having not been exempted.

Let me give a few examples of the sort of cuts that we could see coming and will come if the Gramm-Rudman automatic cuts actually occur.

One, we have had a year of air disasters with rising fatalities, and yet Gramm-Rudman can lead to a 25-percent cut in air controllers and air safety inspectors. The inevitable result: More dangerous skies, more air crashes, more fatalities, more claims against the United States, new costs.

Two, we have a serious problem at our borders. The worst aspect is drugs coming across our border, hard drugs that lead to violence and death in our cities and corruption of many, many young Americans. Gramm-Rudman could mean as much as a 25-percent cut in the border patrol, in Customs agents, in the Coast Guard, in the Drug Enforcement Agency, in the FBI, in the Department of Justice.

The inevitable result: More hard drugs across the border in California, in Florida, and elsewhere in our country, and more severe problems of crime, mayhem, bloodshed, muggings, and deaths in our streets.

Three, we have had an 18-percent cut in education in the past 5 years. Gramm-Rudman could lead this year to another 25-percent cut and to deeper cuts in ensuing years. This would be absolute folly, ending our effort to invest in the quality and in the capacities of young Americans, making it far more difficult for us to compete with other countries in world trade and in world security matters.

Finally, among many other, I think, terrible examples of what Gramm-Rudman could bring, it could lead to across-the-board cuts in national defense, with no sense of priorities, that could decimate our conventional readiness forces, make us more reliant upon nuclear weapons, lead to a situation where a President might be compelled to turn to nuclear weapons at a time of crisis, leading to the ultimate horror of a nuclear catastrophe.

We must avoid all of this, Mr. President. The way is to make Gramm-Rudman work, now it is law, so that we can work out a budget agreed upon by the President and the Congress to avoid the automatic trigger that would lead to that sort of ridiculous, unwise, and dangerous cuts in some domestic and foreign programs. What we need to do is agree on that budget. I, for one, will do all I can to work with the President, with Members of Congress, the House and Senate Republicans and Democrats alike, to agree upon a budget that will avoid the worst aspects of Gramm-Rudman.

EXPRESSION OF CONCERN ABOUT CHANGES IN RECONCILIATION

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, on the reconciliation matter, I want to serve notice that Senator PETE

WILSON, my Republican colleague, and I have some grave concerns about some very unfair aspects of the proposed Republican leadership substitute on reconciliation. We shall be bringing that matter to the attention of the Senate shortly and will offer an amendment to cope with one of the very serious problems that result from changes negotiated privately between Senate Republican staff and White House staff.

The very complex language of this proposal, unseen by any committee of the Senate or by CBO, will take hundreds of millions of dollars from my State if it ever becomes law. It ought to be defeated.

And Senator WILSON and I will attempt to restore language previously passed by both Houses, which will give all coastal States a more effective voice in the negotiations with the Department of the Interior over coastal oil and gas development.

RESERVATION OF THE MINORITY LEADER'S TIME

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I reserve whatever time is left to the minority leader.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR HAWKINS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

BURMA—A BRIGHT SPOT ON THE DRUG ERADICATION SCENE

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, there are not a great number of bright spots in the realm of international narcotics trafficking and efforts to bring it under control. But one place where the outlook is encouraging is Burma. The Burmese have recently begun aerial spraying of poppy fields, something the United States has advocated for some time. We provided three aircraft to Burma for use in aerial spraying, and trained nine Burmese pilots in agricultural spraying techniques. In addition, we trained a number of Burmese policemen in special drug control courses at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center in Glynco, GA. They will function as team managers to train and lead their fellow policemen in drug eradication efforts. These actions are encouraging, in that the Burmese are officially seeking outside help in trying to curb opium production and committing their own resources to acheive this goal.

One should note that while Burma is one of the world's largest producers of illicit opium, the central government does not have effective control of the primary growing areas. The Burma Communist Party controls the largest growing area, with increasing numbers of refineries in Communist-controlled territory.

Poppy growing is a key ingredient of the economy in insurgent-dominated territory, and the insurgents use the profits from opium smuggling to finance their revolutionary activities. The Burmese Government is firmly committed to wiping out illicit narcotics production and destroying the organizations involved. Their reasoning is simple: the drug trade feeds the insurgency and provides the wherewithal for buying its weapons.

The Burmese strategy includes the annual "Hellflower" campaign, in which police, army, and civilians move into an opium-growing area to eradicate the crops manually. Simultaneously, a military operation is launched against the heroin refineries. The results thus far have been outstanding. Of the estimated 75,000 hectares planted in 1985-86, 15,000 hectares have been eradicated manually and by aerial spraying. Large seizures of opium, heroin morphine base, and chemicals associated with drug production have been made in recent months. The destruction of one-fifth of the crop is just short of spectacular. This success did not come without sacrifice. More than 100 Burmese were killed every month in the war against drug trafficking and drug-financed insurgents.

Carrying the battle further, Burma has tightened its drug control laws, providing stiff penalties and legal sanctions for every aspect of narcotics production, processing, and cultivation. Prison terms of 5 to 10 years and fines of $1,300—and that is big money in Burma—are meted out to defendants convicted of cultivation, manufacture, possession, and transportation of narcotics, or unauthorized transfer of prescription drugs. For processing, there can be a term of 10 years to life and a $6,600 fine. For the import or export of drugs or materials relating to drugs, one can draw a term of 10 years to life imprisonment, or the death penalty. For accepting bribes, there can be a 3- to 5-year jail sentence and for using narcotics, 3 to 5 years.

Burma conducts a continuous, intensive program of drug information in schools and through posters, radio, and television. The prevention theme is stressed in schools in the form of lectures, exhibitions, and competitions. The harmfulness of narcotics is regularly emphasized at mass rallies and political indoctrination sessions. Burmese Government agencies also use newspapers, pamphlets, and magazines to warn of the dangers from drug abuse.

Burma's Ministry of Health has sharply stepped up both the number and quality of treatment and detoxification centers. Under the new antidrug laws, addicts are required to register. After registration, treatment and rehabilitation are compulsory. Failure to register and seek treatment is dealt with harshly, with prison terms up to 3 years.

The effort has paid off. The addiction rate has stabilized in Burma, in contrast to the United States and other nations where the addiction rate is growing by leaps and bounds. Burma has shown that it has the will, the resolve, and the determination to fight drugs. We in America congratulate Burma's leaders and the Burmese people on their success, and say keep up the good work.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Chair.

HOW WE ARE BUYING OFF NATO ALLIES' OBJECTIONS TO STAR WARS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, future historians looking back on the 1980's will be impressed by the remarkably skillful way the Reagan administration has sold "star wars" over the emphatic objections of so much expert opinion in the United States. If it continues, star wars will become the most costly military program in the history of the world by far. Yet the administration has persuaded Congress to plunge ahead with it at the very time the country staggers under the load of the biggest deficits in the Nation's history. The biggest political issue of the day in America is the skyrocketing national debt and the endless succession of huge deficits. Yet the President was able to persuade Congress to double star wars research spending in 1986. And he is well on his way to persuading Congress to shove it ahead by another huge 100 percent in 1987.

Even this amazing performance pales by comparison with the remarkable way the President has stilled the objection of the Nation's military allies. The European NATO countries depend heavily on the U.S. military forces as the superpower heart of defense against the Soviets. These nations have every reason to fear that if star wars does succeed in providing a protective shield for the United States it would leave Western Europe exposed to attack from a vastly superior Soviet conventional and nuclear force. Star wars could not possibly defend Europe and the Europeans know it. Star wars represents a diversion of America's military strength from the NATO defense. It is strictly a loser for the Europeans. Here's why: if star wars fails which it very likely will the dominant NATO leader—the United States—will have squandered its economic and technological resources to no avail. If star wars succeeds—it is very unlikely but it is possible, a future U.S. President might decide the United States should hunker down behind its nuclear defense and let Europe go rather than incinerate the world by pressing the nuclear button or take the terrible loss of American lives in a major conventional or nuclear war in Europe.

So the Europeans have every reason to oppose star wars, and oppose it vigorously. Why don't they? Answer—they have literally been bought off—and I mean bought off—with money. Secretary Weinberger has done a masterful selling job.

How does he do it? Answer: Billions of dollars does it. The Defense Minister of the United Kingdom has signed an agreement with the United States that would provide the United Kingdom with a substantial share of star wars research contracts. The agreement is reported to be for about $1½ billion. Where will the $1½ billion come from? It comes from Uncle Sam—from taxpayers in Georgia, taxpayers in Wisconsin, taxpayers all over America. It will cost the British nothing. The French and West Germans are not far behind. A year ago, there was considerable criticism from our European allies. But money talks and billions of dollars can talk very eloquently indeed.

Now comes Japan. For obvious reasons, Japan is the most antinuclear nation in the world. The Japanese of course recognize the dubious prospects of star wars. Like the Europeans, they, too, rely on the supermilitary power of the United States for their security. The Japanese spend less than 1 percent of their GNP on their military defense. An America in the future retiring behind its star war defenses would leave Japan militarily naked. But like the Europeans, the Japanese are lured by the star wars billions. It is a tough siren call to resist. The Japanese can, over the years, receive billions of dollars of research money by winning those star wars contracts and at no cost at all. It is almost like being handed a free-winning multi-billion-dollar lottery ticket.

On February 9, Clyde Haberman reported from Tokyo for the New York Times that the Japanese had not finally decided whether to take this free ticket for billions of American dollars. Two observations in this Haberman story are especially interesting. Defense analysts told Haberman that the Japanese might follow: "one possible model, the West German approach announced last December, which would withhold active Government involvement but allow private companies and institutes to join the research." This is the same technique the strategic defense initiative office is pursuing with prestigious institutions like the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. MIT does not endorse star wars. In fact, the president of MIT has made a major point of saying he does not endorse star wars. But MIT researchers have gone on the big bucks star wars payroll.

It is obvious what Japanese and West German business and MIT researchers get out of this. They get money and lots of it. But what does the Defense Department get out of bringing Japanese researchers in on star wars? The second Haberman observation reveals this. He wrote in the February 10 New York Times the following:

> Despite Japan's technological pre-eminence, United States officials suggest that they regard any participation by Tokyo as bearing greater political significance than scientific.
